Among the new factors in the situation are the "depression girls" who became prostitutes because of "personal financial distress," and the new type of dance hall in which conditions are "demoralizing and degrading" for both patrons and hostesses. Payment for protection from the police is again a common form of graft. In some cities the graft is said to extend to the examination of prostitutes for venereal disease.

The writers find that public attention must again be focussed on the problem. If this is done it should fairly easy to suppress "the grosser, more aggressive and prominent forms of prostitution." Even if this means only that prostitution becomes "clandestine and passive," this is a gain, "because the volume and intensity of the business has been diminished and because the damage to the community welfare and health is in direct ratio to that volume and intensity."

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN BRITAIN.

Mr. J. A. Spender writes in an article in Current History:

Nothing in recent years had been more difficult to judge rightly than the economic condition of Great Britain. Until a few months ago it was a commonly accepted belief that she was in a state of continuous decline, and she seemed herself rather to acquiesce in this judgment than to resent it. The general impression was heightened by her candid habit of broadcasting her figures of unemployment and by the frank reports in which royal commissions and expert committees exposed the skeletons in her cupboard. Nevertheless this general impression was, if not wholly wrong, at least profoundly misleading.

It is of course true that certain of Great Britain's basic industries—coal, cotton, iron and steel—depending for their prosperity upon exports, have been greatly depressed since the war, and that unemployment, being concentrated in the areas in which these industries are situated, has taken on a peculiarly painful form. But on the other side, there have been evidences in the life of the people of a diffused prosperity such as no Englishman of my age can remember in his lifetime. All through these years of depression the great mass of the working people have been drawing higher wages, have been better fed, better clothed, and able to spend more on sport and pleasure than ever before; even the unemployed have drawn allowances exceeding in many cases the wages of unskilled labour before the war.

The paradox was so glaring that it was supposed that the British people were living on their capital and therefore heading for bankruptcy. But in fact savings were on a higher level than before the war; banks were cluttered with money demanding investment; large sums were still being lent abroad. The people were carrying on their backs a debt of more than £8,000,000,000, supporting from 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 unemployed, financing their expensive social services—old-age pensions, widows' pensions, sickness and accident insurance—and doing all this without any serious privation and even with a distinct rise in the standard of life for immense numbers.

I say without serious privation for the country as a whole, but qualifications must be put in for various classes. Among the workers a large family on the dole may easily be in deep poverty unless the wife has great skill in management. A few weeks ago an investigator into unemployment stirred public feeling by saying that 6,000,000 people—men, women and children—were short of food. Thirty years ago when unemployment was at the normal pre-war level (1903) Campbell-Bannerman asserted on the authority of Charles Booth that 12,000,000 were "underfed and on the verge of starvation." The figure, whatever it may be, is not a speciality of these times, but we recognize it to be deplorable.

If we turn to the well-to-do classes, the very rich who pay upward of 11 out of every 20 shillings in income tax and super-tax and a third to a half of their possessions in death duties have undoubtedly had to make large retrenchments. Great country houses have been sold and converted into hotels and schools; many big London houses, including some of the noblest of eighteenth-century mansions, have been demolished, and shops, offices and flats erected on their sites. The way of life of the rich and aristocracy has greatly changed. Instead of spending the chief part of their income on their country estates, a large number of them now live the greater part of the year in London or on the Riviera and apply the cash set free to the sports and pleasures in favour with their young people. If the big establishment is given up, enough remains, in spite of income tax and death duties to keep this class in the state of expensive activity recorded by the picture papers.

The really hard case is that of elderly professional and business people who had saved what they supposed to be sufficient to keep them in old age, and now between taxation and falling investment find themselves in straitened circumstances when it is too late to make a fresh start. This class, and with them the numerous spinsters and widows drawing small incomes from trustee investments, has been severely hit by the war-loan conversion from 5 to 2½ per cent. But even these are relatively well off compared with the rentier classes in other European countries.

The present financial situation is one which any Chancellor of the Exchequer of the pre-war period would have declared to be totally and utterly impossible, and which most European countries have found to be so. In 1909 the country was thrown into convulsions and a great constitutional crisis precipitated because of Mr. Lloyd George proposed to raise £14,000,000 in new taxes. Last year a Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer gave away just that sum in a remission of the beer tax, which he treated as an inconsiderable item in a budget of £700,000,000. That taxation on this scale would bankrupt industry and starve a multitude would have been the unanimous opinion of orthodox financiers twenty years ago. That it could go hand in hand with a rising standard of life for the great majority and comparatively little discomfort for the minority they would have held to be demonstrably impossible.

What is the explanation? First, of course, a considerable part of this taxation represents not a sacrifice but a redistribution of wealth. If Peter is robbed to pay Paul both Peter and Paul are still Englishmen, and the money remains in the country. A large part of the £300,000,000 needed for the service of the national debt goes back into the pockets from which it is taken; a large part of the money raised for unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, sickness and accident insurance goes from the pockets of the richer English into the pockets of the poorer English, but represents spending power in the country. This redistribution of wealth is on the whole good. It has done something to redress the inequalities of rich and poor; it has tided the poor over a difficult period without grievous hardship. Great Britain has, in consequence, been able to avoid the distress that followed the Napoleonic wars and, so far, been saved from social strife.

The sacrifices required of the rich have on the whole been to their advantage. Apart from any question of social order, they have an enormous interest in maintaining the credit of the country, and for them as for all wealthy people in Europe since the war it has been a choice between sacrificing a considerable part of their income in taxation or seeing their capital values dissolve in a debacle of credit and currency. It may be claimed for the wealthy and well-to-do in Great Britain that they have had the good sense to choose the lesser evil without overmuch grumbling.

But when all this is taken into account, it still remains to be explained how in these supposedly depressed times the money has been earned to render possible both the largely increased expenditure by the State and the generally higher standard of life among the people. In Great Britain as in America there has undoubtedly been a large increase in the output of industry since the war. The World War was unlike all other wars in that, owing to the enormous demand for supplies and munitions during the four and a half years of the struggle, it left industry equipped with a productive capacity which it would scarcely have developed in twenty years in normal conditions. This has had the double effect of enabling Great Britain to produce new wealth with unprecedented rapidity and of creating the new kind of "technological unemployment" which has characterized all industrial countries. The unemployment has been most in the public mind and has masked the industrial activity which has enabled Great Britain to support the unemployed and in spite of falling profits and shrinking foreign trade, assured a fair measure of prosperity for the country as a whole in the years of depression, so-called.

THE CONTROL OF OPIUM.

The Assam Opium Enquiry Committee formed on March 6 last year with Rev. J. J. M. Nichols Roy (ex-Minister) as Chairman, to review the results of the present opium policy of the Government of Assam and to advise them as to the future policy to be adopted, have submitted their report. They visited several places of Assam and examined 134 witnesses and some 35 opium-eaters. The following are their main recommendations :—

1. In the plains and districts the present policy of 10 per cent cut in the rations of pass-holders under 50 years of age should continue, the rations of those over that age remaining unaffected.
2. With the consent of H. E. the Governor the cut should be made in the backward areas.
3. The registers should be re-opened for the registration of consumers of the age of 45 and over. No passes should be granted unless the Civil Surgeon or the Government Assistant Surgeon or in the case of tea gardens, a medical officer with European qualifications, certifies that opium is absolutely necessary for the preservation of health. The new passes should be permanent and subject to annual reduction in the case of consumers so long as they are under 50 years of age.

4. To counteract the evil of short-weight sales negotiations should be re-opened with the Government of India for the manufacture of opium in pills or tablet form. Government should take steps to ensure that the vend-fee is fixed at a rate which will allow opium lessees a reasonable margin of net profit and should consider the possibility of dispensing with prepayment of 2 months' additional vend-fees. Vendors on fixing pay may be appointed on an experimental basis in one or 2 selected areas and Government officials such as Sub-Deputy Collectors, Deputy Inspectors of Schools, non-officials of the status of Honorary Magistrates, Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen of Local Bodies and in some cases Mauzadars should be empowered to inspect and report on the conduct of opium shops. Lessees who are detected selling opium to non-registered consumers should be prosecuted under the Opium Act and severely punished.

5. Attention of Magistrates should be drawn to the provision of Assam Opium Amendment Act I of 1933. Government should examine the question of the applicability of Deportation Act III of 1864 to Chinese, Nepalese and Marwari smugglers.

6. With the grant of his Excellency the Governor the Assam Opium Smoking Act of 1927 should be extended to the backward areas; a section might be added to the Act making the possession of prepared opium an offence.

7. Out of the existing revenue derived from opium an increased allotment should be made for carrying out measures which would forward the present opium policy. The balance should be applied to the creation of an Opium Replacement Fund to meet the expenditure for social and sanitary purposes; and

8. Public opinion must openly declare itself against the opium habit and propaganda work among the consumers should be carried on with which Government should actively identify itself.

SANITARY CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES.

Social and Economic News, issued by the Department of Social and Industrial Research and Counsel, International Missionary Council, Geneva, gives a short survey of the Sanitary Co-operative Movement in Yugoslavia which is working for the improvement of conditions of housing, domestic life and hygiene in the country. It has been suggested that co-operative societies of a similar type might render great services in colonies and mandated territories and even in highly civilised countries where the population is dispersed and not adequately provided with medical personnel.

The Movement dates back to 1921 when a young and socially minded doctor organised the first sanitary co-operative society. An enquiry made some years before had revealed a very unsatisfactory state of sanitary and housing conditions in the country. 72% of the dwellings were damp, dark or obstructed; 12% had no glass in the windows, but only paper or wooden shutters; 30% were without any artificial light; 38% contained no beds; 20% had no tables or chairs; 30% had no table service beyond half a dozen plates and two or three spoons; 8% were without any heating arrangements; 95% of the inhabitants had no supply of pure water; 69% could not read or write; 88% were without medical attention in case of illness.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 31]

The co-operative form was adopted because a movement for sanitary progress can only succeed if it is quite general, and because co-operative societies were considered to be the most effective method of reaching the population which is thereby organised into small units. Co-operative organisation was preferred to philanthropic work for the sake of its educational value and because the work undertaken can only be carried out by personal effort on the part of those concerned.

The example of the agricultural co-operatives, which have considerable material resources and prestige in the country, proved of great help in the organisation of sanitary co-operatives. Thanks to the former, the peasant had an iron plough and modern equipment for cultivation. At the same time he was sleeping on the dirty floor of his hut, preparing his food on an open fire grate, and if his child was ill he consulted a woman in the neighbourhood! In view of this contrast it was not very difficult to convince him that co-operation could still do something more for him. Sanitary co-operatives are, in fact, part of the general agricultural co-operation, of which they form an evolution and a differentiation. They are now affiliated to the Central Union of Serbian Agricultural Co-operative Societies.

On June 30th, 1932, the number of sanitary co-operatives amounted to 68 with a membership of 20,887. These figures may appear insignificant and may give a wrong idea of the importance of the movement. It must, however, be borne in mind that the movement developed in a time of unprecedented agricultural crisis and consequent impoverishment of the rural population.

In addition to medical attention, the work of the societies has consisted of the organisation of courses and lectures and the distribution of sanitary articles and medicines at prices 50% lower than those usually charged. The lectures were not confined to hygienic subjects but very often included the industrial problems of the men as well as the household questions interesting the women. During the winter months the men were also given practical instruction in the manufacture of household furniture and utensils.

It is clearly realised that education by propaganda campaigns is not sufficient to ensure progress of sanitation, and that the school must become the principal educational agency as it tends to form habits. It is, however, considered necessary to assist the school by a direct approach to the family circle and the population as a whole in order that the child may not find too great a discrepancy between what it has been taught and the habits of its environment.

A beginning has been made in attaching to the sanitary co-operatives special veterinary departments which are governed by the same working principles.

In 1930, a law on health co-operatives was enacted which assured to the movement the assistance of the government as well as a regular subvention for the strengthening of its work.

All the societies are organised into a Union which assists in their formation, supervises their working, represents their interests and also undertakes:

- to supply sanitary material and articles of hygiene, and to manufacture them where possible in its own workshops and factories;
- to carry out educational propaganda by means of lectures, cinema-shows, and the opening of the necessary schools and courses;
- to provide medical assistance for members and cheap medicines, and to build hospitals and co-operative dispensaries etc.;
- to compile literature on the subject of public health and hygiene as well as on co-operative questions.

Dr. Kojic, the founder of the Sanitary Co-operative Societies, has suggested the creation of such co-operatives in all countries, the formation of an international federation in touch with other international organisations such as the League of Red Cross Societies, the International Co-operative Alliance etc., and the joint study of problems of public health in close collaboration with the International Labour Office and the Health Section of the League.

BESANT MEMORIAL SCHOOL.

In order to perpetuate in a practical manner the life-long services to and deep interest in education on the part of Dr. Annie Besant, whose last wish it was that an educational institution should be established at or near Adyar for helping the youth, it is proposed to establish and conduct a school in Adyar to be known as the Besant Memorial School.

The School will be conducted on the lines laid down by Dr. Besant in her many educational writings and in her guidance of the various institutions with which she was associated. These are to be found in her pamphlet entitled "Principles of Education."

In general, the first care of the School will be to ensure healthy bodies; and games and exercises, together with careful medical supervision will be regarded as of vital importance. The second care of the School will be to guide the healthy development of the emotional nature, so that the students may grow amidst clean and uplifting impulses and feelings, thus conserving and usefully directing their growing vigour. The third care of the School will be to help the students to gain useful knowledge, and the ability to control and direct the powers of the mind.

Religious education will form an integral part of the curriculum, in the course of which the Theosophical principles of life, to be found in every great religion, will be given due prominence and the students will be helped to discover in their respective faiths both an adequate understanding of life and a happy confidence in themselves and in their future. Special stress will be laid upon the importance of mutual respect among the adherents of the various religions.

Political education will consist in training the students for good citizenship. Patriotism will be given its due place, as also the paramount importance of the international spirit as an integral part of true patriotism.

Ordered and cultured freedom will form the basis of the School activities, and self-respect and self-reliance will accordingly be encouraged to the fullest possible extent. The school will be a community, representing to miniature, as far as expedient, life in the outer world; and its members will be trained to value the dignity, opportunities and responsibilities of life, so that there may be a safe transition from the stage of preparation to that of growing participation in the larger life of the world-school itself.

Aesthetic and artistic education will be given all possible prominence, for upon this aspect of education individual and national refinement very largely depend. The importance of education for leisure will be practically recognised, in which connection craftsmanship will be constantly encouraged. Similarly, it will be borne in mind that education, in the case of the few, is for that leadership of which the whole world stands in such sore need.

The School thus hopes to send into the world good citizens, religious in the noblest sense of the word; equipped to earn an honourable living, to profit from the experiences through which all must needs pass, and to be to those around them examples of right living.

The School will be co-educational and largely residential, but day-students will also be admitted. Only vegetarian food will be provided.

The curriculum will be that prescribed by the Education Department of the Government of Madras, and by the University of Madras so far as regards the higher classes.

The normal medium of instruction will be Tamil, but where possible special arrangements will be made for students whose mother-tongue is not Tamil. Special arrangements will also as far as possible be made for students who are preparing for the local examinations of foreign universities.

The general management of the School is in the hands of the Besant Educational Trust, a body registered under Act XXI of 1860, with an Executive Committee at Adyar to deal with the routine business.

The Theosophical Society has at present no official connection with or responsibility for the principles or management of the School, but the Adyar Headquarters authorities are in general sympathy with its aims and objects, and consider that it may in due time become a most useful activity in the vicinity of Adyar.

It has been decided to open the School in Classes 1 to 5, and forms 1 to 8, in June next if sufficient applications for admission are forthcoming. There will also be day classes for very little children, under the guidance of an experienced teacher. Temporary premises will be rented from the Theosophical Society on the Adyar estate until funds are available for the purchase of land and for the erection of suitable buildings. It is, of course, intended that the School shall become a fully equipped High School, and later on a College if funds permit.

INTERNATIONAL REGULATION OF CONTRACT LABOUR.

The International Labour Organisation has recently taken a first step towards raising the problem of "Contract Labour" to an international plane by placing the question of the recruiting of Native Labour on the agenda of its 1933 Conference.

The problem of "Contract Labour" has come increasingly to the fore since the adoption of the Forced Labour Convention in 1930 and was dealt with in a number of meetings of the Committee of Experts on Native Labour of the International Labour Office. As will be recalled, this Committee took the first steps which led to the adoption of the Forced Labour Convention in 1930. In the course of the last few years it has drawn up principles on contract labour with a large degree of unanimity on certain important points.

As regards recruiting, the Committee defined with increasing precision its opinion that the final object to be attained is the replacement of recruiting by the free offer of labour, and that measures should be taken to render gradually the recruiting of labour unnecessary. Until such time as recruiting can be dispensed with, the Committee defined certain principles on which the regulation of recruiting operations should be based.

For the engagement of workers the Committee drew up a series of recommendations concerning the journey of recruited workers to their place of work and their actual engagement. In particular, it stressed the importance of action by the administration to secure, through the presence of a representative of the competent authority, that the contract is in accordance with the law and is fully understood and freely accepted by the worker. A medical examination was held necessary to prove that the worker is fit for the work on which he is to be employed. Certain recommendations were also drawn up by the Committee with the object of making the provisions stricter in the case of recruiting in one territory for employment in the territory of another administration.

The Committee's examination of the principles which should govern recruiting is now practically completed, and in preparation of the abovementioned conference the International Labour Office will publish a report towards the end of the present year on these principles and on existing law and practice. The Committee, however, is to meet once again in May to continue the discussion of the regulation of contract labour in the stages following recruiting.

NOTES

Congress and Council Entry:—The question which agitated Congressmen twelve years ago is once again to the fore. The first suggestion that the boycott of Councils was a mistake came from Mr. Satyamurti of Madras and was repeated by Mr. Jamnadas Mehta of Bombay. Several others felt in the same way but waited to see how Gandhiji would take the idea. At the Poona meeting at which the matter was brought up, individual civil disobedience was substituted for mass civil disobedience as the method appropriate to Congress workers with the proviso that preoccupation with the removal of untouchability or the promotion of Hindu Muslim unity, would be regarded as ranking equally with individually seeking imprisonment in the scale of Congress service. Several Congressmen, it was found, were preoccupied with the uplift of antyajas and Hindu Muslim unity had, of course, been the life's mission of many others. There were some who frankly said that they did not propose to seek imprisonment, again, either on grounds of health, family reasons or just because they had come to realise the utter futility of wasting some months which they could employ to better purpose. Pandit Jawharlal Nehru was the only outstanding Congress leader who stuck to the old plan. The Council entry movement seemed to be standing still. Suddenly some Congress leaders who had violently attacked their colleagues who had spoken in favour of entering the Councils, themselves espoused the proposal with the result that at a meeting held in Delhi a few days ago it was decided to request Gandhiji's blessing, if he cannot give his active assent, to Congressmen standing for election to the several Legislative bodies at the next General Election. This is a polite way of intimating to Gandhiji that the members who met at Delhi have decided on seeking entry into Councils with his consent or at least connivance if they get it, or without it, if they did not. It may be recalled that a similar situation arose with the Swaraj Party twelve years ago and Gandhiji yielded rather than lose the support of such powerful men as Mr. C. R. Das and Pandit Motilal Nehru. On the present occasion, it is surmised, he would declare that those who feel that they could serve the country better from within the Councils are free to do so. This would limit the circle of individual civil disobedience to those who cannot feel interest in removal of untouchability, the promotion of Hindu Muslim unity, relief operations in Bihar or seeking election to the Legislative Councils. The original Swaraj Party imposed on itself a self-denying ordinance not to take office in any circumstances. It is not stated whether the neo-swarajists intend to adopt a similar rule of conduct.

Mr. Jinnah and the Muslim League:—The Muslim League met in Delhi after a period of suspended animation under the presidency of Mr. Jinnah. When he arrived in Bombay from his three years' sojourn in England, not only Muslims but many non-Muslims also welcomed his presence in the country as being likely to put much needed life in Indian politics. The speech which he made in Bombay encouraged the hope. He condemned without qualification the White Paper constitution which, he declared, would be not only no improvement on, but a distinct retrogression from, the present system. We have not been able to discern the same forthrightness in his Delhi address. The duty of a president is much like that of a judge summing up a case to a jury. He should clearly and impartially indicate what part of the evidence favours, and which militates against, the innocence of the accused, leaving the jury to decide whether he is guilty or not guilty. He should not thrust his own conclusions on the jurors. That is a view of the task of the Chairman of a Conference which commends itself to us. The other view is that the presidential address should be a trumpet call to the audience to range themselves under this flag or that. Mr. Jinnah's address to the Muslim League conformed to neither of the types. It was not without bias nor did it give a definite lead. Unity is essential, is a common place which, unless you have discovered a method of achieving it which had not been tried before, is nothing more than a tiresome platitude. The only thing Mr. Jinnah was definite about was that he was opposed to Federation, not to the particular form of it proposed as we are, but to the principle itself. Many who held the same view have been forced by the stern logic of facts to change their mind. To put it simply, you must have the States with you or they will be driven to be against you, against their own better judgment. Mr. Jinnah will find few persons who have bestowed some thought on the question to go with him. Mr. Jinnah's opinion seems to be that the "communal award" should be accepted and that the whole country should unite in attacking Federation. The main objection of those who oppose the communal award, is that it is itself an insuperable obstacle in the way of co-operation such as Mr. Jinnah wants. The acceptance of the communal award by the Muslim League would, to these persons, be a conclusive proof that it is not prepared to co-operate with them. Our view is that the communal award and Federation can not be rejected though they should be modified, the former to meet the reasonable apprehensions of the Punjab and Bengal Hindu minorities and the latter so as to preserve the unitary character of British India within the Federation.

Devastated Bihar :—The Bihar Central Relief Committee, Patna, have published a detailed account of the ravages caused by the earthquake illustrated by photographs. The Report contains the names of members of different Committees, the several agencies engaged in relief work and a very useful map of the area affected. The country has responded well to the appeal made to private charity. Nearly one crore of rupees have been subscribed to the Viceroy's and Babu Rajendra Prasad's Funds. The Times of India notes a falling off in further contributions and suggests that this is due to inadequate propaganda. Newspapers are naturally inclined to exaggerate the uses of propaganda but there is a limit to wholesome propaganda and when that is reached the law of diminishing return comes into play and the cost of propaganda becomes incommensurate with its result. No amount of propaganda however skilfully managed and artistically arranged can draw money from empty purses. It will be merely a shifting of the burden for the rest of India to deny themselves the necessities of normal life in order to finance the reconstruction of the afflicted province. The main responsibility of relief and reconstruction devolves on Government as it has in other countries in similar occasions. The Government of Bihar can, of course, not be expected to shoulder the financial burden. The Central Government alone can do it and we have no hesitation in saying that having regard to the great sacrifices made by this country for Imperial purposes the British Government's complete failure to recognise any obligation on its part to come to the help of India, is rank ingratitude.

However, that may be, the Government of India has not adopted the right method of meeting the Bihar emergency. Doles are out of place. The very large amount of money which will be needed to rehabilitate the devastated province can be provided only by a large enough loan. There can be no objection to raising it on the score of principle. The reconstruction of Bihar will benefit after-generations more than the present one which has lost heavily in life and property and it is right that the burden of the cost should be spread over the next two or three generations. The present time is favourable to the raising of a large loan at easy interest as the field of investment owing to the depression is extremely circumscribed. This will have to be done. The advantage of doing it immediately is that it will put heart into the stricken people, which is the first thing to do in a calamity. The Bihar Relief Committee cannot take the place of Government in the work of relief and reconstruction. It should not aspire to do it or give the impression that it does so. The responsibility of Government should not be allowed to fade into the background and private effort must be used only to supplement Government measures.

Caste and Clubs:—The Bombay High Court had to decide a case in which there was an appeal against a judgment of a District court upholding the action of a caste council expelling a member for conduct of which it disapproved. The lower court held that a caste council has the right of every club to expel undesirable members and decreed against the complainant. He appealed to the High Court on the ground that the caste council had not complied with its own rules in formulating the ban on him. The caste council urged in reply that apart from rules it had inherent power as the governing body of the caste to expel any of its members. The High Court did not deny that the caste had such power, but held that, when the Council had made certain rules to regulate the exercise of its power, it was bound by them and the failure to comply with its own rules in this case entitled the aggrieved member to a judgment in his favour. Caste councils usually consist of the elders who are generally averse to change and if the rules required reference to the general body of caste members, it is quite possible that their decision may be rescinded owing to the influence of younger members. Baroda has passed a law divesting caste councils of their disciplinary powers.

Bombay's Tribute to Bengal:—We called attention recently to the growing estrangement between Bengal and Bombay and the urgent need of responsible leaders coming forward to prevent it. We are glad that the Indian Merchants' Chamber of Bombay has taken the initiative. In the course of a statement they pay handsome tribute to the services of Bengal to the national cause.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, APRIL 7, 1934.

INDIA AND PALESTINE.

The All India Muslim League at its meetings held at Delhi passed a resolution strongly supporting the proposal of an influential deputation to wait on the Viceroy to lay before him a submission as to how the Balfour Declaration has conducted to the Jews of the world buying land and settling down in Palestine, disturbing the peace of the sacred land. The Council further resolves to sympathise with the Arabs of Palestine whole-heartedly and assures them of their heartfelt sympathies and support. The Palestine problem affects India closely and for that reason the course of British policy there is of interest to all sections of the Indian people. We recently quoted from the Memoirs of Mr. Lloyd George a passage showing how and why the Balfour Declaration came to be made. A German Jew who was Professor of Chemistry in Manchester University, at a critical period in the War invented a process which enabled Britain to manufacture ample quantities of acetone, a principal ingredient in the composition of high explosives. When Dr. Weizmann was told that the British Government would wish to recognise his valuable service by conferring on him some high honour, he declined and suggested that he would be pleased if something could be done to help the Zionist movement of which he was the leader. When Mr. Lloyd George became Prime Minister and the Peace Treaty was framed this was remembered and the Balfour Declaration was the result. That is how it is explained in Mr. Lloyd George's Memoirs. But doubtless there were other and deeper considerations such as the security of the Suez Canal behind this apparently casual decision. But it seems that neither the British Government nor the Zionists had any very clear idea of conditions in Palestine and of the implications of the Balfour Declaration when it was promulgated. Informed opinion in Britain did not approve of the Declaration. Mr. Asquith who visited Palestine in 1924 wrote from Jerusalem that the talk of making Palestine into a Jewish National Home seemed to him as fantastic as it always had done.

A vivid description of the conditions which the application of the Balfour Declaration has created in Palestine, is given in the form of a story in "De Vriendt Goes Home" by the German writer Arnold Zweige, an excellent English translation of which is published by Heinemann. The story has an interest of its own but here we are concerned only with its analysis of the forces at work in Palestine as a consequence of the Balfour Declaration. Almost at the outset, the author brings out the intimate bearing of the Palestine problem on Indian policy. The Chief of Police, a British officer, Irmin, who is absolutely fed up with his life in Palestine and is counting the days when his next leave falls due, devotes a spare moment to put in words to himself his estimate of the course of British policy in Palestine. "England was fighting for the possession of India, silently, without force, but with all the devices of age-long experience. The days in which an English General—at Amritsar for instance—could only disperse Hindu demonstrations by machine gun fire—such idiotic days, were, it was hoped, past. One must also give up scenting Bolsheviks and the hand of Moscow. If Mr. Ghandi and his Hindus wanted to withdraw from the British Empire, and go back to the days of the primitive spinning wheel, then a Moslem policy would have to be pursued all along the line. That was now being done, and their experts believed that they could secure the Moslems if they sacrificed the Zionists." The hero of the story, Professor De Vriendt, and a small group of orthodox Jews who came to Palestine with pious motives, are bitterly opposed to the Zionist immigrants whose objects are utterly materialistic. He and his group are anxious to come to friendly terms with the Arabs and have framed a formula for the purpose. They hate the Zionists as atheists and materialists and are hated by them in return as traitors and imbeciles. De Vriendt and his friends are planning a great gathering of Rabbis to be held in Vienna to repudiate the Zionist Agency as representative of the Jewish community.

The formula which they had drafted to be presented to the High Commissioner for his approval, offers the Arabs an alliance against the claims of the new Jewish atheists and their Agency and in support of Arab demand for guarantees for safeguarding their rights. In return, all that the orthodox Jews ask is unrestricted use of the Square and the Wailing Wall for their worshippers—the right of usage without any claim to ownership. Before approaching the High Commissioner, they approach the Arab leaders. The description of the Conference of the latter at which the matter was debated—if debate is a right name for an interchange of views mainly by a slight wave of hands or a raising of eyebrows—is described with much sympathy and insight. The elders are inclined to favour the idea of the alliance but do not wish to commit themselves prematurely. The Young Arabs at the Conference, however, would hear of no compromise. They are willing to tolerate De Vriendt and his group. But "the Government must give a binding assurance that the influence of the Zionists would be abolished, the immigration of further foreigners stopped, and the right of the Arab people to Palestine unconditionally recognised in a constitution. Away with this absurd and obsolete Balfour Declaration." Nothing came of this offer of an alliance between orthodox Jews and the Arabs. De Vriendt who had ignored warnings, in the firm belief that Zionists, with all their unorthodoxy, would not break the Commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," was murdered by one of their young bloods. The impression conveyed by the book is that practically every one including British administrators recognises that the Balfour Declaration was a mistake. But the mischief has been done and the modernisation and exploitation of Palestine can no longer be stopped. Incidentally, the author mentions that in 1902 Britain had offered to make Uganda a Jewish settlement. Herzl, the then Zionist leader, was inclined to accept but the Russian Jews would hear of no place but Palestine which they believed had been established for the Jew by God Himself. Some of the Zionists themselves wish they had accepted it. As one of them says:—"That would have been a much simpler job than this confounded Palestine, with a thousand and one conflicts between Arabs, Churches, Great Powers and Religions, not to mention our own Jewish jealousies."

BELIEF AND BEHAVIOUR.

The current Journal of Religions published by the University of Chicago contains some of the speeches read last summer on "Modern Trends in World Religions." The editor in an introductory note sums up the resulting impression as follows: "The addresses indicated that the leaders of the great religions are approaching a consensus as to the vital issues of living in the world of today, although the transformation of the traditional heritage into effective new forms varies according to whether the fundamentals are located in the realm of belief or behaviour." Strictly speaking the belief and the behaviour which are of account, are the belief which issues in behaviour and the behaviour which issues out of belief. There are many beliefs which do not show themselves in behaviour, and much behaviour which has no basis of belief. Belief is different from knowledge which admits of proof. Behaviour in the West has steadily tended to be based on knowledge. Beliefs have come to be regarded as personal matters which it would be wrong or at least eccentric to allow to influence behaviour. In the East the reverse is still the case. Europe reveres Jesus as a Prince of Peace and continues to prepare for war. America believes in the saying about the needle and the camel and proceeds to manufacture a needle with a large enough eye to let many camels pass comfortably through it and proclaims that the rich man's entrance to heaven is not only possible but also that it is certain. In India every year, during Bakri-Id, Hindus and Muslims kill each other because the former regards as sacred the cow which the latter regards as the most acceptable sacrifice to Allah. Riots have resulted from the shooting of pigeons near a temple or even the cutting down of a peepul tree; and early this week the papers published the news of a serious outbreak at Tiruvadi in South India in which a Magistrate and a Police Officer were murdered because they interfered to prevent a man from having a hook, with a chain attached, inserted in the small of his back as an act of propitiation to his deity. The West applauds the early Christians who courted and endured the most cruel tortures as acts of faith but is horrified at the self-infliction by Hindu ascetics of tortures like hook-swinging. It cannot even credit the victim with an unselfish motive. Professor James Pratt records in his "Religious Faiths of India" that he saw a yogi hanging head downwards over a roaring fire when he visited Allahabad during the Magh Mela. A missionary friend who was with him, charitably suggested that the sadhu was doing this for the sake of notoriety. The Professor reflects that even in India there should be much less uncomfortable ways of achieving notoriety. "Crucifixion of the flesh" as an aid to the spiritual life has degenerated into a pulpit phrase in Christianity. It is literally understood in India and a religious belief in this country is still liable to explode in behaviour which shocks the modern mind inured to regard religion as an innocuous side show. The Dnyanodaya, as we fully expected, has made capital out of the Tiruvadi incident as showing that Christianity alone can save India. But it would also, we hope, take note of the murder reported to have taken place in Bandra on Easter day in the course of an altercation between Christian friends, because one of them declined, on the ground that he had already had enough, the invitation of another to share the liquor which he had brought to celebrate the Ascension. What India needs, in not Christianity but Education. We reprint to-day from the Canadian Student an article on French Primary Schools by an English woman, who as the result of her many years' experience, expresses it as her opinion that notwithstanding that the great majority of French students had never read the Bible and no clergyman is admitted to schools, the morals of the French are not inferior to those of people educated in Christian schools in other countries.

Vivekananda Mission:—Mr. J. T. Whitty, member of the Executive Council, Bihar and Orissa, who is touring the earthquake stricken area, paid a surprise visit to the Vivekananda Mission relief camp with the District Magistrate and took great interest in the work of the Mission centre and inspected all the records in connection with the distribution of housing materials. Afterwards he talked at length with Babu Narendra Nath Sen, Director of the camp, on housing and medical relief. The Director explained to him that their principle was to build structures on old sites of poor men, using their own old materials as far as practicable to give immediate shelter, later on, with further help of material, labour and close inspection to improve huts into permanent ones. For this reason, at a very small cost they could build over thousand huts. This principle is being followed in cases of middle-class people, whom they are giving bungalows, 23 by 24 feet consisting of two bedrooms, one drawing room and one kitchen with a 12 inch brick built wall. Mr. Whitty saw plans of such houses under construction and approved of the mission's housing scheme.

THE UNITED STATES AND PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

Reuter's telegrams from the United States at the end of last month showed that the Philippine Independence Bill providing for the grant of independence within the next ten or twelve years, has been approved by the Congress and signed by President Roosevelt. The Bill is subject to the approval of the Philippine Legislature which must signify its acceptance of its terms by the 1st October 1934. The terms of the Bill have not been cabled to India. But a message from Washington dated March 19th mentioned that "the Bill was a revival of the Hawes-Cutting Bill with the important amendment that the United States should also relinquish its naval and military bases in the Philippine Islands." A study of the reactions to that Bill both in the U. S. A. and in the Islands, therefore, will not be without interest.

The question of Philippine Independence has been before the United States public since early in 1899 when the Senate passed a resolution declaring the intention of the United States to prepare the Philippines for Self-Government. The movement in favour of granting freedom attained national importance only in 1929. The agricultural States of America having failed in that year to secure the limitation of Philippine imports, a strenuous campaign for independence for the Islands was inaugurated as the only practical method of fighting competition, in the sugar industry as well as in dairy products. In this they won the support of those States along the Pacific coast which had been hard hit by the unrestricted immigration of Filipino labourers. The Hoover administration had declared itself clearly against this movement but the United States Congress was determined in 1932 to act on the issue. There were two measures under consideration: First, the Hare Bill in the House of Representatives and, second, the Hawes-Cutting Bill in the Senate. Both contained several provisions in common. They contemplated, for instance, restrictions on Philippine immigration to the United States and strict control of the amount of duty-free imports, and both the bills favoured the reservation of certain powers to the United States. The Hare Bill, however, provided for the grant of Independence automatically at the end of eight years and the Hawes-Cutting Bill favoured a plebiscite on the issue after fifteen years. The Hare Bill was adopted by the House of Representatives exactly two years ago. But decision on the Hawes-Cutting Bill was postponed to December 1932, when the Senate adopted it in an amended form. The provision for a plebiscite was abolished and the transition period was reduced from fifteen to twelve years. Yet it differed materially from the Hare Bill passed by the House of Representatives nine months earlier, and a compromise bill with the transition period fixed at ten years was adopted by both Houses in January 1933. It then went up to President Hoover who returned it with a veto based on three grounds: the shortness of the period for economic adjustment to independence, the responsibility without authority which would devolve on the United States during the transition period, and the incongruous status which the Philippines would have in its relations with the Far East. The veto was overruled both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and on 17th January 17th, 1933, the Hawes Cutting Bill became law and the Philippine Islands were asked to signify their acceptance of the bill within a year. American opinion was sharply divided on the issue. Apart from the men who advocated the grant of Independence for business reasons, there were two parties. One regarding the measure to be a dangerous innovation and the other demanding that the Independence granted should be less hedged in with reservations. Both disliked the Hawes-Cutting Bill, but both were in a minority.

The Philippine Legislature had already made its views known in August 1932 in a resolution declaring that the transitional period should be not more than ten years, that there should be no plebiscite at the end of that period, that during it the Islands Government should enjoy absolute autonomy, that in any restrictions on either trade or immigration there should be complete reciprocity, that no naval or military bases should be retained by the United States after the grant of independence. When the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Bill was adopted by the U. S. Congress, Philippine leaders made clear their opposition to the measure on the ground that the provisions relating to trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands would seriously imperil the economic, social and political institutions of the country and that the reservations regarding the military and naval bases were inconsistent with true independence. A deputation was sent to the United States to influence the President and the Congress for modifications of the Act, which has not been entirely unsuccessful in its mission, as even the meagre cables received here reveal.

Senator Quezon, leader of the most important political party in the Philippine Islands, who also heads the deputation to the United States President and Congress, has openly declared that the present regime is more favourable to the Islands and the aspirations of his people than the transition period contemplated by the Hawes-Cutting Act would be. Objections have been urged against the rights retained by the President under the Act on the ground that the broad scope of his special powers constitute a serious whittling down of all Philippine autonomy during the ten years transitional period. But even more serious have been the objections raised against the various trade provisions of the Independence Act. The Philippine market in the United States will be seriously curtailed by the limitations on sugar, coconut-oil, and cordage; their exports to the United States which amount to roughly 88 per cent of the total export trade, are to be taxed in the last five years of the transition period. But imports from the United States are to be untaxed and unrestricted. The Philippine Islands has a favourable balance of trade of $ 32,000,000. With the United States, the Islands has a favourable balance of $ 64,000,000. Her trade with other countries shows a balance of $ 82,000,000 against her. Philippine leaders urge that if the Islands are to be cut off from free trade, they must have the opportunity to reconstruct their industries and develop new markets. The export tax of the last five years of the transition period will produce not only a decline in exports but even a reduction in Government revenues with all the accompanying economic troubles.

On March 2, President Roosevelt recommended the Congress to revive the Independence Bill with the advice that "it will be injustice and little short of the denial of independence itself to grant independence without sufficient time for the necessary political and economic adjustments." The Bill was revived in the House of Representatives with an amendment relinquishing the United States naval and military bases in the Islands after the declaration of independence, and it was adopted by that House on March 19. The Senate followed suit and the President's sanction was obtained a few days later. The issue now rests with the Filipinos. Of realp the five objections raised against the provisions of the Hawes-Cutting Act, three have been met by the Roosevelt administration—the duration of the transition period, abolition of the plebiscite provision, and the relinquishment of the naval and military bases. On the remaining two points Reuter is silent but the tone of Mr. Roosevelt's message to the Congress seems to indicate that there also attempts have been made to meet the wishes of the Filipinos. President Roosevelt's Cuban policy of co-operating in the economic restoration of that State will itself necessitate a readjustment of Philippine economics since Cuba's main industry is also sugar and she is to be allotted a quota in the United States' imports. If Independence is to be real and not an 'injustice', the Philippines should be free to reconstruct their industrial life and develop new markets. The fact that Mr. Roosevelt recognises the responsibility of the United States for the economic welfare of Cuba goes far to prove to the Filipinos that the same consideration will be meted out to the Islands after the declaration of Independence.

CHRISTIAN MASS MOVEMENTS IN INDIA.

(BY BISHOP FREDERICK B. FISHER.)

Here is solid collateral on "Re-thinking-Missions." Dr. Pickett, in "Christian Mass Movements in India. A study with Recommendations," has given us an experimental approach to the study of India's baffling problem of peasant poverty and untouchability. The book gives abundant evidence of painstaking investigation, personal experience in the field, extensive travel, and, perhaps, unfortunately, large expenditures of money. Back of the author and his associates there must have been some Board, or Committee, or Corporation with lavish financial resources. This inevitably affects the tone of the survey and the character of the findings. It is manifestly a study with a purpose fixed in advance and leading to apologetics or argument.

However, in spite of this handicap there are passages here and there which transcend the ex-parte approach. The recommendations are statesmanlike and in line with modern thought in missionary administration. They lack prophetic imagination, being conceived in caution and expressed with timidity. Three stand out clearly

1. That denominational missionary societies co-ordinate their activities and transfer to each other certain fields and phases of work and that overlapping and competition be eliminated, ignoring sect emphasis and co-operating in united Christian service. This supports the stand taken by the Laymen's Inquiry on "Re-thinking Missions."

2. A larger use of Indian leadership. This item needs elaboration and a wholesome change in psychological attitude. To say that there should be a larger use of Indian leadership proves, by the very wording, that the author still clings, even if unconsciously, to the idea that these missionary movements are to be directed by foreigners, assisted by an increasing body of Indians. It would be better to boldly go the whole length of the way and show that these movements will become truly dynamic only when Indians passionately press forward into complete control—using under their own initiative only such foreign assistance, in personnel or money, as their own ingenuity inspires.

3. Experimentation and further survey. Dr. Pickett has but opened up the mine. He has been courageous in prospecting and industrious in spade work. His book reveals his own sincere discovery that the problem is too complex in its relationship to Hindu society and history to be dealt with in an introductory survey conducted under missionary auspices. The next step ought to be a co-operative study under the leadership of modern Hindu idealists and patriots who have caught Mahatma Gandhi's vision of social reconstruction. Would that they might have the same generous financial backing.

The presentation of the Hindu background of history is neither scientific nor philosophic. This material might well have been eliminated if it could not have been more fully developed. It is full of half-truths which will make it impossible for the book to gain the support of enlightened Hindus. Of course, there are those who would say that such support is unnecessary. But, are we not moving rapidly into a range of religious fellowship where the demand now made for inter-Christian co-ordination will be extended to include the great non-Christian movements? Out in that realm this study, excellent as it is for missionary purposes, will prove to be inadequate and, at certain points, even irritating—for instance in the constant use of the term conversion. There are sections of the book where the words convert, conversion, converted, etc., appear a dozen times on a single page. Conversion and proselytism are terms that need careful definition or they confuse the issue.

In this connection, I might point out that Dr. Pickett treats trenchantly certain differences between what he calls mass conversion and individual conversion. Specific instances are cited to prove that the outcaste masses adhere tenaciously to their new Christian profession, while in most cases the cultivated educated, high caste individual sooner or later becomes an apostate. Sad reflection! If true, it proves too much; it overshoots the mark; showing the inadequacy of the spiritual Christ to hold the enlightened individual, and on the other hand the power of a non-Christian social order to support the untutored peasant. If it is admitted, as it should be, that the animistic and primitive social restraints of the village should not be destroyed but carried over, where useful, into the enlarging Christian culture, how much more should we trust the social inheritance of the more privileged groups and individuals.

At this point our missionary method must undergo a vital change. Our task is to become sympathetically acquainted with the background of life and thought in the countries we seek to serve, and then realistically accept the facts as they are and build upon them. The demand of the missionaries in India for a vocal profession of conversion, submission to baptism, and a break with old associations—must give place to a more liberal and humble attitude.

I wish this study might lead to a co-operative social movement in India on a truly national scale, transcending not only denominational Christian lines, but even religious and race distinctions. We blame the Hindus for caste, but overlook the beam of bigotry in our own eyes. The problem of the outcastes inheres in poverty, illiteracy, superstition, unsanitation and an inherited sense of inferiority. The solution does not lie in transferring the masses from one religious organism to another. It lies in the conversion of his surroundings and the inner awakening of his own life. We can trust the Christian results to the future, if, without thought of organizational prestige or conquests, the Christian churches, Hindu societies, Moslem groups, government agencies, and Indian philanthropists will unselfishly merge their efforts in a national determination to correct these age-old disabilities.

Fortunately the movement has already begun out in wider ranges of Indian life. Streams of social awakening are rising in every section of the land. They can be made to flow together by men and women of goodwill.

The book now under review was prepared with two constituencies in mind. It was initiated and prepared by and for these two: (1) The supporting churches in America and Europe, and (2) The foreign missionary leaders in India. Within this scope, it is the most significant and commendable work yet attempted. These constituencies should study it widely and seriously.

The better, greater, more essential study is yet to come—a scientific, dynamic, compelling analysis of the depressed areas of Indian life by and for the awakened groups in modern India herself, without distinction of creed or race. It Waskom Pickett's book leads to that, he will have come to the kingdom for such a time as this.

THE KANGRI GURUKULA AT HARDWAR.

(By WILMOT A. PERERA.)

[The Gurukula University, Kangri, celebrated its 32nd anniversary during the Easter Holidays commencing from the 30th of March, 1934. Mr. Wilmot A. Perera wrote the above from Ceylon after paying a visit to the Gurukula University.]

Santi Niketan and the Gurukula are the two outstanding experiments of National Education in India.

The Gurukula is not known enough, since it lacks association with a world-personality as Rabindranath Tagore.

Situated at Kangri in Hardwar, at the foot of Kasia Hills with the snow-capped Himalayas rising in their majestic glory behind and close to the spot where the Ganges begins its fertilizing career, it provides an inspiring background for expressing the finest in man which can only be best developed in intimate association with mute nature.

To Swami Shradhdhand, a pupil of Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of the Arya Samaj, is due the conception of re-building the Aryan educational system. It was with this idea that the Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College was started in 1865. Seventy-six years later, a difference of opinion arose among the members of the Samaj as to whether the English or the Vedas should occupy the chief place in the school curriculum. Those who believed in the vedic ideal headed by Munshi Ram founded the Gurukula in 1902.

The Gurukula embodies in it the Aryan ideals of educating the young. When a student enters its portals between the ages of 6 and 8, he belongs to the Kula, the household of his Guru. At the Upanayam or ordination ceremony the teacher accepts the pupil as his own. Henceforward, for fourteen years he lives under the constant care of his Acharya. The chief trait of Gurukula life is the personal relation of the teacher and the taught.

Education is but the building up of character and expression of life. "Religion-ridden" India's message to humanity has always been service to one's fellow beings. It has been the dynamic of her culture from Vedic times to the present day. Any institution which has for its object the diffusion of learning in harmony with national characteristics must vigorously embrace that ideal. Service permeates every action of the Gurukula Brahmacharya.

The germ of Vedic culture, manifest in Aryan civilization, is its spiritual outlook on life. The Gurukula Scholar is presented with the interpretation of satisfying the spiritual yearning of man through a systematic study of the Vedas and Sanskrit Classics in an atmosphere surcharged with ancient traditions, modes of living and patterns of thought. But blind faith or irrational adherence to ancient usage is not fostered. Modern sciences and philosophy are taught and the students are trained to exercise their critical and analytical faculties in the pursuit of their studies. There is a chair of Comparative Religion.

Adhering to the correct concept of teaching—where originality is helped and development of thought awakened—all instruction is imparted in the vernacular. Hindi is the medium employed in teaching all subjects including physics and chemistry, higher mathematics, Western philosophy, political economy and allied sciences.

The daily routine of the institution furnishes an insight into the ideals that guide it. The rising gong is sounded at 4 a. m. for all, except for the youngest children who are given an hour's longer sleep. Half-an-hour is next devoted to dumb-bell exercise and other exercises after which a bath is taken into the crystal-clear icy water of the Ganges. Then follows the morning worship Sandhya, the mental repetition of a number of Sanskrit verses. At the conclusion of Sandhya, the occupants of each room gather around a small brazier in which are placed finely split wood. Clarified butter is poured over and ignited. The fire is maintained by continued libations and additions of fuel. At intervals, sugar, fragrant herbs and spices are thrown into the flames, while Sanskrit verses are recited by the group in unison. This is called the Agnihotra and is regarded not only as an act of worship but a sanitary measure, the fumes having distinct sanitary properties. A little light food is distributed after which two hours of study follows. At 8-45 the morning meal consisting of wheat chappaties, dal, vegetable, and curd is served in the open courtyard of the kitchen, every one being seated on the ground in Yogi fashion. Before food is taken, a Vedic Mantra is recited.

Regular participation in games is required of all the pupils. Physical instruction is a prominent feature of the Gurukula system of education. In the primary classes, a period every day is set apart for spinning on the takli. Every inmate is clad in home-spun clothes. The Indian Tri-colour at full mast and to be seen from every point of the University is the symbol that instils an urge to serve the motherland.

The education system of a country inevitably expresses the country's conception of that synthesis of which the lives of its peoples form a part. Fortunately for India, in institutions like the Gurukula, the perception is there that the mind behind the method is the fundamental with which education has to deal. It is this which has sustained the Indian genius from destruction, which has kept aglow the torch of higher learning amidst the crumbling of dynasties and the changes of society.

The ancient system of education in our own country never neglected the culture and development of the mind itself. It always stressed the responsibility of the individual to society. Therein lay our greatness in the past. It has been well stated that the "reconstitution of a nation has to begin with its ideals."

We want a new ideology in this country, especially as regards education.

Race Cult and Marriages:—The recent judgment of the Karlsruhe Court, granting divorce to a German merely because his wife is a Jewess will not be the general practice, according to the Prussian Minister of Justice, who announces that marriages of Aryans and non-Aryans will henceforth be dissolved only on the usual divorce grounds.

realpatidar: EDUCATION IN SOVIET RUSSIA.*

In 1904, the percentage of school-going population was three in Russia, as contrasted with twenty-three in the U. S. A., nineteen in Germany and sixteen in France and England. A few free schools imparted instruction in religion and in the three R's but attendance was never compulsory. The major part of the time was devoted to the teaching of orthodox religion. Every teacher had to take charge of fifty to ninety children! The control and inspection of a suspicious bureaucracy was so thorough that it crushed out of the system everything that had the possibility of enlightening the people.

Educational change follows in the foot-steps of a political change. The United States, after their separation from England, started on a new experiment of democratic education. When the monarchy collapsed and a new form of Government was set up in Germany, the old educational system was overhauled. The recent National Socialist regime in Germany is ushering in drastic changes in the educational programme. The same is true of Fascist Italy. In Russia, the political change of 1917 was followed by a change on all fronts, including education. In no other country has the cultural change been so thorough-going as in the Soviet Union.

The Russian leaders were faced with the task of uplifting a hundred and fifty million people, kept in illiteracy, ignorance, and poverty, for centuries. At least a century more would have been required to teach these people to read and write through the process of a normal cultural evolution. The Russians wanted an instrument that would bring about a speedy transformation in society. They took hold of education as a means of social uplift. The development of the Soviet educational machinery with all its variety and immensity, is simply unparalleled in the history of human culture. Many countries have used education as an instrument to achieve national ideals, but no one has been so logical, so definite, and so thorough in the application of this principle to a conscious social purpose.

The political change in Russia had established a new social order. To insure the life of this new society, the leaders wanted to educate the proletariat in its underlying philosophy. Keen students of the history of radical changes all over the world, the Russians wanted to avoid the errors committed by their leaders. Most of these changes have been followed by reactions, because the common people were never thoroughly initiated into the principles of the new social changes. To avoid that mistake, the Soviet leaders have been very quick in taking hold of the educational machinery and moulding it in favour of the new ideals. Education in Russia is something more than learning the three R's and the other subjects of the school curriculum.

During the Tsarist regime, the workers and farmers had little opportunity for education. When, therefore, the champions of the proletariat came into power, the gates of learning were thrown wide open to the masses of workers and peasants. The emancipation of the people from illiteracy became an important item in the programme of the new regime. On December 26, 1919, Lenin signed the decree ordering the liquidation of illiteracy in all the states of the Soviet Union. For a nation which has to liquidate the illiteracy of more than three hundred million people, the recent educational activity in Russia is worth careful perusal.

It is important to note that the movement now called "Down with Illiteracy," is carried on mostly by voluntary agencies backed up and encouraged by the State. It is the work of the party in power and its branches throughout the country. The personnel of the movement is organised on the basis of free service by the youths and members of the party. At the head of the whole organisation is the Supreme Council to plan and direct the movement. Below this are the Provincial Councils and the Regional Councils to carry on the policies and programmes laid down by the Supreme Council. To attend to the details of the movement the Supreme Council is organized into various departments:

- (1) Department for organizing Schools
- (2) Department of Study and Curricula
- (3) Department for mass Activities
- (4) Finance Department
- (5) Planning Department.

All the Provincial Councils have similar departments or brigades.

The local councils start their work by finding out the extent of illiteracy in their area. Public opinion is then organized in favour of carrying on literacy activities there. Both literate and illiterate persons participate in the movement. Units or Clubs are established in factories, in workshops, on the farms, in the army, or wherever it is possible to gather a few persons anxious to learn. To start a unit, it is enough to have at least three members. There are a number of people who are half literate or who have lapsed into illiteracy. Once out of the school, they had no occasion to use their training for a number of years. These people now attend the literacy centres.

The whole movement is self supporting. All the members pay a certain amount of regular subscription. Factories and other organizations give contributions. The subscriptions and contributions of the members are sufficient to buy educational materials and to defray the small expenditure of the local establishments.

The sincerity and enthusiasm of the movement is shown by its symbolism. Buttons and insignia of various types are given to the workers of this cultural enterprise. The dynamic force of the activity is shown by the military terminology borrowed for a peaceful propaganda. The departments of the District Councils are called 'brigades' and the voluntary teachers are called the 'Cultural Army'.

I visited some of the centres where this work is carried on, and there found persons of all ages, men and women. The directing and organizing work is generally undertaken by elderly persons and the responsibility of teaching is accepted by the Komsomols. This is an organization of the party for young people of the age of thirteen to twenty-four. These youths attend to their school or college work during the day, and devote their evening time to social work, literacy being the main item at present. While I was in Moscow last October, I visited a Secondary School by day. Curious to know what these young people did in the evening, I again visited the school at night and found the building alive with human beings. In one of the classes, I saw about fifty boys and girls, about the age of fourteen to eighteen. One of the boys was in the chair and two or three others were making some impressive arguments. The Russian language seems especially fitted for fluent speech! A teacher was sitting at the back among the boys and girls, but he did not say a word. The guide explained to me the proceedings of the meeting. The boys and girls were working to promote literacy in their district. The work was not progressing satisfactorily. So the pupils were trying to find out ways by which they could discharge their social responsibility more efficiently.

These are the people that are helping to liquidate the illiteracy of the backward and ignorant masses of Russia. Sometimes, these young teachers are physically so small for their work, that they have to take a chair under their feet to reach the black-board and write letters for their grown-up pupils. It is funny, but unique for its sincerity. To conduct literacy circles, voluntary teachers ought to have necessary qualifications. They must have had at least four years of schooling to teach the first stage adult students and seven years of previous education to teach classes of second stage literacy. Teachers have to pass also through training courses that give them some elements of pedagogy and teaching methods.

The age of students learning at these centres of literacy ranges all the way from sixteen to fifty. In the beginning they are very pessimistic about their ability to learn at this age. As the veil of mystery over the letters is lifted up, they grow more and more confident. No fees are charged, and even books are supplied free. Owing to the greater percentage of illiteracy among women, most of the work is done among them. When mothers cannot go out of their houses, social nurses visit them at home to give the necessary training.

Eighteen months is the minimum time required to make a person literate with nine to eleven hours of work per week. The New Russian week has only six days.

Students have to pass through two stages before getting the certificate of literacy. The first stage is reached after nine months when the adult student finishes the two years work of children. A test is given in simple reading and elementary arithmetic. The second stage comes after eighteen months when the student has finished the four years curriculum of the elementary school. He is given a second test in fluent reading, grammar, arithmetic, history and geography. But the Soviet conception of literacy does not stop with reading, writing and arithmetic. In Russia education is nothing if it is not accompanied with a social ideology. The definition of adult literacy is given by M. Kaliniki, Chairman of the Down with Illiteracy Society:

"Under the present conditions, to wipe out illiteracy does not only mean to teach people to read and write, but it is necessary to make them understand what they have read, to teach them to digest the printed matter in their heads, to make a man politically literate, to create a new man. You cannot now teach without creating new men."

The force of this statement will be realized when it is known that the text-books for adult education deal with contemporary social, political, and economic problems, and socialistic ideas. The apathy and indifference of the masses towards learning is the greatest difficulty in such a movement, especially in India. Russia overcomes this obstacle by creating an environment whereby the farmers and the workers feel that some valuable experiences are awaiting them when they learn to read and write. To stimulate the desire for learning various programmes are organized in addition to the regular classes. There are excursions to local museums, moving libraries, discussions, and the famous Russian wall newspaper which is practically a feature of every organisation.

One is apt to become suspicious about the success of an organization which rests mostly on voluntary efforts. The figures showing the rapid fall in the percentage of illiteracy during the last fifteen years will speak for themselves.

Year.	Percentage of literacy.
1926	52.8
1931	73.6

The special schools for the wiping out of illiteracy have been so popular that in ten years the number of students has more than trebled.

Year.	Number of Pupils in special schools.
1921-22	456,000
1931-32	13,631,000

Even these figures seem cold testimony to the growing literacy in Russia when one sees the living evidence of an intellectual awakening among the people. Coming through Europe and walking through the streets of Moscow and Leningrad, I was struck by the number of book-shops along the streets, all crowded with young and old people. The output of literature in Russia is tremendous because the number of readers is rapidly increasing. There is no fear that these people will revert back into illiteracy. Their interest in reading is constantly kept fresh by the publication of literature on living problems affecting the farm, the factory and the army. The publication of the wall newspaper is also a great stimulus for reading and writing. I wanted to test the reality of this advertised literacy. Armed with a Russian dictionary, I walked through the streets of cities. When in difficulty, I showed the Russian printed word to question any person who came across. During my short experience, I did not meet a person who could not read. There is not the slightest doubt that literacy has rapidly spread in Russia. The Soviet leaders are confident that illiteracy will be completely wiped out of the country during the next few years. Dr. Chatsky, one of the leaders of Soviet education, said to me with the conviction of experience, "In five years our country will be one of the most educated countries."

Literacy is an instrument for building up a common ideology among people to hold them together for a common purpose. The printed word is a powerful means of communication in the twentieth century, but ninety-two per cent of India's people are still unable to make use of it for their enlightenment. The farmers and workers of Western countries are raising up their educational level. This is bound to affect the modes of material production and the standards of life. Can the illiterate farmers and workers of India stand competition with them? To make the whole Indian population literate would take more than two generations even through the immediate introduction of free and compulsory education. To accomplish the same task in a single generation, it must be organized as a mass movement. If the call comes from the right direction, the spirit of voluntary effort and youthful enthusiasm are present in India.

Fascists Bound over in Britain—Nineteen of his followers gave Sir Oswald Mosley the Fascist salute from the dock at Old Bailey before pleading guilty to a charge of conspiring to effect public mischief, in obstructing the removal of livestock lawfully impounded in distraint for tithe at a farm in Suffolk in February. All the accused were bound over to keep the peace for two years. Two of the ring-leaders were ordered to pay the costs of prosecution. All promised to the Judge not to interfere with the course of justice again.

THE FRENCH VIEW OF RELIGIOUS NEUTRALITY.

Miss Eleanor Reid, student at McGill University, writes in Canadian Student :—

There was one discovery which came as a distinct shock to me during my year in France. I had known many people who professed no religion and held Christianity in scorn. But all these had been given some religious training in their youth, whether Christian—Protestant or Catholic,—or Jewish. Since my Mission Band days I had been aware also that, "There are many thousands who have never heard His name," and who worship idols and are very uncivilized people. This idea had later been altered to conceive of these people as of a civilization and culture very different from ours, and hence of a quite different religious background.

But last year I found some new friends, people whom I came to admire as much as any I had ever known, among well-educated people of Western civilization and culture, like myself, who not only did not believe in Christianity, but had never, even in childhood, been instructed in any religious faith. No doubt I had known before that such existed; but I had never realized the fact with all the force with which it was revealed to me in France. What is more, it was these people, as opposed to the Christians (Roman Catholics) of the community, who held the same ideals as I in the fields of social justice and international peace and co-operation.

I spent the year in a provincial Girls' Normal School, as English Assistant, teaching girls aged 16 to 20, who were being trained to teach in the rural primary schools. My first surprise came at seeing no more than five or six girls of the sixty odd in the schools go out to Mass on Sunday morning; at learning that very few if any had ever read the Bible; and at other such instances which quickly showed me that only a very small proportion of the students had any of the background that either a Roman Catholic or a Protestant upbringing would have given them.

As time went on, and I took part in many of the activities of the school, followed the courses in Education given by the Directrice, and observed the play of group antagonisms in the town, I became increasingly aware of the situation illustrated by this fact which had come to my attention. It was well characterized by the educational system, which I was naturally in a very good position to observe.

The striking characteristic of the French education is its division into two distinct systems, designated by the terms primary and secondary. The secondary system is carried over from the traditional educational set-up, that is, probably, from the institutions of the Revolution and Napoleon I; the important thing being that it was never intended as education for the masses. The system of primary schools, on the other hand, is the outcome of the struggle on the part of the working and peasant classes—"le peuple"—for education that should be free and compulsory for all, and, as a logical corollary, politically and religiously neutral.

This last provision took on colour from the situation especially prevalent in France, where practically all education had been carried on by the Catholic Church for centuries, except for the occasional breaks caused by the revolutions of the hundred years preceding the enactment of the present education laws. Religious neutrality had to fight a bitter battle to become law, and consequently took on more and more positive elements as its proponents added to their ammunition of logic and moral support.

The history of a word will illustrate this evolution. The system established was that of the "Ecole laïque", which would be translated as the non-religious or secular school. In the course of the last half-century, this word "laïque" has taken on a meaning which I find it impossible to translate by any single word in English, since it now expresses something in the nature of a new religion or system of morals which has been developed by the defendants of this feature of the new educational system. So prolonged and vigorous and bitter has been the opposition that those who uphold the system have been led further and further to realise and formulate the idealism which lies behind their efforts.

And so I saw it manifested; in the Directrice, a woman of some forty years' experience in education, a fine teacher, a person of high principles and ideals, devoted heart, soul, and reason to the cause "laïque"; in my friend S—, a young teacher with all the idealism of youth, founded on a conception of life which will support that idealism at a high pitch for a long time to come; in the normal students, who in their three years under the influence of such a person as the Directrice could not fail to imbibe that pressing sense of mission which is an essential part of the "morale laïque."

For that is the name of what may in a sense be called the new religion, growing out of the 19th century "reformation" in France. The principles of the "morale laïque" have their prescribed place in the programme of studies to be taught in the primary schools. It was really a moving experience to listen to the Directrice, whose last teaching year it was, lecture for the last time on a subject so close to her heart as this one, on which she had expended a great part of her energy during her life as a teacher. When I expressed my interest in the subject to her later, she explained to me that she had had to be very careful in speaking of this matter to the girls, for the problem was to make sufficiently clear the teacher's high responsibility, both negative and positive, in the "enseignement laïque", without hurting or arousing the antagonism of the few "croyantes" in the class.

Set forth as they were in the very rational and logical style characteristic of French teaching, I think extracts from my notes on these lectures can best explain the position taken by the "laïque."

On the religious neutrality of the schools.

I. The primary public school in France is neutral as to religious confession; this means,

1. It teaches no religion.
2. It does not have prayers repeated or catechism learned.
3. The school can have no religious emblem.
4. Entrance to the school is forbidden the clergy of any religion.
5. The teacher may not hold any religious function such as chorist, bell-ringer, or churchwarden.
6. The primary public school teaches "la morale laïque."

7. The school is closed one day per week—Thursday—to enable the children to receive religious education. In boarding schools the pupils receive all facilities for fulfilling their religious duties according to the wishes of their families. Pupils who are taking their first communion have leave of absence during the week of retirement which precedes the ceremony.

II. The reasons for this school neutrality.

1. France is a country in which several religions are practised, and where a very great number of people reduce religion to a few solemn acts (baptism, first communion, marriage, funeral) and expect in the ordinary course of life to keep their independence of thought with regard to the clergy. The French mind, very rational and not very mystical, tends to make of religion a question purely personal, and will not see it put into the category of social or civic duties. This is the French sense of liberty of conscience and creed.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

2. On the other hand, since the law of March 18 1882, imposes compulsory education from six to thirteen years, it follows that the public school should receive all children no matter what their religion. The children and teacher must enjoy liberty of conscience and creed, this being the basis of our constitution.

III. The "laïcization" of the school is not an accidental fact in history.

Sociology teaches us that little by little in the course of the centuries all social activities have detached themselves from religion. The course of the history of France has been one of progressive secularization—of the State, of justice, of science, of civic acts, of administrative services. Our kings of France have actively fought all through the centuries to free their authority from that of the clergy. The secularization of the school is one phase of this struggle, and the last phase.

The modern State sets for itself aims that are "laïques," not mystical. It operates in another sphere than religion. In addition, the State of our day no longer believes in the necessity of religious beliefs to ensure morality. Such are the reasons for which the French State has willed the "école laïque."

IV. The "école laïque" teaches "la morale laïque." All education should include an ethical teaching; that is, the teaching of moral principles must be united with the formation of habits and moral sentiments.

1. Can these moral principles be found outside of religion?

The "morale laïque" asserts and realizes that they can. The principles which it teaches are those which inspire all decent civilized people, whatever their country, opinions, beliefs. They are the moral principles taught by all religions and all philosophies.

These principles are the moral foundation of the conscience of humanity.

2. Have these principles a solid base outside religious beliefs?

Instead of founding morality on a miraculous revelation (of which every religion makes a monopoly for itself), the "morale laïque" is founded on human experience pursued through the centuries, through struggles, difficulties and errors. For a rational mind, this origin is as respectable as that of religious revelation.....

.....The "morale laïque" has an ideal; it dreams of making life better for all men; it wants to see peace reign, science progress, intelligence be cultivated; it maintains that life is good, and that by the united efforts of all men of goodwill, it could be better. The "morale laïque" does not make a good man hope for any ultra-terrestrial reward; it teaches him to find a reward in the knowledge that he can do good on this earth.

There follows an analysis of the "esprit laïque," as opposed to the confessionalist and the dogmatic mind. It is described as, (1) the spirit of free examination, the right to think for oneself, to examine all affirmations, all judgments, in whatever matter it may be, provided it is done with the desire of finding the truth, admitting as limits to its investigations only the limits of human intelligence; (2) the spirit of broad tolerance, or rather, of respect for the beliefs and opinions of others; and (3) love of life and faith in human reason, which does not mean unreserved admiration of reason, but means confidence in the perfectibility of man.

Such is the position of this great body of free-thinkers in France. As I came to understand it, I felt that it challenged in no small way our position as Christians, both with regard to our educational system, and, in its wider implications, the very essentials of the Christian religion.

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

The Disarmament Conference is to resume its meetings in Geneva on April 10. This decision was taken by the President, the Right Honourable Arthur Henderson, M. P. in consultation with the officers of the Conference—namely, M. Politis, Vice-President, M. Benés, Rapporteur-General, the Secretary-General of the League and the Director of the Disarmament Section of the Secretariat—at a meeting held in London in the middle of February.

It will be remembered that the General Commission of the Conference decided, at the end of November, to give certain great Powers an opportunity of attempting to negotiate an agreement that would prepare the way for a second reading of the text of the Convention. A previous attempt to reach such an agreement had broken down on October 14th with the withdrawal of Germany from the Conference and the League. The German Government made no accusation against the Conference or the League, but stated that its attitude was due to the unwillingness of the heavily-armed great Powers to disarm. This view was not accepted by the Powers concerned.

In the course of the negotiations, the standpoints of the French, German and Italian Governments have been embodied in memoranda. The British Government also published a memorandum which was intended as an attempt to find a measure of agreement between the views of the other Powers; The Lord Privy Seal, Mr. Eden, thereupon undertook a journey to Paris, Berlin and Rome, to explain the meaning of the British proposals and to ascertain exactly what was in the minds of the other Governments.

At a meeting in January, the president, in consultation with the officers of the Conference, invited the Governments concerned to inform him of the progress made in their negotiations by February 10th, in order to allow him to discuss the situation at a meeting of the officers of the Conference on February 13th, with a view to fixing the date for the resumption of the labours of the Conference.

In the light of the replies received from the British, French and Italian Governments, the officers of the Conference considered, at their February meeting, that the necessary measure of agreement had not been secured, but that a further effort should be made to secure a Disarmament Convention, and an opportunity should be afforded for this effort, notably for the new phase of the negotiations, including Mr. Eden's journey.

In order to allow time for this further effort and for any other steps that might arise out of it, they fixed the date for the meeting of the Bureau at April 10th, with the understanding that, if there were any considerable change in the situation or if he were so requested by one or more of the Powers concerned, the President might summon the Bureau at an earlier date.

The primary function of the Bureau is to prepare for the meeting of the General Commission and to fix the date for that meeting. All the members of the Conference are represented in the General Commission, which will have to decide on the whole future of the Conference and the cause of disarmament in the light of the results of the negotiations undertaken by the heavily-armed Powers.

BUDDHISM IN AMERICA.*

(BY RIGON SHAKU.)

Some thirty years ago, the first organized Buddhist missionary work in America was undertaken by the cathedral temple of the Honpa Hongwanji Buddhist Sect of Kyoto, Japan. Practically all of the Japanese colonies in America were (and are) almost solidly Buddhist and it was felt that some effort must be made to provide these emigrants and their children with proper religious instruction and ministrations. To that end several well qualified young priests were sent to the Hawaiian Islands and to California where they were most heartily welcomed by their co-religionists. Within a very short time there had sprung up temples in practically every large city on the Pacific slope of America and it was necessary to send to Japan for more priests. In America (exclusive of Canada, Mexico, and Hawaii) there are now sixty-four priests and ninety-five thousand communicants, of which number about one thousand two hundred are white Americans. There are three American priests, ten American lay preachers, and three American candidates for priestly orders.

A systematic missionary campaign is being carried out. The movement in America has been, from the very first, a movement of action. The number of adherents to Buddhism increases uninterruptedly and new centres are founded from time to time and provided with capable lecturers; with well organized and systematic instruction for children; with competent teachers of adult study groups and with books and publications sold at cost.

The young people of the Sangha are organized into numerous Young Men's Buddhist Associations for older boys, Buddhist Boy Scouts for younger boys; the Young Women's Buddhist Associations for older girls and the Lotus Blossom Society for younger girls. Many of the temples have Mothers' Club and free kindergartens where the babies of working women are cared for during the day. To this list of associations may also be added many athletic clubs, choral societies, student alliances and charity organizations. The result of all these activities is an ever increasing loyalty to Buddhism and an ever growing interest in its teachings.

The fact that Buddhism in America numbers in its ranks representatives of every school of thought in Buddhism renders it necessary for the established temples to be rather non-sectarian in character. While all of the temples are of the Mahayana division of the Sangha, still many followers of the Theravada find a very helpful fellowship therein, coupled with the assurance that acceptance of rigid dogma is required of no one. It would be difficult to find anywhere such spiritual freedom as exists in the various Buddhist Circles in America.

There are now a total of forty-eight temples in America in very nearly all of which English services are held at regular intervals. Many of these temples are magnificent structures of stone and reinforced concrete and shelter all their many activities under one roof. The larger and more prosperous temples support branch shrines and preaching stations, also Sunday school facilities for rural groups of children and for other isolated groups.

With the passing of the older generation of the Japanese the English language is coming more into general use in the temple services. Within the coming fifteen years English will be universally used in all our temples. Many of the younger Japanese have little or no knowledge of the language of their parents. Several years ago it became necessary to make the various publications of the Sangha in America all bi-lingual, for the benefit of the younger generation and for the many Americans who have adopted Buddhism. Now many of our publications are entirely in English.

The general feeling is that Buddhism has a great future in the New World. Certain it is that America is rapidly casting off her old religion and is earnestly seeking Truth. Of all the great world religions Buddhism alone has spotless garments and a clean record. It is the writer's belief that these facts when connected, will justify him in prophesying that the renaissance of Buddhism will occur in the New World.

MUSLIMS IN THE FAR EAST.

Dr. Khalied Sheldrake of London, delivered an interesting address at Lawley Hall, Mount Road, Madras on the impressions of his recent tour in Muslim countries with Mr. A. Hameed Hasan in the chair.

The lecturer observed that after leaving Madras last year, he along with his friend, Mr. Simson, visited Ceylon, Singapore, China, Japan, the Philippine Islands and Malay. Wherever he went, he had a warm welcome from co-religionists and delivered lectures at important places. There were thousands of Muslims in those parts. In some places, especially in China and Japan the Muslims were not divided into sects, as were to be found in other places. Islam was no doubt spreading in those parts, but the people were backward. There were few educated men. One-eighth of the Chinese population was Muslim. At Shanghai alone there existed nineteen mosques. Canton was a famous place of Muslim pilgrimage. There was a tomb there reported to be that of the maternal uncle of the Holy Prophet. This uncle of their Holy Prophet was trading with China in those ancient days and after he became a follower of Islam he carried the teachings of Islam to those parts.

To the lecturer's utter surprise, Chinese children were taught English. In fact, in most of the places in Far East, English was taught. In Japan, English was a compulsory subject in schools. It was the youth of China who were carrying on Islamic propaganda in their country.

In all the places he visited, the lecturer met a number of Indian merchants. There was a great deal of solidarity among them. The one thing that was needed in those parts for Muslims was a proper literature on Islam. It was up to Indian Muslims to devise measures for carrying on adequate missionary propaganda in the Far East. After his return to England, he intended to do what he could in the matter.

Speaking next of the general impressions of his tour, the lecturer gave a graphic account of the activities of the Japanese. The latter were intensely patriotic but were exceedingly tolerant in matters of religion. Many of the tales spread about these people were nothing but fibs of the imagination. They were essentially bent upon improving their trade. They did not want to fight with any nation. Religious buildings there were under the control of the Minister of Education. The prosperity of their trade was due chiefly to the co-operation among manufacturers. Every owner of a factory there would also work along with his employees. The cost of living was cheap, the workman was conscious of the fact that he was working for Japan's prosperity. Every care was being taken by the Government about public health. The Government were controlling the national parks wherein every kind of pleasure that could be thought of for children was provided.

Referring to China, the lecturer said that the banditry there was due to poverty and hunger. The bandits were generally the unpaid poor soldiers of China.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

King Alfred and the Cakes:—One of the few things that "every school-boy" in England does know is the story of King Alfred and the Cakes. It told that when that King was in hiding from the Danes, he took shelter in a swineherd's hut. One day the swineherd's wife asked the unknown visitor to watch some cakes which were baking on the embers; but the King was thinking out plans for attacking the Danes and let the cakes burn, for which he was severely upbraided by the irate housewife. The Examiner gives the origin of the story: St. Neot was a monk of Glastonbury, who wishing for a more secluded life, retired into Cornwall to live in solitude. After the monk's death, an account of his life was written by one who knew him well, and the story of the burning of the cakes was recorded in it. The scribe used only one side of each parchment sheet for his writing, and it was this M.S. book that was used on the reverse sides of the parchments for recording the life of King Alfred a little later on. Then, when copies were wanted of the life of the great King the monk given the task forgot at one point that he had to ignore a page of writing every time he turned over the parchment. Hence he copied into the life of the King the picturesque tale of the burning of the cakes.

Buddhist Relics:—It is understood that the Director General of the Archaeological Survey of India is negotiating with the authorities of the Mahabodhi Society for presentation to the latter body of certain Buddhist relics which the late Mr. Cousens discovered while conducting an archaeological survey in Sind. These relics consist of a very minute piece of bone and some cremated ash which Mr. Cousens found in a large stupa (mound) at Mirpurkhas in Sind. Mr. Cousens surmised that the original structure on the site of the stupa in question might have been a dharmarajika (monastery) and that if that assumption was correct the bone relic mentioned might have been part of the body relics of Buddha himself or one of his faithful disciples. The stupa as it stands, was assigned by him to 400 A.D. According to the Director-General of Archaeology if the tiny bone did not actually form part of the corporeal remains of Buddha or of one of his disciples, it must be regarded as a relic of some other Buddhist saint. Mr. D. Walsinha, secretary, Mahabodhi Society, has replied to the Director-General stating that the Society would be only too glad to receive the relics for enshrinement in their new temple at Sarnath.

Prospects of Russo-Japanese War:—"The next war in the Far East will be in all probability between Japan and Russia. and if other nations do not interfere sooner or later Japan will have her own way and finally control the destiny of Eastern Asia", declared Mr. Felix Valyi, a well-known Hungarian orientalist in an interview with the "Bombay Chronicle." Mr. Felix Valyi is on a short visit to Bombay. After making an extensive tour of Japan and China, lasting nearly two years, he is now on his way back to Europe. He added, that Japan was armed to the teeth and had an eye on the maritime provinces of Russia. In his opinion from the military point of view Japan was strong enough to defeat any other single nation in the world. Moreover, he pointed out that in any way between Japan and Russia, the former would have the advantage fighting the war nearer to her base. Referring to the relations between Japan and Russia, Mr. Valyi observed that there was also the possibility of a war breaking out between Japan and America. In this case, he opined that it would be rather an economic war, and perhaps Japan would not be able to stand the strain of a boycott by America as 90 per cent of her silk industry was dependent for its market on America.

NOTES

Tradition in Education:—Speaking at the prize distribution of one of the oldest and best conducted High Schools in Bombay, Lord Brabourne took occasion to make a passing remark about the importance of tradition. "I hope," said His Excellency, "you realise the value of traditions. It is rather the fashion in these modern times to decry them, but I feel sure that for youth at any rate they have not lost their appeal." We are not so sure of that. It is the so-called youth movements, often bossed over, it is true, by disillusioned souls past their prime, that have declared war on tradition. In the world of historical research, on the other hand, tradition is coming to be increasingly recognised as more reliable material than written records which can be and are often forged. As regards tradition as an aid to conduct, it is a curious fact that those who decry tradition are themselves following a tradition. We are glad that Lord Brabourne emphasized the value of tradition just now as His Excellency's observation enables us to urge with some hope of success that his Government should reconsider the decision to abolish the Deccan College which has a tradition unsurpassed by any other College in the Presidency. The decision of Government, if given effect to, will extinguish the long tradition of cultured scholarship to which distinguished scholars, Indian and English, have worthily contributed. Mr. M. R. Jayakar stated some days ago that old students of the College are prepared to contribute to meet the deficit on the College for five years. This should allay the economic qualms of the Minister of Education who, in this case, has shown himself less regardful of Indian sentiment than the Ministers and Members of Government who held charge of his portfolio before him.

Indian Women and the Reforms:—"Whatever we may think of the Congress movement—of its objectives or of the expediency of its methods—we can not wonder nor wholly regret that Indian women should have made common cause with their men in a great uprising of national consciousness. The alternatives—passivity or a conflict of aims—would be a poor augury for the future co-operation of men and women in citizenship and the common affairs of life." This is taken from Miss Eleanor Rathbone's recently published book, "Child Marriage: the Indian Minotaur." Miss Rathbone goes on to hope that the qualities which were evolved by women in the Civil Disobedience movement will be carried into the constructive work of social legislation in the new Constitution. She writes: "Even those who believed in the necessity of non-co operation in the early stages of the Indian nationalist movement have mostly come to realize how enormously the withdrawal of the more active and reforming spirits from the task of legislation and administration, has injured the working of the instalments of self-government already granted and the chance of shaping the new Constitution into forms which will really safeguard the interests of the poor and oppressed. It would be a still greater disaster if, when, the new regime begins, those women who have the qualities of leadership were to be found too much absorbed in unconstitutional or even in extra-constitutional efforts to make full use of the opportunities which it offers them to achieve their ends—assuming indeed that the opportunities offered are large enough to make usage effective." Since Miss Rathbone wrote these lines Gandhiji has formally approved of entry into the Legislatures and has revoked civil resistance for attaining swaraj. If the White Paper Constitution is improved in the essential particulars indicated by Indian political leaders, capable Indian women should be enabled to become members in the Legislative Council in adequate numbers and they will have ample scope for influencing the social life not only of British India but also of the Indian States most of which lag very much behind British India in matters relating to women. We appreciate the efforts of Miss Rathbone and other English women to get the franchise proposed for Indian women widened but they should not attempt to dictate to the latter as to the way in which they should desire extension. Women's organizations in India have stated their requirements in unequivocal terms. English friends would best help by supporting them. We say this because there is a suggestion in this book that Indian women are not rightly advised and that English women with the help of a few Indian women who carry little weight in this country know better what is best for them.

Miss Rathbone on Child Marriages:—It will be clear from what we have said in another paragraph that we regard Miss Rathbone's book as a friendly and useful contribution to the discussion of women's franchise initiated by the White Paper. The relevancy of the prevalence of child marriages in this country to the subject is rather remote. What Miss Rathbone describes as "exposures" of the Joshi and Census Reports are mere statements of fact mixed up with much speculation by an imaginative Census Commissioner. That child marriages are common in this country, is a well-advertised fact. That they often result in grievous suffering to girl wives, is also too true. The immediate occasion for the starting of the Reformer 44 years ago was the agitation caused in the public mind of an exceptionally bad case of this kind. Since then Indian reformers have never ceased working for the postponement of marriages until girls are of a physically more suitable ages. There has been a steady advance in the age of marriage; and the growth of public opinion was sufficient to remove the hesitation of Government to support the Sarda Act. Miss Rathbone is scornful of the cautious attitude of Government but it is evident that she is not well acquainted with the complexities surrounding the enforcement of drastic social legislation in British India. We regard such Acts as the Sarda Act as educative and not as punitive measures; and their educative value will be greatly retarded by the infliction of too severe penalties which shock the public conscience which is gradually growing to appreciate the value of the Act. The Act operates chiefly by strengthening the hands of parents of girls who are subjected to pressure from their orthodox kinsfolk to get their daughters married off at immature ages. We have no doubt that it has prevented thousands of marriages in this way. A reform of this kind involves, besides, a considerable overhauling and readjustment of the family system. Parents who are willing to delay the marriage of their daughters are at a loss what to do with them in the interval. There are not enough schools to which they can be sent for education. In many places the problem is sought to be solved by holding girls' classes before and after the school hours in boys' schools. The pressure is so great that in several places co-education is the only way of providing girls' education. The admission of girls to boys' schools raises the further problem of finding avenues of education for the displaced boys. We assure Miss Rathbone, that Indian leaders are applying their minds to these questions and the provincial Ministers who are in charge of education, are as a rule sympathetic. The great difficulty is lack of funds. If of the 5 shillings in the pound which is Lord Rothermere's estimate of India's contribution to the average income of each inhabitant of the British Isles, Miss Rathbone can secure an abatement of even two shillings, earmarking it for girls' schools, she will contribute greatly to the speedy demise of the Indian Minotaur.

Sir Maharaj Singh:—A Reuter message announces that Sir Maharaj Singh, the Agent-General of the Government of India in South Africa, has asked to be relieved of his office as he wishes his sons to continue their education in India. Sir Maharaj Singh and, even more, Lady Maharaj Singh are doing valuable service, particularly in bridging the social differences between educated Indians and South Africans. The reports which have reached us from time to time have been uniformly appreciative of their untiring effort to get the better mind of South Africa to recognise Indians as equal fellow citizens. In the political sphere Sir Maharaj Singh's path has not been strewn with roses. Especially regrettable was the split among Indians on the question of participating in the enquiry into the possibility of expatriating South African Indians to some country more likely to afford them opportunities of making a living, as the scheme of assisted repatriation to India had failed. Sir Maharaj Singh has visited most of the countries where Indians are likely to be received and he was not aware of any place where they can settle. He also holds it unjust to expatriate South African Indians, 80 per cent of them born in that country, for no better reason than that the Whites do not want them. Nevertheless, he advised Indians to accept the invitation to serve on the Committee in the confident conviction that the Committee would report that no suitable place to which Indians can be packed off can be found. The opposition to such participation was led by Mr. Manilal Gandhi—a chip of the old block—who feared that the Committee would somehow recommend Indian expatriation. Manilal has proved to be right, as the Committee is said to have reported that there are suitable lands available on which South African Indians can be dumped down. We are inclined to think that this is the real reason for the reported desire of Sir Maharaj Singh to be relieved of his office.

The "Dnyanodaya":—In our leading article on "Belief and Behaviour" in last week's Reformer we cited the Dnyanodaya as saying that what would save India is Christianity. Our contemporary refers to this in its current issue and observes: Our friend is in error in affirming that we say "Christianity alone can save India, this being exactly what we avoid saying. 'Christianity' has come to mean a system from which Jesus would entirely dissociate Himself." That is a courageous statement and we honour the Dnyanodaya for it.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, APRIL 14, 1934.

"AS YOU WERE"

On the 7th April Gandhiji handed to the Press a statement announcing that, as the result of much introspection, he had come to the conclusion that in the present circumstances only himself and no other should for the time being bear the responsibility of civil resistance, if it is to succeed as a means of achieving purna, that is, full swaraj. He further said that he must advise all Congressmen to suspend civil disobedience for swaraj as distinguished from specific grievances. "They should leave it to me alone. It should be resumed by others in my life time only under my direction, unless one arises claiming to know this science better than I do and inspires confidence." The full statement is reprinted elsewhere in this issue. Gandhiji gives as his reason for coming to this conclusion that, in the course of a conversation with the inmates of his Ashram, who had recently come out of prison, one of them, "a valued companion of long standing" was found to have been reluctant to perform his full prison task preferring his private studies to it. This was, in Gandhiji's view, undoubtedly against the rules of Satyagraha. What he regards as even worse was that the delinquent, when questioned by Gandhiji, replied that he thought that Gandhiji was aware of his weakness. Gandhiji was evidently not aware of it. He takes blame to himself for mental blindness in not having probed his companion's weakness which the latter thought Gandhiji knew and condoned. "Blindness in a leader," says Gandhiji, "is unpardonable. I saw at once that I must, for the time being, remain the sole representative of civil disobedience in action."

Except to those who regard everything coming from Gandhiji as a revelation into the merits of which it is sacrilegious to enquire, his reasoning in this statement will seem to be a painful non sequitur. The lapse of one man, even though an intimate companion, is a poor reason for advising all to give up an idea. Scores of men and women in the last as well as previous civil disobedience movement, courted imprisonment and did all their jail tasks with meticulous exactitude. It was known from the first that there were a few recalcitrants whose contumacy brought discredit on their companions and the cause. But as a class satyagraha prisoners have been noted for their exemplary conduct and their example has often exercised a wholesome influence on habitual criminals with whom they were often thrown, thanks to the official policy of not discriminating between political and other prisoners. We are not surprised at Mrs. Sarojini Naidu's feeling protest that Gandhiji's remarks are an ungracious and undeserved indictment. He was evidently not thinking of them, for he is the last man to cast a slur on others. Mrs. Naidu, however, is not right in saying that they went to jail at Gandhiji's bidding. Many of them are, we hope, far too independent to do anything at anybody's bidding and they acted on their own judgment. They know that Gandhiji is actuated by the best of motives and will not wish him to refrain from saying or doing on their account whatever seems to him right. Gandhiji, unlike other men, reasons from his emotions and not with his intellect. His conclusions are generally correct but his premises are often his own. As an independent-minded man himself, he expects every one to think and act independently. If others will not do so and cling to him with pathetic and sometimes abject submission, he is not to blame; and we rather welcome the rough shock that Gandhiji now and then administers to these burdensome devotees.

Gandhiji's conclusion is correct. Let it be frankly admitted that the Willingdon policy has succeeded in exposing the unreality of mass civil disobedience as a means to swaraj, either full or partial. When for every person who goes to jail there are at least five others ready to arrest him, to prosecute him, to sentence him, to take him to prison and keep him there, it is self-deception to speak of the country as being at the back of civil disobedience or the Congress. Lord Willingdon has succeeded in crushing the movement though at a cost which far-sighted statesmen would have shrunk from incurring. The wise man, it has been well said, would deal with his enemy as if one day he would be his friend. The Willingdon method is quite the reverse. The result is that in his haste to crush the Gandhi movement his Excellency has crushed that which the British in India can ill afford to lose, the belief of the people that, whatever the defects of the British character, cruelty and vindictiveness were not among them.

The Willingdon policy would still have failed but for the fact that the idea of civil disobedience as a means of attaining swaraj was inherently unsound and was adopted on a fanciful a priori view of what British rule has been to India. It has been, no doubt, foreign rule but the generalisations about foreign rule are not applicable to it without weighty qualifications. The older Congress leaders regarded it as a divine dispensation: the latter-day ones know it chiefly as a "Satanic Government." It would be absurd to think that men of the calibre and patriotism of Dadabhai Naoroji, Ranade and Gokhale merely meant to flatter their British rulers, or that Gandhiji is inappreciative of the great emancipating influence the British Power in India has been. British rule has been, for good and evil, a permeating influence in every sphere of Indian life. That is why Gandhiji has been obliged to realise that for any and every constructive work, whether it is the removal of untouchability, the promotion of communal unity or the relief of the earthquake-stricken people of Bihar, he has, if he is to be useful, to descend from his Non-co-operation ladder. Such labours have accumulated and have to be attended to without further delay. The ladder, therefore, has practically to be relegated to the lumber room. This in our opinion is the real reason why the unsatyagrahic conduct of a single companion of long standing has been magnified in Gandhiji's perspective into a conclusive reason for advising Congressmen to give up civil resistance. If Government want only a peaceful atmosphere and not the personal humiliation of Gandhiji, (who is really too great a world figure for that) it can with perfect confidence lay aside its repressive policy.

CAUSES OF ISLAMIC DECLINE.

It is seldom that we have from Muslim scholars such a careful and objective exposition of the causes which have contributed to the decline of Islam, as the address which the Egyptian savant, Dr. Wahby, delivered at the Muslim Students' Brotherhood. Some of these, in fact many of these, have also led to the decline of other religions. These are comprised in the single phrase "the growth of materialism" which may be described as the exaltation of the temporal life over the spiritual. Islam, according to Dr. Wahby, included the whole of man, his physical as well as spiritual activities, and differed fundamentally from Christianity with its dogma of "My Kingdom is not of this world." Because of its concern for this world as well as the next, Islam realised the Brotherhood of Man to an extent which Christianity, its great rival in this enterprise, has not done. The learned lecturer assumed that the brotherhood of man was the same as democracy. If the two are identical or even interdependent, it has to be explained how Islam with its realised brotherhood fell under autocracies which Dr. Wahby regarded as one of the main causes of the decline of Islam. The Sultan Caliphs went to the same mosques as and prayed with the poorest of their brothers in faith, but remained nonetheless autocrats pure and simple. It would seem that democracy is therefore independent of the recognition of human brotherhood. The Islamic doctrine has had the effect of deflecting the evolution of the original tribes from the territorial to the communal track. Christianity, too, till the Reformation, dreamed of a World Empire transcending race and creed. Christianity reconciled itself to the loss of this dream at the Reformation, and Islam was deprived of it by the nationalism of Kemaline Turkey. The Westerner's good opinion or bad opinion of a religion has little influence on its fortunes. The Doctor's diagnosis of the causes of the Decline of Islam, was clear but not equally so his remedy. Take Science from the West and nothing else, said the Doctor. This is not so simple as it sounds. Science without the scientific mind is as barren as scholasticism which he condemned. The East should take not only science but the scientific mind and apply it to spheres which the West has until recently regarded as lying outside the purview of both. In that way the East will benefit not only itself but also the West. The only distinction thinking men will then make is that between Right and Wrong, not that between East and West and North and South.

PRAYER.

I believe in prayer. I believe in it not as an article of faith but as the result of experience. It is an experience which every one can acquire. All things are fit objects of prayer except such as can be had by the exercise of common prudence. If you find yourself fumbling vainly in your pocket for a match to light your cigarette with in an express train, you are more likely to get it by asking your fellow passenger than by praying to God. Personally in such a contingency I would put my cigarette back in my pocket and buy a match box at the next stop. But then I do not smoke and cannot, therefore, realise the pangs of those who do. Even in such a case, prayer will benefit but it should be to see before you leave your home next time that you have a match box in your pocket. In other words, mental states, yours or others, are more suitable subjects of prayer than material things. This does not mean that material results are not achieved by prayer but that they come, when they do, chiefly through modifications of mental states.

As to the right method of prayer, it is easily found, if it is realised that prayer is the means by which we remove impediments to our being in direct contact with the mighty reservoir of help and healing which is the soul of the Universe. Great souls are constantly in contact with it. For others effort is needed. These are greatly assisted in the effort by the form of words left behind by those who in ages past made the same effort. To the Jew, the Hebrew Psalms; to the Muslim, the verses of his Koran; to the Parsi, the phrases of Zarathustra; to the Hindu, the Vedic hymns are the readiest means of transporting oneself to the right frame of mind to get into direct contact with the Heart of Things. Personally, I am an eclectic. For days together I find spiritual good in the Hebrew psalms; then for several days in the Christian Gospels; then I wake one morning with a Gita verse running in my head and this period is becoming the most frequent and most fervent with the years.

It is, therefore, with the greatest pleasure that I welcome this beautifully printed little book of "Universal Prayer" selected and translated from Sanskrit religious literature by Swami Yatisvarananda and published by the Sri Ramakrishna Math, Mylapore, Madras. The scholarly and thoughtful Introduction in English may be read with profit by religiously minded men and women of all creeds and sects. Swami Vivekananda's claim that Hinduism is not merely the religion of the Hindus but is World religion is fully borne out by the Prayers in this book, all breathing the spirit of universality. The book is priced Re. 1 as 4.

Japanese Press Reporter:—According to recent travellers back from Japan the Japanese reporter beats every one else in the world in the matter of Journalistic enterprise. He boards incoming ocean boats with the port doctor, carrying a camera and a basket of carrier pigeons. The reporter photographs the prominent passengers, interviews them, types and reduces the whole to the dimensions of a postage stamp, and fastens it to one of his pigeons. The carrier pigeon flies to the newspaper office in time to have the article published and sold to passengers as they get off the boat.

ARE INTER-MARRIAGES A PROBLEM ?

(By V. A.)

Discussing the subject of inter-marriages from the Parsi angle, "P. A. M." a few weeks ago (Reformer, March 31) urged the necessity of "creating a strong prejudice against inter-marriages by keeping alive among its members the love for Parsi traditions and culture." Right through "P. A. M.'s" article runs the fear of extinction of the Parsi community. Yet there is one surprising fact that must strike the observer who "tries to solve this problem as though concerned with lines and planes and solids." The agitation against inter-marriages rose to frenzied heights twice during this century, in 1919 and 1933 according to "P. A. M." Both the dates marked the emergence of the Parsi community out of a decade of phenomenal increase. In 1901-11 the community increased by 6.5 per cent and in 1921-31 by 7.9 per cent. At no period of its history has the Parsi community shown a decrease in numbers although in the proportion to the general population there has always been a depreciation. The total figure for Parsis is a little over one lakh, i. e., 0028 per cent of the population. Figures for inter-marriages from the community are not available but they would not appreciably affect the totals. It is perhaps feared that the community lose its identity owing to the increasing majorities of communities surrounding it. This is remote as since 1921 the Parsis have increased by 5,500 while the total population of Bombay City where they are concentrated has decreased by over 14,000. But inter-marriages would have had little to do with it.

What "P. A. M." really proposes is a Zoroastrian revival when he wants Parsi tradition and culture to be kept alive. The Markham Report reveals that the education imparted to the average Parsi boy is entirely secular. What is more striking, it shows that contemplated reforms are along secular lines. The education which attracts members of the community most is English education. Unlike the Zionists who seek to return to Palestine, the Parsi revivalist has no desire to go back to Persia. The Report of the Census of India 1931 in a small paragraph comments that "in spite of pressing invitations from Persia the Parsis have shown little inclination to accept" them. The increase in the Census enumeration in spite of a diminishing birth rate is explained by a low death rate and the influx of Iranis from Persia. The remark that the Parsis are inspired by feelings similar to those of the Hebrew Psalmist does not correctly represent the situation today. To the Zoroastrians, strange as it may seem, the "promised land" is not Persia which they left centuries ago, but India which extended hospitality to the victims of persecution. The danger of persecution in Persia is no more. On the other hand a section of Persia is anxious to win back the Parsi community. In spite of this, the influx of Iranis, according to the late Sir Jivanji Modi "recent Zoroastrian immigrants from Persia", has been large enough to present "a difficult educational problem." When "P. A. M." writes of the necessity of impressing on his community the importance of keeping alive the love for Parsi traditions and culture in connection with inter-marriages, he is only using the subject as a peg to hang his sermon on. There are several evils, more potent than inter-marriage, which have to be overcome to achieve "P. A. M.'s" ideal and he recognises this when he concludes with an admonition to his community to consider the issue dispassionately. Non-Parsees who "intervened" in the discussion supported "P. A. M.'s" views that the protest meetings led nowhere and they share his dislike for inter-marriages.

Intercommunal marriages are outside the scope of any particular community. To talk of them as exclusively affecting the Parsis and as such to be dealt with solely by them is absurd. If the bigger communities have to be reminded of their duties to minorities, the minor groups have even more to be educated in matters affecting the treatment of their non-conformist members. It happens only too often that the two parties to an inter-marriage are cut off from the beneficent influence of both communities which adds to their difficulties. The danger to the life of a community through intermarriages is more imaginary than real. The danger to the culture and traditions of a race from the same source is non-existent. This being the case the Parsi community has small cause to maintain its antagonistic attitude towards the very few individuals who marry out of the particular group they happen to born in. On the other hand a more tolerant attitude would go far to retain in the community those men and women who today are forced out of it by the agitation of communal leaders. Intermarriages are far too few to-day to constitute a problem. Those which have taken place between members of different communities have been largely because the educated of all groups and communities tend in this country to form a separate group of their own. There is probably more in common between an educated Hindu, an educated Muslim and an educated Parsi as standardised products of our universities, than there is between an educated Parsi and an uneducated one. It is possible that the spread of education may emphasise in the future communal differences but it is equally likely that education, being largely or solely secular, will work against communal barriers. If in these circumstances any community loses its identity, the causes will lie in the fact that its members did not care sufficiently for its culture and traditions to secure its preservation. No conscious effort on the part of individuals can arouse a love in a community for its culture if its members are indifferent to it. Mr. Markham passes on information which he received that illiteracy exists because Parsi parents in some areas "will not permit their children to attend primary Gujarati schools and that there do not happen to be English teaching schools in those areas." In other words the community insists on English education or no education. It is significant that no such emphasis has been placed on Zend, the language of their scriptures.

It is worth noting that Mr. Hutton, Census Commissioner for 1931, gives three causes for the falling birth-rate among the Parsis:—Their educational progress, economic status and the reduced fertility resultant from inbreeding. If the last cause has been correctly gauged inter-marriages ought to help in preserving the community. The birth-rate has steadily fallen among Parsis in recent years until in 1921, as Mr. Hutton remarks, it was lower than among the French. To counteract the reluctance of members of the community to shoulder the responsibilities of married life, it may be necessary to adopt the methods of European communities similarly circumstanced—that is subsidise marriages and penalise bachelors. So far as I am aware, however, there is neither a Mussolini nor a Hitler in the community to undertake the inauguration of mass marriages. The Parsi community in its trouble may even come to adopt early marriages as a solution of a double problem—the intercommunal marriage one which is so needlessly vexing its members, and the falling birth-rate! The real choice before the Parsis is between the preservation of an illusory racial and communal purity and the liberty of its individual members.

DEMOCRACY AND THE WHITE PAPER.

(BY "ARGUS" OF PENUKONDA)

I was much surprised at Mrs. I. J. Pitt's article under the above caption published in the Indian Social Reformer of March 17, 1934. I know Mrs. Pitt claims to be a "sympathetic" woman, sympathetic towards the aspirations of Indians. But I am afraid that the average man, bringing to bear upon her article an unbiased frame of mind, must naturally come to the conclusion that the article is conceived in a very unsympathetic spirit.

To begin with: Her assumption that Government by the majority is democracy, though true in very many cases, may well be challenged in cases where the majority is perverse as in this case. Even an ardent advocate of the present parliament of England to speak on behalf of the people or England, must in his heart of hearts feel that the present parliament—the most conservative known to history—is quite unreasonable in its attitude towards India and her legitimate aspirations, though he may not have the moral courage to express his views openly and in public. He stands only to be disillusioned who believes "that some form of democratic Government suited to Indian conditions will be inaugurated in the near future."

For generations past, England with her usual astuteness has been feeding us with the hope that her mission in this country is to regenerate an ancient people and restore them to their pristine glory. Unsophisticated men that we are, we have been pinning our faith to these declarations, especially because now and then responsible men supported them. But this could not continue for long. When the time for action came, Englishmen began to go back upon their promise in the fond hope of escaping responsibility. Lord Curzon, when Viceroy of India, tried to explain away the Queen's proclamation by saying that the words used therein should be construed in a narrow sense and that effect should be given to them only as far as possible. Lord Morley from his place in Parliament characterised this as misinterpretation. Lord Lytton and ex-viceroy of India acknowledged that English men have cheated the people of India. Mr. Winston Churchill denied that England ever meant to confer Dominion Status upon India—in spite of clear and unmistakable declaration by Lord Irwin in October 1929. Instances like this which can be easily multiplied, have invested the pronouncements of British Statesmen with a high degree of unreality and suspicion.

Mrs. Pitt's claim that there will be a momentous transference of responsibility and power into India's hands may be taken cum grano salis in the light of our long experience in the past. I will now deal with her article in the order in which she formulates the point at issue and our differences with her.

1. Distrust because it appears as if the Government had changed its liberal policy and was yielding to the outcries of the Die-hards.

The so-called 'National Government' which is only 'national' in name, is discredited even in England. It had no policy worth mentioning. Because it changed its policy, liberals like Sir Herbert Samuel severed their connection with it and returned to the liberal camp and were hailed as "returning prodigals" by Mr. Lloyd George. There is so much schism amongst the members of the British cabinet which determines the fate of this unhappy country. But in spite of it the Government is held together with a view to solving the Indian problem "effectively" and to sealing our fate for many a long year so that a succeeding Government may not be able to give us any reforms worth having.

Speaking on a momentous occasion, Sir Samuel Hoare said that "the machinery of Government has now become so complicated that it is often difficult to get its wheels to move quick enough. So many people have to be consulted and so many interests have to be reconciled before any action is taken, that there is always the risk of action coming too late or of its being so watered down as to be ineffective."

An Indian leader of some fame once remarked, "Sir Samuel Hoare's letter to his constituents indicates the strength of the conservative opposition which will have to be bought off by further attenuation of the proposals discussed at the R. T. Conference." Mr. V. S. Sastry whose views are entitled to respect, once remarked "the overpowering strength of the party behind the Secretary of State for India can be judged by the extent of their influence on the Prime Minister who first gave him the Indian portfolio and now acquiesces in the drastic modification of his programme." Whatever difference of opinion there may be among members of Parliament in other matters so far as India is concerned they are all one in their dealings with India. This was also the policy strongly advocated by Sir John Simon himself off and on. These facts conclusively prove that in spite of apparent non-change of policy of the "National Government" in its dealings with India, it has often been changing its attitude. Considerations of expediency and not those of justice guide the "National Government" whether there is change of policy or not. This is the firm and unalterable conviction of every self-respecting Indian who is capable of any thought. Even without going out of power the "National Government" can pursue and has been pursuing a policy chalked out for it by the 500 and odd conservative members of Parliament whose one aim is to hold India permanently in their grip and lay the English yoke more firmly than ever on this country for their own self-aggrandisement.

2. Resentment with the opposition:—In theory the statement of our esteemed friend that opposition is a necessary part of the democratic system and the more important the bill to be passed the more deep the feeling and the more violent will be the opposition is very sound. Unfortunately the National Government itself is not dealing fairly with India. Agitation in India for reforms from persons of all shades of political opinion is responsible for the attempt in England to grant what they call "Reforms". Englishmen are only willing to give as little of "Reforms" as possible and satisfy us with a mere show of them. In this predicament men like Sir Henry Page Croft and Mr. Churchill find it very easy to deflect the 'National Government' from its views, as the National Government is not very serious about granting "Reforms". This is not Parliamentary procedure as the party in power and the opposition are to all intents and purposes one, and as the interests of all parties are absolutely identical in dealing with this unfortunate land of ours.

3. Disappointment with the White Paper Scheme which satisfies no one:—

The statement of Mrs. Pitt that disappointment would not have prevailed if close attention had been paid to the pronouncement of Government is absolutely devoid of the least foundation. We in this country have been closely following the happenings in England from stage to stage.

Whatever show of truth there might once have been in this statement of Mrs. Pitt at a time, when the people of India still hoped against hope that the White Paper Scheme might possibly be improved to the advantage of India by suitable amendments, the White Paper Scheme now stands completely exposed by the conduct of Englishmen who are trying by all means that human ingenuity can devise to whittle down the "Reforms" and make it Waste Paper as Dr. De Souza, M. L. A., from his seat in the Assembly said through lapsus lingue. The Right Hon'ble Mr. V. S. Srinivasa Sastry, India's Ambassador to several parts of the British Empire, than whom England has no better friend, was compelled to say that the White Paper is "disappointing," that it does not take this country anywhere near the Dominion Status which was promised to us by responsible men in power on solemn occasions, that though the Scheme does not specifically state that we cannot have Dominion Status yet it is a practical denial of it by reason of the great indefiniteness of time when it may be conferred. Mr. Sastry is not alone in this view. He is fortified by the opinions of every Indian leader whose opinions are worth anything.

The deep import and immense potentialities of the White Paper are sufficiently recognised in India. It is much too late for Mrs. Pitt to endeavour to induce India to accept the White Paper in the remote hope that if it is worked with goodwill the new constitution can be shaped into "Dominion Status."

As the great Abraham Lincoln has said you can deceive some people for all times, all people for some time but not all people for all times.

WOMEN'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE NEW CHINA*

(BY CHARLOTTE T. NIVEN.)

Chinese women have always played an important role in the administration of the family and its possession. It is not surprising, therefore, to find them taking a share in the reconstruction of public and economic life in modern China. At the time of the Revolution a few women came prominently into view, chief among them the wife of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, a member of the famous Soong family. She and her sisters, Mrs. Chiang Kai Shek and Mrs. H. H. Kung, undoubtedly the leading ladies of China to-day, have consistently given their influence and effort on behalf of all movements for social betterment.

The next phase of the Revolution which brought "The Party," the Kuomintang, into being, produced a women's section of the party which pledged itself to the complete emancipation of women, in the interests not only of the women themselves but of the new China. All women's organisations in China were affected by this wave of freedom, this call to serve the nation which was being born. One of the chief among them and the only considerable grouping of Christian women on a national scale is the Y. W. C. A. of China. It has always cared deeply about China, about the conditions of women and children in factory life, and more recently, about women in rural life. China is becoming industrialized too rapidly to wait for the checks and safeguards which other nations have learnt through painful experience to apply. Economic and social problems are multiplying in the process. Eighty percent of China's population is rural. The line of development taken by the millions of rural women may well decide China's future. It is such considerations as these which led the leaders of the Y. W. C. A. of China, as they met in Convention last summer in Shanghai, to decide that their best contribution to the building of the New China would lie in a policy of fundamental education which would lay emphasis on understanding social and economic trends in the present life of the country and on the responsibility of a Christian women's movement to help to build the new social order in China. The task is overwhelming, and would be crushing to women of less courage and devotion. When one realizes what a tiny handful they are, for all their 12,000 members, one is filled with admiration and respect.

Groups of industrial and rural members took part for the first time in National Convention referred to above, and had their full share in choosing the points to be emphasized in the work and study of the Associations for the next few years. Indeed a "five year plan" has been worked out for the guidance of the membership in their various clubs, committees, conferences and discussion groups. Chiefly to be emphasized are the problems of citizenship—the need to understand their government, their rights and responsibilities as citizens, national and international issues, and the resources and needs of their own communities. Problems of livelihood are also to take an important place, both in their immediate relation to the group, in its economic habits of spending and saving, and in the deeper study of questions of unemployment and increase of population.

Birth-control and eugenics are matters of profound interest to the oriental countries, bearing a more than academic reference to the future of those nations, and as a women's organization it was obvious that a vital line of study would follow questions relating to sex, marriage and the home. Here is an enormous field touching the life of millions of Chinese young people and Chinese home, caught in a period of transition from the old and known to the new and not-yet-established. Standards and sanctions carrying the authority of centuries of respectful usage have broken down before the exigencies of the most recent modern life. What is to replace them?

Another Christian group, which included several outstanding women, has taken the way of literature to make its contribution to the new China. The conviction had been growing for some years that there was a need to increase the available Christian literature on many subjects for the use of students and the intellectual class "in view of China's national crisis and the many vital problems which Chinese youth have been facing in recent years." Some fourteen persons representing various forms of Christian educational work in China met for more than three weeks last July, and after making a careful study of material prepared beforehand on the resources of the present situation in China, political, economic and religious, as well as from the point of view of literature, a comprehensive plan was outlined to cover the next few years. This group, in order to give permanence to its work, has organized itself into "The National Association for the Promotion of Christian Literature." While recognizing that "great literature is never produced according to a plan," nevertheless they feel the need of a plan in order to stimulate production. The declared purpose of this effort to create a Christian literature for China is "to guide and enrich the life of youth by breathing into it the Christian spirit and by making full use of modern knowledge, so as to fit it into the existing social environment for the creation of an ideal society."

The foregoing may seem to be too educational or too literary to have a very definite effect on the building of the new nation. There are many who prefer the way of action. A number of able women have taken positions in the new ministries in Nanking and are enthusiastic about the new structure that is growing up under their hands. The present writer, however, who has spent some time in China in the course of the past year, shares the conviction of the Chinese groups here described that the educational approach is the only fundamental way of attacking the overwhelming problem which China presents today. The method is admittedly slow but one comes to distrust in such a country as China many of the short cuts leading to special forms of government, to the building up of a great commercial structure resembling that of the western nations, or to quick and superficial schooling, to fit people for modern occupations. Whatever the method employed, however, there seems to be safety in pinning one's faith to the inherent reasonableness of the Chinese people who will in time evolve, in the words of the Y. W. C. A. report before quoted, "a just and satisfying social order." Our organization is proud to be helping to lay some of its foundation stones.

JAPANESE COLONISATION IN BRAZIL.*

(BY PASTOR DR. D. SCHRODER, BERLIN.)

The migratory movement, which has been going on between Europe and other continents for more than three centuries, has always reached large proportions when a certain pressure has been brought to bear on the old countries by economic or other crises or by big increases in population; in other words when subsistence, or the means of earning it, became too limited, and economic and cultural needs could no longer be satisfied. So emigration to North America started, and until quite recently, that country has absorbed hundreds of thousands of immigrants every year. Industry there had an almost unlimited capacity for absorption.

To-day this is no longer the case. Here too unemployment has attained unforeseen dimensions and the industries can easily meet their labour requirements in the country itself. North America, therefore, has ceased to be a country of immigration. Yet, as the pressure of population in the countries of emigration did not decrease, other regions capable of receiving a part of the excess population of the old world had to be found, and attention was turned to the vast areas of virgin forest in South America. Here there was still enough room. At the same time as this change in objective, a change in the structure of emigration has also occurred. Agriculture, and not industry, is now absorbing the emigrant.

This change, and the problems arising therefrom were first apparent to Japan and Poland.

Below I give a short description of the Japanese settlement founded in South America.

Even before 1914, Japanese immigration into Brazil was distinguished by the fact that right from the start, and even in its most insignificant beginnings, the Government was behind the emigration associations. In 1907, shortly after the Russo-Japanese War, the first lot of coffee plantation workers went out to Brazil on an emigrant steamer, subsidised by the Japanese Government. This immigration of workers under contract went on from 1907 to 1913. But as early as 1912 the first regular Japanese agricultural colony was founded. In the uncolonized coastal plains south of the state of Sao Paulo, some territory by Iguape, suitable for cultivating rice, was provided, and in 1913, about 6,000 Japanese immigrants settled there.

Japanese immigration ceased from 1914 to 1917. Then however, the lack of Italian and Portuguese labour made itself felt to such an extent in Brazil, that Japanese immigration recommenced and was noteworthy for the perfect manner in which it was organized. Encouraged by the Japanese Government, the four most important emigration associations merged in 1917 into the "Kaigai Kyokai Chueikai" (Associations for Agricultural Development Abroad) with a capital of about 10 million Yen. In 1918, 6,000 more Japs migrated to Brazil. In 1920 there were about 28,000 there, on about 20,000 hectares (approx. 50,000 acres) of land, mostly in the Iguape region. During 1920 to 1923 there was a certain decrease, and less than 1000 entered annually. This decrease did not, however, continue and a considerable increase ensued which may be illustrated by the following figures:

* Report presented to the Permanent Conference for the Protection of Migrants, Tenth Session.

1924, 3,700; 1925, 4,600; 1926, 6,200; 1927, 9,200; 1928, 11,200; 1929, 17,000; 1930, 14,000; 1931, 5,300; 1932, 115,000.

The organization of this by no means insignificant emigration movement ought briefly to be mentioned.

It can be divided into the following headings: (1) Home organization; (2) General instructions to the immigrants; (3) Colonization in Central Brazil and the Amazon Territory.

Home organization: Emigration Associations and also a Bank were established with the support of the state. The selection of emigrants is very strictly carried out. They are taught the geography of Brazil and the Portuguese language.

As regards the behaviour of the Emigrants to Brazil, a certain assimilation to the country is expected. Savings should be invested in Brazil, Brazilian nationality should be obtained and conversion to the Catholic religion recommended.

Colonization: Immigrants are first distributed among the coffee plantations for two or three years. These are specially selected by Consular Officials. Later they are established on their own land, so that new arrivals are always settled in colonies where there are people who have already become accustomed to the life. In addition even after his establishment, the immigrant continues to receive assistance. Doctors give advice on healthy itinerant agricultural teachers prepare plans of cultivation and give advice on insect destruction as well as suitable manures. The purchase of agricultural machinery is arranged.

At present about 150,000 Japanese immigrants are divided as follows among the Brazilian States detailed below:

Amazones	182	Espirite Santo	7
Para	753	Rio de Janeiro	1150
Geyaz	410	Sao Paulo	106537
Matte Gross	1430	Parana	3720

It can be confidently stated that the following objects were attained:

(a) a noteworthy easing of the Japanese labour market, owing to the withdrawal of about 150,000 people;

(b) assured placement of these people as agricultural settlers, with safe prospects of independence and later comparative affluence.

THE PRESS AND PEACE.

The results of the Conference of governmental Press bureaux and representatives of the Press, held at Madrid in November, were reported to the Council of the League of Nations by the representative of Denmark. That Conference dealt particularly with the problem of the spread of false information which might threaten to disturb the peace of the world and the good understanding between nations. It was attended by representatives of Governmental Press bureaux from thirty-three countries, as well as by representatives of news agencies, delegates of international journalists' associations and national associations of newspaper publishers.

The Council was informed that the Madrid Conference showed progress in every respect as compared with the first Conference which was held two years ago in Copenhagen. The Copenhagen Conference had initiated an enquiry into the problem of false news, and these replies were examined at Madrid and made the basis for further suggestions. Two main ideas emerged as a result of this enquiry: first, respect for the freedom of the Press, and, second, the expediency of full authentic information to be communicated as soon as possible to the Press. In the light of these principles, two groups of resolutions were adopted by the Madrid Conference, one dealing with securing the spread of more accurate news, the other with improvements in the field of the international organisation of the Press.

The Conference recommended the constitution of a committee of experts to report on technical and financial methods of remedying the spread of false news. These experts would be asked to study particularly an interesting memorandum on this subject, submitted by the International Association of Journalists accredited to the League of Nations. This committee of experts will be appointed by the Organising Committee set up at Madrid.

The Council was also informed of a resolution proposed at Madrid on the initiative of the Polish Association of Publishers of Newspapers and Periodicals looking toward ways of correcting false Press reports in the international field. The Conference was of opinion that, until a comprehensive solution of this problem could be found, it might be possible to correct false Press reports through the application of bilateral and multilateral Press agreements. The Council was informed that a first step in this direction had been taken by an agreement between national associations of newspaper publishers from Switzerland, the Netherlands and Poland.

Several Press organisations represented at Madrid believed it would be desirable to deal even more broadly with the problem of false news. The Conference accordingly endorsed a proposal for a detailed historical study of the effects of Press news on national feeling during past crises, and of the influence that news would appear to have exercised on the development of such crises. The Council decided to submit this broad proposal to the Assembly for consideration before making any recommendation.

The scope of the Madrid Conference may be further noted in resolution pertaining to an international federation of associations of directors and publishers of newspapers, the proposal for an international identity card for journalists, an international court of honour for journalists, and a resolution regarding the important problem of the status of Press correspondents in countries other than their own, on which point the Madrid Conference expressed the hope "that there may be established a general code of rules of a political, legal and professional character calculated to ensure security for the work and person of Press correspondents in countries other than their own."

The Madrid Conference urged that such meetings of directors of governmental Press bureaux and representatives of the Press should become periodical, and asked that arrangements for the preparation of future sessions be left with the Information Section of the League Secretariat, after consultation with the various Press groups concerned. The Council, while fully appreciating the value of these meetings, thought it necessary to leave it to the Assembly to decide the financial and administrative limits of any assistance that may be afforded by the League Secretariat.

The representatives of Cuba and the Argentine on the Council expressed the hope that a Spanish-American Press Conference would be convened, in accordance with suggestions frequently put forward by various newspapers, adding that it would be desirable if the League would encourage the proposal for such a congress, which would be enthusiastically welcomed by all Latin-American countries.

SATYAGRAHA AND CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

(BY MAHATMA GANDHI)

This statement was drafted by me on my day of silence at Sasra, that is, Easter Monday, April 2. I passed it on to Rajendra Babu, and then it was circulated among the friends, who were present. The original draft has undergone considerable revision. It is also abridged. But in essence, it remains as it was on Monday. I regret that I have not been able to show this to all friends and colleagues with whom I would have been delighted to share it. But as I had no doubt whatsoever about the soundness of my decision and as I know that the civil resistance of some friends was imminent, I was not prepared to take the risk of delaying publication by waiting for the opinion of friends.

Every word of this statement is in answer to intense introspection, searching of the heart and waiting upon God. The decision carries with it reflection upon no single individual. It is a humble admission of my own limitations and a due sense of the tremendous responsibility that I have carried on my shoulders all these long years.

This statement owes its inspiration to a personal chat with the inmates and associates of the Satyagraha Ashram, who had just come out of prison and whom at Rajendra Babu's instance, I had sent to Bihar. More especially is it due to a revealing information I got in the course of a conversation about a valued companion of long standing, who was found reluctant to perform the full prison task, preferring his private studies to the allotted task. This was undoubtedly contrary to the rules of 'satyagraha.'

More than the imperfection of the friend whom I love more than ever, it brought home to me my own imperfection. The friend said he had thought that I was aware of his weakness, I was blind. Blindness in a leader is unpardonable. I saw at once that I must, for the time being, remain the sole representative of civil resistance in action.

During the informal conference week, at Poona, in July last, I had stated that, while many individual civil resisters would be welcome, even one was sufficient to keep alive the message of Satyagraha.

Now after much searching of the heart, I have arrived at the conclusion that in the present circumstances only one and that myself and no other should, for the time being, bear the responsibility of civil resistance if it is to succeed as a means of achieving "purna" Swaraj.

I feel that the masses have not received the full message of 'Satyagraha' owing to its adulteration in the process of transmission.

It has become clear to me that spiritual instruments suffer in their potency when their use is taught through non-spiritual media. Spiritual messages are self-propagating. The reaction of the masses throughout my Harijan tour has been the latest forcible illustration of what I mean. The splendid response of the masses has been spontaneous. The workers themselves were amazed at the attendance and the fervour of the vast masses whom they had never reached.

Satyagraha is a purely spiritual weapon. It may be used for what may appear to be mundane ends, and through men and women who do not understand its spirituality provided the director knows that the weapon is spiritual. Everyone cannot use surgical instruments. Many may use them if there is an expert behind them directing their use. I claim to be a Satyagraha expert in the making. I have need to be far more careful than the expert surgeon who is complete master of his science. I am still a humble searcher. The very nature of this science of Satyagraha, precludes the student from seeing more than the step immediately in front of him.

The introspection prompted by the conversation with the Ashram inmates has led me to the conclusion that I must advise all Congressmen to suspend civil resistance for 'Swaraj' as distinguished from specific grievances. They should leave it to me alone. It should be resumed by others in my lifetime only under my direction, unless one arises claiming to know the science better than I do and inspires confidence.

I give this opinion as the author and initiator of satyagraha. Henceforth, therefore, all who have been impelled to civil resistance for 'Swaraj' under my advice, directly given or indirectly inferred, will please desist from civil resistance.

I am quite convinced that this is the best course in the interest of India's fight for freedom. I am in deadly earnest about this greatest of weapons at the disposal of mankind. It is claimed for satyagraha that it is a complete substitute for violence or war.

It is designed, therefore, to reach the hearts, both of the so-called "terrorists" and the rulers who seek to root out the "terrorists" by emasculating the whole nation. But the indifferent civil resistance of many, grand as it has been in its results, has not touched the hearts either of the "terrorists" or the rulers as a class.

Unadulterated satyagraha must touch the hearts of both. To test the truth of the proposition, satyagraha needs to be confined to one qualified person at a time. The trial has never been made. It must be made now. Let me caution the reader against mistaking satyagraha for mere civil resistance. It covers much more than civil resistance. It means relentless search for Truth and the power that such a search gives to the searcher. The search can only be pursued by strictly non-violent means.

What are the civil resisters thus freed to do, if they are to be ready for the call whenever it comes? They must learn the art and the beauty of self-denial and voluntary poverty.

Workers thus released by me must engage themselves in nation-building activities, the spread of khaddar through personal hand-spinning and hand-weaving, the spread of communal unity of hearts by irreproachable personal conduct towards one another in every walk of life, the banishing of untouchability in every shape or form in one's own person, the spread of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks and drugs by personal contact with individual addicts and generally by cultivating personal purity.

These are services which provide maintenance of the poor man's scale. Those for whom the poor man's scale is not feasible should find a place in small unorganised industries of national importance which give a better wage.

Let it be understood that civil resistance is for those who know and perform the duty of voluntary obedience to law and authority.

It is hardly necessary to say that in issuing this statement I am in no way usurping the function of the Congress. Mine is mere advice to those who look to me for guidance in matters of satyagraha.

CAUSES OF DECLINE OF ISLAM

A brilliant lecture on "The Decline of Islam—Its Causes and Remedies" was delivered by Dr. Bedjhet Wahby, the well-known Egyptian scholar, on Sunday evening, at a large public meeting, organised under the auspices of the Bombay Muslim Students' Union, at the Anjuman-i-Islam Hall, Bombay, reports the Bombay Chronicle.

Mr. S. A. Brelvi, presided. At the end of the lecture Dr. Wahby answered a few questions put to him by some among the audience. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu was among those present.

In introducing Dr. Wahby to the audience, Mr. S. A. Brelvi said that the lecturer was one of the most cultured men living. He had travelled extensively in Islamic countries and had come into intimate contact with well-known men in Egypt and Turkey, who had made history. He was also a deep student of Islamic history. His knowledge of men and affairs, particularly of the Near East, was such that what he did not know about them was not worth knowing.

Dr. Wahby prefaced the exposition of what he termed as a "very wide subject, impossible to be treated in full detail" namely, the subject of "the Decline of Islam—Its Causes and Cures," with the remark that the neglect of "a great religion" by the modern Islamic generation was perhaps only the symptom of the disease that began with the increasing materialistic tendencies and the emphasis so prevalent in the West and in the rest of the world.

"At a time when we are expecting more and more prosperity," the lecturer felt that Islam with its emphasis on happiness in this world, had a large part to play.

The word "religion" possessed no precise meaning. It pointed out the great duties and truths—regarding, for example, the deity, future life, prayer, and these formed the characteristics of all religions.

The characteristic of Islam was that, apart from the future life, is also emphasised and included the whole of the physical and mental activities of man on earth itself and in which character it fundamentally differed from Christianity with its dogma of "My Kingdom is not of this world." This was a vital difference in the claim of Islam for its tenet "Universal Brotherhood of Man" in this world itself. It explained the democratic character of Islam.

Islam was concerned with the primary and important question of the Creator and of the creature and the bond between the two. Islam also taught and insisted that Man had certain definite duties to perform in this world as apart from the other world. These duties were detailed and laid down by the Sheriat. Islam enjoined on Man the "duty of acquiring knowledge, unceasingly from the cradle to the very grave."

The ignorance and backwardness of Muslims in the face of this important injunction in the Sheriat was, therefore, "astounding" and was an indelible 'shame'. The great Muslim Fraternity that extended over vast areas should blot out this shame, added the lecturer.

The Christians in their long struggle with "Scholasticism" had put forth their finest efforts to liberate true Christian thought from the stranglehold of mere scholasticism and dogma. It was only after an intense struggle with "drab scholasticism" that the principle of "Christian Service" was realised to be capable of usage for betterment of Man in his social climb. The struggle with Islamic Scholasticism and the return to pristine and living faith in the great principles of Islam was, therefore, a preliminary condition to advance.

The Islamic Message of the Brotherhood of Man that spread to the uttermost confines of the earth had no parallel in history of the world observed Dr. Wahby: Such a great fraternity of people of diverse races with brotherhood and equality before God and Man betokened vital principles of life as found in Islam. This message that all of us are brothers, that all humanity forms one big fraternity is the basic factor of the Islamic religion. In fact it was the cornerstone of the whole edifice. It explained Islam's democratic equalitarian nature.

As such, the creeping in of 'narrow Nationalism' into the Islamic people was undoubtedly another cause of weakness in the Islamic Faith. The political unit in pre-Islamic world was the "tribe," knit together by "blood-bonds or kinship." The fact that hostile tribes and races were knit together into one Religious Faith of Islam showed that Islam rejected "blood-kinship" as the tie or bond for Man and society to endure. The political and Social ties that narrow Nationalisms insisted on maintaining was, therefore, alien to Islam which was a fraternity of Man in this world itself.

How narrow nationalism wrecked Islam, how dangerous it proved to Islam was demonstrated in the revolts in Turkish national history before the War and even after. "The only ties that bind me to my brothers is the Muslim tie and not the narrow sentiment of nationalism that circumscribes Man, and which I disclaim," said the lecturer.

Another weakness that Islam suffered from in its early History was the malignant influence of "autocracy" as could be judged by its effects on Islam. A good autocrat may be able to advance the interests of humanity in religion or in politics, but it was impossible to ensure equally worthy "successions." The arrival of autocracy at the head of Islam did, therefore, a great harm just before the Crusades. The atmosphere of corruption that the autocrat induced and the importation of whims as a factor into the movements of religion was a drag on the growth of Islam.

The division of Islamic countries among contending autocrats who indulged in fratricidal war in which the Religious Faith was exploited for ulterior motives, contributed to the decline of Islam before the advent of the western forces of Nationalism.

The speaker then traced the growth and decline of Islam into two periods from the beginning to the Crusades and from the Crusades to the present day.

In examining the political fortunes of the Islamic powers, particularly Turkey and Egypt, the speaker referred to the fact that the West entertained "almost an incredible amount of prejudice against and contempt for, Turkey and the Islamic Culture" that could even be termed "almost a hereditary influence on the Western historical mind." Indeed, the East itself was looked down upon by the West. The speaker mentioned that even history had been written by the Western historians with this prejudice uneliminated. The speaker said that Turkish-Egyptian rulers were reformist in many outstanding cases, and had given other nationals full freedom and instanced the liberties bestowed on the Christian Patriarch at the conquest of Constantinople by Mohamed the Conqueror.

The speaker then traced the growth of Islamic culture under the Sultans of Turkey when scholars congregated in Constantinople.

The Crusades interfered with the growth of Islam, and later the discovery of the East Trade route and the route to America with the attending factors of the grab for gold by the Western nations, together with rise of Industrialism, and the ocean transport finally eclipsed the world of Islam. The Mongolian invasion was another serious blow to Muslim culture.

More recently, continued the speaker, the Islamic Orient was witnessing a revival. Ottoman principalities had risen after the war. Turkey was initiating an experiment in Western technique which the speaker felt was important in the aspect of Science that could usefully be imported in the East, while the other aspects of Western civilization might carefully be left severely alone. Egypt under Zaglul Pasha had improved much. Kemal Pasha himself recently was devoting his attention to religion, as could be seen from his visit to the mosque and his speech on Islam. "From all that we have taken from Europe I do not think, we have benefitted much. So a consultation as among doctors before a serious case of malady, should be held and it has become necessary. But the only important thing we have to import from the West is Science—Science with its rationalism, and its logic—Science that is the common legacy of mankind to-day," concluded the lecturer.

MARY BORDEN ON MARRIAGE.

Marriage requires a definite technique! that is more essential than any of the emotions supposed to guarantee its happiness, said Miss Mary Borden. One must know certain correct ways of handling marriage, the same as in playing the piano, printing a picture, or building a house. You cannot do any of these without using special thinking. An architect does not build a house simply by having a lovely dream, then sitting down and wishing a structure would rise out of the ground. Yet people about to be married think they will be happy, and everything perfectly lovely, simply because they wish it!

Practical experience—I have been married twenty-five years and am the mother of three grown-up children—has convinced me that a sound technique could steer most couples into happy marriage-land. For illustrative purposes let us consider the technique of marriage as a drama in five acts and an epilogue.

Act I would bring out that marriage is a social engagement—not a sex adventure. Matrimony is simply two lives side by side, a steady companionship in the arduous adventure of life and guarantee against loneliness.

It isn't half so boring as the life of those women who have a string of men friends. True, each one loves her while it lasts, but it is an endless repetition. Friendship with one man is far more interesting than friendship with those who come and go and drop out of your life altogether. The change-demanding type really have no staying powers and are shallow, unimaginative creatures.

In Act II, I would have the young couple realize that to marry for love is dangerous. Dangerous—but a risk worth taking! I am always on the side of the romantic girl who marries for love, not the cautious one after money. I believe in marrying for love, but how many know what love is? So many are often smitten by someone who has dimples or a pair of broad shoulders, trusting entirely to these notions when they are young and callow.

The danger in romance is greater than in monotony. It is no good for a woman to say: "Now that I'm married, I am safe!" You aren't! At no time can you sit back and say: "Now that I have married him I can do as I like. He's mine."

He isn't! People are still under the illusion that marriage is a stuffy, monotonous thing that will last for ever.

Act III would tell how to make it last. By making the standards of married life equal those that exist among friends, marriage should last longer. The standards among friends are much higher than those required of married people! We allow husbands and wives to be rude to each other, and say, "It's only his wife." But we don't stand by and let a man abuse a friend.

The woman who says, "It's no use having my hair done, the man coming home to dinner is only my husband," takes the trouble to look pleasant for her friends. She considers what they like to eat and what pleases them, or else they would not remain friends. We don't tyrannize them and say, "You must eat this milk pudding because it's good for me!" and tell them which of their own companions to drop. If a girl is sharing a flat with someone whose companions she does not like, she arranges to go out when they call and so does not meet them. Instead of doing this with her husband's friends, she rows and makes scenes. Thus women presume on the men they marry and think it doesn't matter.

Act IV shows that exclusive possession is a mistake. Curb your selfish instincts and see the other person's point of view. Most of us are blind to ourselves. Therefore it is a very good exercise to do the opposite of what you want. That leads to a measure of self-restraint.

A wife's duties in the home comprise Act V. Much unrest and discontent among young married couples are due to the fact that some women cannot cook. They hate housework and don't make their husbands comfortable. The world tends to be divided between home-workers and those who live in labour-saving flats and eat in restaurants, really communal kitchens. Many women have gone so far ahead in careers that they would simply hate to go back as wives. But the come-back-to-the-kitchen spirit must win out, for without family life marriages will not survive.

If ever the time should come when the State brings up the children, the institution of marriage will lapse and men and women drift apart.

I think young married couples should learn early that occasional separation is one of the best things for them. The joys of reunion after such separations always make for happiness, and these separations have a tendency to make each long for the other. If you can perpetuate that constant longing for a mate, there is little danger of the marriage going on the rocks.—Indian Nation.

DAVID EDUCATIONAL SCHOLARSHIPS FOR HARIJANS.

Mr. A. V. Thakkar, General Secretary, Harijan Seva Sangh, writes :

The David Educational Scholarships were instituted by the Harijan Sewak Sangha in July 1933, for encouraging the higher education of harijans. Higher education under this scheme means collegiate and University education only, general as well as technical and professional. Last year 46 such scholarships of the average value of Rs.12/4/- were awarded. The Harijan Sewak Sangha intends to grant 66 new scholarships this year, to enable Harijans to prosecute their higher studies in any educational institution recognised or approved by the Central Board. Forty-four ordinary scholarships of the monthly value of Rs. 10/- to Rs. 20/- will be awarded according to the merit of each applicant, due consideration being paid to his circumstances. Twenty-two scholarships of the monthly value of Rs. 15/- to Rs. 25/- have been reserved for industrial and vocational courses of study. Applications for scholarships shall be made to the General Secretary, Harijan Sewak Sangh, Birla Mills, Delhi. All applications for scholarships must be recommended by the Head of the institution to which a student belongs and supported by two respectable gentlemen belonging to the locality. Applications must reach the Head Office on or before the 31st of May 1934. Failed students or those enjoying Government or other scholarships need not apply. The scholarships are not awarded to students pursuing their studies in schools. Applications on prescribed forms, obtained from this office alone will be duly considered. A copy of rules for the administration of the David Educational scholarships can be had from the Head Office, free of charge.

STIMULATING SWADESHI.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri (President), Mr. M. Subbaraya Aiyar, (Treasurer), Dewan Bahadur C. V. Viswanatha Sastri, Dewan Bahadur M. Ramachandra Rao, Mr. V. M. Ramaswami Mudaliar, M. L. C., Mrs. Ammu Swaminathan, Mr. T. A. Ramalingam Chettiar, M. L. C., (Member of the Executive) and Mr. B. Shiva Rao, (Secretary.) The Buy Indian League, Madras, have issued the following statement :

"The Buy Indian League has been in existence for two years. During this period, in spite of various difficulties, lack of funds being the most pressing, it is our belief that the League has done appreciable good in stimulating the Swadeshi spirit through its many branches in the Presidency, and a number of successful exhibitions held at different centres. With the experience thus gained and the confidence that the work is on right lines and demands further development, we have decided to expand the League into a Board of Industrial and Rural Development. It need hardly be said that the Board will be absolutely non-partisan and non-political in character, and will seek the co-operation of local bodies, the Government and the public, without any distinction, whatsoever.

"We have been able to secure a large hall on the Esplanade in George Town (Opposite the High Court buildings) for a permanent Exhibition of Indian manufactures. Our chief aim will be to offer marketing facilities to the products of cottage industries in South India in particular, and to focus public attention on the problems of rural reconstruction. The success of our efforts will be the extent to which we are able to solve the problem of unemployment both amongst the working classes and the educated young men in South India. No problem the solution of which is necessary for rebuilding India's economic life will be outside the purview of the Board. In this task we shall both offer and seek the co-operation of officials and non-officials in the firm conviction that the work which we are undertaking is beyond the region of controversy.

"We shall emphasise, whenever and wherever possible, the co-operative principle. Some of our goods were on exhibition at the British Industries Fair at Birmingham this year, with results promising steady orders from abroad. The Board will endeavour to establish connections with institutions in other provinces working in similar lines in the hope that, at a not distant date there may be an All-India Board aiming at the revival of village life and rural development."

In a supplementary statement to the Press, Mr. B. Shiva Rao explains "that a number of prominent manufacturers have already taken up space in the new building. Its location on Esplanade is bound to prove attractive. We are sending a circular to all district boards and rural reconstruction centres to assist us in this work."

the International Research Library possible, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Junior, gave to the League of Nations the sum of two million dollars. So much progress has been made with the building that its equipment will begin in the autumn, and the Library will be open to readers early in 1935. No pains have been spared to make the Library the last word in efficiency and simplicity. Its first floor will be devoted to books and periodicals; the second floor will consist of a series of libraries—legal, economic, financial; while the third floor will have its accommodation in small rooms for researchers and students. The League Library will take rank with the great libraries of the world, and is certain to become the greatest international research centre. Already it has a nucleus of 180,000 volumes, and the rate of increase is 2,000 a year. And, of course, it will enjoy the advantage of being supplied regularly by all the Governments with their official publications.

The Rope Trick :—That the Indian Rope Trick never has been done, never can be done and never will be done is the conclusion reached by the Occult Committee of the Magic Circle. The Committee, which consists of experts in conjuring and occult practice, has carried out investigations into one of the world's most famous legends over a period of fifteen years. Scores of witnesses, who claim to have seen the trick, have been examined but the evidence of all of them has been rejected by the Committee. Nobody could be found who could perform the trick. The Committee's conclusion will be communicated to the meeting of the Magic Circle at London on April 30 at which Lord Ampthill is to preside. Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. Elliott, Chairman of the Committee, will describe the investigations which, he contends, have not produced any shred of evidence to show that the Rope Trick is not a myth. "Most of the evidence we heard was worthless. For example, one witness claimed to have seen it performed in the Madras Presidency by a troupe, which gave public exhibitions of it, but there was not a single reference to it in the contemporary press. Another witness, aged sixty, described in detail the performance of the trick which she claimed to have seen at the age of six. Yet another produced photographs, showing a boy at the top of a rope, which was found afterwards to be a bamboo. There remains the suggestion that the witnesses were hypnotised. To us, it is impossible to believe that anybody could induce hypnosis in a number of people, gathered round him and at some distance from him. Nor can normal people under the influence of ordinary suggestion believe in anything so impossible as the defiance of gravity."

Islamic Research in Bombay :—The first annual general meeting of the Islamic Research Association was held on Sunday at the house of the president, Mr. A. M. Mecklai. According to the annual report, as read by the Secretary, a series of works on Islamic subjects had been taken in hand, of which three volumes had been published and three more are expected to appear in the coming year. The chief aim of the Executive Committee is to publish an English translation of the "Introduction" (Mukaddima), the famous work on the philosophy of history by Ibn Khaldun, a contemporary of Temerlane, which is prescribed in many universities in India. The president, in his address, pointed out that many even highly educated Indian Muslims have not the slightest idea of the spiritual evolution of their community. Scientific research alone could remove the misunderstandings, prejudices and misconceptions which exist not only between the Muslim and other communities, but also among the different branches of Islam itself.

Russia and the League :—The Russia will be admitted as a member of the League of Nations at the next Assembly in September is the hope in the League circles. The question will be discussed when M. Litvinoff arrives shortly on the resumption of the disarmament talks. The serious obstacles, however, are: Firstly, the Soviet's preliminary stipulations to which some members find difficulty in agreeing and, secondly, Switzerland's obdurate refusal to recognise the Soviet.

Paper is not designed to satisfy Indian aspirations but to prevent their being satisfied in the near future. It is a "blocking" scheme.

Log Rolling:—The supporters of the Mody-Lees Pact in this country have claimed that it was instrumental in modifying the opposition of Lancashire to the White Paper. Sir Phiroze Sethna first put forward this plea. It was since repeated in the Legislative Assembly by its Indian sponsor, Mr. H. P. Mody. But neither Sir Phiroze Sethna nor Mr. Mody admitted that they made representations to the Lancashire Delegation with a view to getting their evidence altered. This, however, is what Sir Samuel Hoare suggested. He was certain that when the Committee investigated the case they would find that the alteration in the memorandum was due to representations by the Indian Delegation. This would mean that the Indian delegation offered certain concessions in trade to Lancashire in order to induce Lancashire to mitigate its hostility to Indian Constitutional reforms, as represented by the White Paper. The Indian Delegation were not authorised by any public body to undertake this task which was entirely outside their purview. If Sir Samuel Hoare is right, this, apart from the merits of the Pact, would be an instance of log-rolling. The Committee of Privileges will find information from the Indian point of view bearing upon the enquiry in the official report of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly on March 14. Mr. Ghaznavi said that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce submitted its statement which was very annoying. "I do not know," he added, "Why the President, Lord Linlithgow, postponed their examination from month to month, because in the agenda it was found that they were to have been examined in July, and it was postponed until after the recess." The House of Commons Committee will probably find that the Secretary of State for India was not quite discreet in meeting the manufacturers at the Derby dinner but that there is no proof that he wanted them to alter their memorandum.

A Serious Allegation.—In the House of Commons on Monday Lt.-Col. R. V. K. Applin, a Conservative member, asked the Secretary of State for India for the reasons for externing Lady Nethersole from Jammu and Kashmir; also whether she might now return home. Sir

A Breach of Privilege:—The adoption by the House of Commons on Monday of a motion by Mr. Winston Churchill to refer to the Committee of Privileges his allegation of a breach of privilege by Sir Samuel Hoare and Lord Derby in bringing pressure to bear upon the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to modify the draft of its evidence tendered to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, is of more than ordinary interest. Mr. Churchill pointed out that the evidence of the Chamber as it was drafted and circulated in June last year was entirely different from that eventually tendered before the Parliamentary Committee in December and he alleged that the change was brought about by Sir Samuel Hoare at a dinner given to Manchester representatives by Lord Derby. Sir Samuel Hoare contended that the change, which he admitted, was due to the representation of the Indian mill representatives whom the delegates from Manchester met in India. Mr. Hammersley, who was one of the latter, denied this and said that the original memorandum was not altered in consequence of the advice of the Delegation to India. On the contrary, the delegation advised that it was essential that safeguards should be included. The Speaker ruled that a prima facie case of breach of privilege had been made out. Government did not oppose and the motion was agreed to. Many people in India are under the impression that the opposition of Mr. Churchill to the White Paper is a tactical move to induce the Indian public to support it! The Anglo-Indian Press has certainly utilised it in precisely that way. It has held up Mr. Churchill as an inveterate die-hard and Sir Samuel Hoare as the champion of India doing battle to protect her interests. Indians, on the other hand, are far from being enamoured of the White Paper and they would not be plunged in inconsolable grief if Mr. Churchill and his friends succeed in shelving it. The scheme of that Samuel Hoare replied that the lady left Kashmir under an expulsion order issued by the Resident on the ground that she encouraged agitation against the State. Lt Col. Applin suggested that the lady was turned out because she protested against the public flogging of women which she witnessed. Sir Samuel Hoare replied that it was not in accordance with his information which showed that she was causing a great deal of trouble at a critical moment for Kashmir and it was necessary to expel her in the interests of safety. Thus far Reuter. The Indian public learns now for the first time that Lady Nethersole, evidently an Englishwoman who has made her home in Kashmir, was expelled by the order of the Resident. Col. Applin suggested that she was expelled because she protested against the public flogging of women which she witnessed. The Secretary of State, one would expect, would indignantly and categorically repudiate the suggestion as an outrage on the British name. His answer that it was not in accordance with his information, shows that he did not appreciate the seriousness of the charge. The public are left wondering what Lady Nethersole could have done to cause so much trouble as to justify the order of exclusion. Was there flogging of women in Kashmir or did the Conservative Colonel invent it?

Indians in U. S. A:—A Reuter's message of the 15th states that Dr. D. P. F. Ghadiali of Malaga, Ohio, who became a citizen of the United States in 1917, after serving in the American Army during the War, may be deported from the country on the ground that he comes under the ban against Asiatics. There seems to be some confusion in the mind of the correspondent who drafted this message. In the first place, so far as we know, there is no ban against Asiatics as much. Then Dr. Ghadiali is said to have served in the American Army before he became a citizen of the States. This on the face of it seems improbable. Then, again, he is said to have become naturalised in 1917. The American Government was reported to have cancelled the naturalisation of a few Indians shortly after the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Mr. Thin. But in the majority of cases they took no action. Recently, the Roosevelt Government has removed the restrictions on Indian students engaging in remunerative employment during their period of studies; and it was also reported that they have restored the citizenship of three or four persons who had been deprived of it. It is highly improbable that it will deport Dr. Ghadiali on the ground of his being an Asiatic. The Emigration Department makes no distinction between Parsis and other Indians. The point was made clear in a recent correspondence relating to the exact position of natives of India entering the States.

Well-Meant but Embarrassing:—We are afraid the well-intentioned action of members of the Legislative Assembly in asking Government to declare their intentions in regard to meetings of Congress organizations in view of Gandhiji's statement recommending the discontinuance of Civil Disobedience by Congressman except himself, has been more embarrassing than helpful to Congress leaders. Government's position, as stated by the Home Member in reply to a question from Mr. Ranga Iyer, is that they will raise no obstacle to meetings of the All-India Congress Committee, or, if the Congress leaders so prefer, of the Indian National Congress, for the purpose of ratifying the statement recently made by Gandhiji calling off civil disobedience. That is to say, every person who attends should virtually pledge himself beforehand to ratify Gandhiji's statement. There is no object in calling a meeting under such a condition. Government are taking no risks. They are not satisfied with gestures. They want undertakings which admit of no doubt and leave no room for different interpretations. Dr. Ansari's view that in making his statement Gandhiji's has been moved by magnanimity, is evidently not the Government view. In any case, they do not intend to be magnanimous.

Miss Rathbone and The Traffic in Arms:—

There was some liveliness at the annual meeting of Vickers last Monday, and Sir Herbert Lawrence, the chairman, had a troublesome quarter of an hour with his shareholders, writes the New Statesman and Nation, of the 31st March. "Miss Eleanor Rathbone, M. P., again raised the point first brought out in the House of Commons that Vickers were advertising tanks in the German press. She produced evidence, including a letter from the advertising manager of a paper, to refute Sir John Simon's statement in Parliament that the paper in question had a large public outside Germany. It appeared, in fact, that less than 800 copies went abroad. The advertisements, said Sir Herbert Lawrence, were designed for "their old and valued clients" in South America. The effect of this confession was somewhat spoiled by another shareholder observing that, if this were the sole object of the advertisements, for the same expenditure each of the old and valued clients outside Germany could be sent two circulars in his own language instead of one advertisement in German. Of course, nobody accuses Vickers of not playing fair according to the rules of the game. But what is the game—this game of private traffic in arms? Asked point-blank by Miss Rathbone to deny that Vickers were secretly rearming Germany and Austria, Sir Herbert replied: "I cannot give an assurance in definite terms of that nature, but I can assure you that nothing is done without the complete sanction and approval of your own Government." The shareholders were thus left with the comforting knowledge that if their company were aggravating the danger on the Continent, it was with the full support of the British Cabinet." The sale of armaments by private firms to belligerent nations has been for some time a live issue, at the Disarmament Conference. Miss Rathbone's protest though ineffective is a timely one.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, APRIL 21, 1934.

THE INTERNATIONAL KALEIDOSCOPE

It is refreshing now and then to take our minds off our own problems and to let them wander a while on happenings in other lands. It is also probable that the Indian constitutional problem may be determined by a shake of the international kaleidoscope after all the time and ingenuity spent on the White Paper. It is not only useful as a mental relaxation but it also gives us the right perspective of our special difficulties, to cast a glance at the world outside. The thing that most strikes one on a superficial survey of the changes in other countries, is their enormous magnitude. Ten years ago Russia was the pariah of the Western world. Nothing was too bad to be said of Soviet manners and morals. They were untouchable, unspeakable, unnameable. Soviet Russia has lived down all this. It has been recognised by all other Governments, the last to do so being the United States of America. Russia is now being persuaded to join the League of Nations, with a permanent seat on the Council the caste panchayat of Europe. Germany ten years ago was groaning under the weight of reparations. As a Power, great or small, she had ceased to exist. She had to cringe and fawn for favours from the other Powers. Today, Germany holds the centre of the European stage. Herr Hitler is treating the Treaty of Versailles as a scrap of paper. The country is permeated by the spirit of War. Sylvia Saunders, writing in the New Statesman and Nation, her impressions of what she saw during a recent visit to Germany, observes: "War is no longer spoken of as a possibility. Its eventual fields of action are often discussed—the Ukraine, the Rhine, alliance with Japan, a German base in the Pacific, and so on—over beer and skittle in a matter of fact way." Three million men and boys, she says, are already in uniform marching in excellent formation, drilling and parading every Sunday and on two evenings in the week. "The poster maps hang on all notice boards in schools and universities, in clubs and libraries. There are maps of Africa.... There are maps of Europe where the frontiers of Germany cover three-quarters of what is now Switzerland, all of Austria, the Italian Tyrol, bits of Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia, the ill-famed Corridor, Memel, Danzig, Eupen-Malmady, Schleswig and Alsace Lorraine. Death in war is the noblest death; Germany must be whole; flags half mast now, full mast then; the Day will dawn." While England, France and the United States have extended their hand of friendship to Soviet Russia, General Goering, the German Chancellor's devoted lieutenant, claims in his "Germany Reborn" that the victory of the Swastika has saved the world from Communism and that the day will come when the other countries will begin to realize this. Macaulay's estimate of the Italians to whom he compared the Bengalis in his essay on Warren Hastings, is well-known. That was a century ago. Ten years ago Mussolini was denounced as a charlatan. The European Press prophesied a speedy end of his career. Fascist Italy is to-day a Great Power. She is now an inspiration to many ardent young men in all countries including Britain. Britain itself has changed beyond recognition. Free Trade, the Gold Standard, Cabinet solidarity, for long regarded as sheet-anchors of the British State, have gone. The other day the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a surplus of £31 millions calmly announced that he has made no provision for the repayment of the War Debt amidst the cheers of a crowded Conservative House of Commons where even ten years ago the word "default" would have been received with loathing and horror. Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya, whose mere mention of 'repudiation' as a possibility at the Gaya Congress threw English publicists into hysterics, would have doubtless indulged in a bitter smile when he read Mr. Neville Chamberlain's statement. And Mr. De Valera also.

Most dramatic of all is the emergence of Japan into the place vacated by Soviet Russia as the greatest menace to World Peace. On Wednesday evening came the momentous announcement that Japan has proclaimed a Munro doctrine for the Far East. A statement issued by the Japanese Foreign Office in connection with the reports of proposals for joint international assistance to China, declares that Japan deems it her natural responsibility to maintain peace in the Orient. In view of the fact that the restoration of order in China depends on China herself, Japan will oppose any action by the Chinese Government which is contrary to the Peace of the Orient. Furthermore Japan will be forced to oppose any measure of other Powers likely to lead to disturbance of the peace in the Orient, like providing China with military planes, military instruction and political loans. The force of the statement lies not in the language which is extremely vague but in Japan's ability to support her own interpretation of it if the need arises by force of arms. That the declaration has not been made in a hurry and not a moment earlier than the preparedness of Japan would warrant, is clear from the patient determination with which she has advanced step by step to give effect to the suggestion first made to her nearly thirty years ago by Theodore Roosevelt, then President of the United States. These steps are recapitulated in one of its recent reports by the Foreign Policy Association of New York. It concludes: "The Tokyo aim of setting up a political and economic block composed of China, Japan, and Manchukuo constitutes a far-reaching bid for complete Japanese hegemony in the Far East. It proposes to squeeze European and American influence out of the Far East sufficiently to make the Japanese Monroe doctrine for Asia a reality." Whatever Japan does she does thoroughly. She allows no sentiment to stand in the way of her policy. We published last week an account of Japanese colonisation of Brazil. The Japanese Government advises its emigrants to adapt themselves completely to Brazilian ways even to the extent of becoming Catholic Christians. A new Japanese Ambassador was sent to the United States early this year. With reference to his choice General Sadao Araki, Minister for War, said: "In appointing our Ambassador to the United States at this important time, with the 1936 crisis ahead, such considerations as dignity, past career, equity and sentiment must be discarded and a man of ability chosen in the interests of the country." America has announced that her battle fleet would be withdrawn from Pacific Water. Soviet Russia will be satisfied if she gets a good price for her share of the Chinese Eastern Railway. It is natural that China should protest against the assumption of Japan that she alone should help her great neighbour. But no one else at present seems to be anxious to question it. Japan has timed her announcement with consummate calculation.

THE POLITICAL OUTLOOK.

Friends ask what I think of the political situation created by Gandhiji's statement withdrawing civil disobedience. I put it in that way because the All India Committee meeting and other formalities are of no importance except to lawyers who are politicians. As Gandhiji rightly said he is the one man who knows the science of civil disobedience. In any case, no one else is likely to attempt to supersede him in this job. To my mind, the withdrawal of civil disobedience had become inevitable and even unnecessary as the movement had withdrawn itself. If Gandhiji had not formally withdrawn it, the only result would have been that Congressmen would have been left without anything to do while the stream of Indian politics flowed past them. Gandhiji by his intervention has enabled them to have a finger in the pie. This decision would have been more useful from their own point of view if it had been made earlier. To all appearance, the earthquake started the idea of dropping non-co-operation and Dr. Ansari's deputation followed at the psychological moment. As a student and an onlooker, I can only regard the withdrawal of civil disobedience as an acknowledgment of its failure for the purpose for which it was intended. That being so, what do I think of the decision of Congressmen, whether as Congressmen or as Swarajists, to lift the boycott of the Legislatures and to seek election at the next opportunity? Here, again, I regard their action as the result of an exorable circumstance. Many of them have completely lost their faith in jail-going as a political weapon. Several of them have told me that the reason why so many men and women broke down in health this time was that the buoyant faith which sustained them in their captivity in 1930-31 was completely absent in 1932. The substitute activities of removing untouchability, promoting communal unity and, latest of all, Bihar relief, either do not appeal to them or they are not in a position to devote their whole time to them. The most conscientious of them, who are actually doing what little they can in these directions, are loth to put it forward as their contribution to the national cause in lieu of going to jail. Most of them have resumed their normal avocations. But there are others who hanker after public life and Council entry is the readiest means at hand. Will the electors send Swarajists to the Councils in as large numbers as they expect and their opponents fear? I can not say for certain. But there are some considerations which make this at least doubtful. What are they? Beginning from the south, the non-Brahmin Party is much too strongly entrenched in Tamil Nadu to encourage Congress candidates. Hindus are now divided acutely on the question of admitting untouchables into temples. Andhra is likely to favour Swarajist candidates to a larger extent but even there the non-Brahmin Ministerialists are a strong body. On the whole, the Madras Presidency is unlikely to return an overwhelming majority of Swarajists. The same considerations apply more or less to Maharashtra. The Karnatak atmosphere resembles that of Andhra. Gujarat will stand by any party which has the support of Gandhiji. The Central Provinces will follow Maharashtra except that the Hindi districts will be influenced by the preferences of Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj who will not differ light-heartedly from Gandhiji. The Punjab will prefer Hindu Sabhamen to Congressmen. Bengal will go against the Communal Award which it holds Gandhiji has foisted on it, and Congressmen who support it have few chances in the eighty constituencies remaining to them. As for the United Provinces, much will depend on whether Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru is in prison or outside and whether he approves of the Swarajists or not. Taking all things together, I do not think that the assurance of the Swarajist leaders that they will be able to repeat the precedent of the original Swarajists, is likely to prove well-founded. This is my analysis of the chances of the new Swaraj Party in the next elections. Much, of course, will depend on the candidates who oppose them. The Liberals are too timid and apologetic about their policy and principles and therein lies the main strength of the Swarajists.

All India Prisoners Aid Society:—An inaugural public meeting of the "All-India Prisoners' Aid Society" was held on Wednesday, the 11th April, at the Y. M. C. A. Hall New Delhi, Sir Abdullah-al-Mannan Suhrawardy presiding. Professor B. K. Ram Kalra, M. A., the Honorary Organising Secretary, explained the aims and objects of the Society. It was unanimously resolved to form the "All-India Prisoners' Aid Society" forthwith.

WANTED A PLANNED ECONOMY. *

(BY G. D. BIRLA.)

The condition in other countries during the last two years has decidedly improved and if the world buys more and our export trade and internal prices improve, we may as a result of that again reach the pre-depression level. But is this all that we want? Certainly not.

The pre-depression level itself was not a thing with which one could rest content. No civilised nation has got such a poor standard of living as India has even during the most prosperous days. Our most urgent need, therefore, is to bring about a substantial rise in our standard of living. And here one naturally feels inclined to ask why with our vast resources including supplies of idle labour we cannot raise our standard of living to a reasonable level. The reply is simple. We cannot improve our lot until we decide to take mass action, well thought out, well planned, as part of a scheme of co-ordination launched with the necessary authority to make it a success. Governmental intervention thus becomes necessary. But Government by themselves cannot do or achieve much. The co-operation of the people is essential to the success of any such scheme. The Government being the ruling authority must take the initiative and invite the latter to join hands with them in the endeavour.

I do not charge the Government with utter inaction. During the last decade several things have undoubtedly been done by them. For instance, they have pursued the policy of protection, now vigorously, now half-heartedly, and thereby done some good to industries and to agriculture, as in the case of wheat. The Imperial Council of Agricultural Research has been doing a lot of useful work. Fruit farming is being encouraged though on a very small scale. There is some talk of affording protection to dairy products. It is intended to launch a 'Drink More Milk' campaign—an absurd imitation of the British propaganda which overlooks the difference between the two countries, for while in England there is more milk and fewer stomachs to drink it, in India there are more stomachs and less milk to be drunk. 'Produce more milk' and not 'drink more milk' should have been the appropriate slogan for this country. The Government again is encouraging, though passively, the restriction of the jute crop though it does not tell the agriculturist what substitute crop he should grow. Similarly, the Government has helped in fixing a quota for tea exports and is even now thinking of helping the restriction of tea, jute and coal production. It does not, of course, give any thought to the question if it is not possible to usher in Recovery by a better way than destruction of crops, restriction of production and—control of births. A minimum price for sugar-cane is to be fixed. Trade pacts and fixation of zones for industries and a lot of such other things are up in the air. It is gratifying to note that the Government is getting more alive to the situation. The credit for giving a lead goes to Bengal and other provinces are now following suit. The Central Government too seems to have something in its mind and the European community too at long last has realised that something must be done to save the situation. It could not be said that the Government is not moving. It is undoubtedly moving but at a snail's pace and in spite of the assurance of the Finance Member to the contrary, without a plan. Tariffs, excise duties, fixation of zones and of minimum prices, restriction of production under rare circumstances, and Trade Pacts, all these could become part of a plan if there were one. But unless and until they form links in a chain with a purpose behind it they are not going to take us anywhere.

The Government knows the evil of drifting without a Plan. But it would not think of taking planned action. Probably this apathy on the part of the Government is due to the fact that the head of every department in the Secretariat has a five year plan of ruling and then retiring. Much the same could be said of the Burra Sahib in Clive Street, that "imperium in imperio" which none can afford to ignore in this country. The visions are thus limited to five years throughout which the one object of the man in authority in New Delhi is to maintain law and order and balance budgets and of the Clive Street Burra Saheb to retire leaving things as he found them; nothing altered, nothing disturbed. It seems to be nobody's business to visualize the problem as a whole and to plan its solution.

The result is that whatever we achieve, we achieve in a haphazard fashion and are not able to consolidate our position. We advance on certain fronts and recede on others. Take the case of the cotton industry itself. The present productive capacity of the Indian Mills is about 3,600 million yards, just equal to our present requirement of mill-made cloth—very low figure indeed for a population of 360 millions. But while on the one hand nearly 60 per cent. of the mills in Bombay are closed for want of markets and thousands are thrown out of employment, on the other hand we have entered into pacts with Lancashire and Japan to purchase from them cloth which we ourselves can produce. Under the pact with Japan, we are to sell to it cotton which under a planned system it should be possible to consume in India itself, thus making possible even a greater supply of clothing to the people. Then take the case of the Jute industry. We are supposed to have turned the corner and just now are working on a fair margin. But could it be said that the position is healthy? We are working with 15 per cent. of our looms sealed and only 4 days in a week thus curtailing production by nearly 40 per cent. Not only have thousands of workers been thrown out of employment, but their wages also have been reduced on account of curtailed production. While this is the condition of the old Mills who are producing only 60 per cent. of their total capacity, their agreement to work on a restricted scale is bringing into existence new Mills many of whom are working double shift and making good profits. The new Mills are multiplying in number. The crisis is bound to come to a head some time and if the demand from foreign countries does not expand, then the trade has to be shared between the existing Mills old and new, which may mean a curtailment of their production by 50 per cent. as against the existing 40 per cent. What can be a greater waste of capital and energy than this? Why should money be blocked in an industry which is already idle to the extent of 40 per cent. of its productive capacity? Under a planned system capital would be diverted into channels where it is more urgently required and not allowed to be wasted through duplication or other causes. Taking the case of raw jute, we find that we are exporting nearly 40 lakhs bales which is manufactured in other countries and then consumed. If we work our Mills double shift we can consume all the raw jute produced in India and thus wrest the territory at present held by foreign manufacturers providing not raw but manufactured jute to those who are at present manufacturing a part of their requirements themselves. Whether it is a practical proposition has to be investigated. But it has not been done so far because there is no authorised agency to act in this behalf. Instances could be multiplied. We are producing things which we cannot sell while there is a great scarcity of things badly wanted. There are millions of unemployed wanting work and there are millions who have to go without having some of the most elementary needs of life satisfied. Can't we provide employment to those who are unemployed and thus feed the unfed, cloth the unclothed and shelter the unsheltered? We can, only if we have a plan and the necessary authority to execute it.

But let us clearly understand that there can be plans and plans. Plans after all can only be based on ideas. The word Planning in itself can have no attraction. It has become popular on account of its good associations, but planning can be for good as well as for ill and therefore unless we are clear about the goal and the ways of reaching it, glib talk on the subject might lead us and the country astray. If we go to our architect with vague ideas and ask him to make a plan, he can do very little for us. To obtain the necessary help we have to tell him the kind of house we want—and the cost at which we want it. The expert can then produce a sketch which could be discussed, revised and adopted. In the case of National Economic Planning too, we have to work along the same line. But I should like to say this that we do not want experts from outside to tell us what plans we should or should not have. If we in India do not know our own problem, then I maintain no one knows it.

We have to decide for instance, what sort of social conditions we would like to see established. What is the standard of living we should aim at and what should be the methods which we must employ to achieve it? Let us deal with the question of the standard of living.

The object of Economic Planning should be in a layman's language to bring about maximum prosperity with a reasonable amount of effort. But there is a limit beyond which the standard of living cannot be raised without adopting unjust means. And as being a subject nation, we realise this truth more keenly than any one else, we do not aspire to any unduly high or luxurious standard of living which can be attained only through exploitation, one form or another, of the labour of others. India is a subject nation and she has no design to subjugate others. She cannot, therefore, afford to have an unduly high standard of living. Those who think that India, without any colony to feed or slave for her, can attain the standard of western countries, are labouring under a gross illusion. We can depend only on our labour, which means that a standard of living which amounts to economic parasitism must for ever be ruled out of our thoughts. At the same time, I have not the least doubt that we can have sufficient to meet all our requirements, with ample leisure for recreation. Our primary needs are two decent square meals of sufficient nourishment, say, of well-balanced 2,000 calories per head per day, with plenty of vitamins, so far as food goes; sufficient clothing, say, about 55 yards per capita, and sufficient housing accommodation to shelter us. And all this we can have without much ado by our own exertion if national effort is directed in the right channel.

British Fascists Against White Paper.

The Fascist movement was against the White Paper policy root and branch, declared Sir Oswald Mosley speaking at Stoke-on-Trent. It was the duty of England to remain in India and govern India which owed everything to British rule.

INTER-CASTE MARRIAGE.

(By Miss MAYA DEVI, Mysore.)

Educated men and women imbued with modern thoughts and high aspirations are going forward with thoughts of social reform, but when they arrive at the point of the parties' own choice in marriage and a lovable union, they are at a deadlock. In recent years our Indian women have shown remarkable intuition in many things but are cornered in this point of seeking their own happiness. Whether franchise for women is given or not, they find it a better way to see things for themselves, to be intelligent, organisers, liberal minded, and self-reliant, in all matters of the world's life. Their minds are open now to free themselves from ancient ritual custom, which they are able to judge. Yet they cannot decide or choose and are humbly led to the altar and unequally yoked.

How bitter a thing it is, to look into happiness through others' eyes, not chosen by them, but chosen for them. Speaking of marriage arranged in in the orthodox way, are such unions congenial to the souls thus joined? It may or may not be. It is a law fulfilled and they must submit to the yoke. It is a law laid down by the ancients and it is in continuity with all its glory. Sometimes the couple are so young, the bride in most cases a wee tot and an aged bridegroom as recently denounced in Ahmedabad. This infant girl hardly realises the ceremony of marriage as a serious affair. It is a gay feast or a doll's play. She gets habituated to the customary life of a slave like drudgery, a dreary existence, with obedience, respect, reverence and awe for her partner in life.

This child-wife has her training in her mother-in-law's house—a training-ground, where she is initiated into the ways of elderly women's untiring gossip and ideas. When girls in European countries are at schools and academies, to enlighten their minds, the East rears wee tots, as step-mothers, grand-mothers and grand-aunts. As days creep on and these tots grow up, there seems to be no companionship, no conversation with the husband. No judging things together, for they merely live to fulfil a certain condition in life. It is not the ancient life. Now with its education and culture, man wants a proper companion in life. He cannot bear the monotony of the individual in his own corner without some one to brighten his tired moments. He wants to cast aside awe, reverence, shyness and strangeness in his own home. It is almost a tragedy when two people who are joined together in wedlock without love do not see the humour of the same things. Life is too short to make sacrifices for scruples. If this arrangement is to continue without any modification, how then did Sati grow instinct? The devotion and constance of Indian wives is unparalleled. Love, even though it came later, was faithful, true and virtuous. Love to our Indian mothers is a Divine Ordinance. This faithful devotion led them to sacrifice their virtuous bodies willingly as Sati. 'Sati' means truth and virtue. From time immemorial, this ancient custom of Sati was revered and worshipped by our society. Every girl was taught that 'Sati' was a virtue. It was an enlightened custom to mingle her ashes with her Lord's, to save her from degradation, sorrow, and dishonour, for the widow there was no other prospect in view of a life happy and sublime. She had no other refuge, the one man her protector, her tower of strength, her defender.

Marriages with caste restrictions and arrangement by blind choice should be nullified. A highly educated man from one of the best Universities of Europe and England, on arrival in India found to his surprise that a marriage had been arranged for him by his parents. Having been for 7 years in the West, with the life, manners, ideas and customs of the West, he scoffed at such an idea and demanded that he should see his would-be-bridal but the family people ridiculed and snubbed him, saying that it was not customary for such an action. It was the law fulfilled and he must succumb to it. He was confounded and the marriage took place according to traditional ideas and customs. He was discontented, worried, and sad to find the uneducated, and ignorant bride they had chosen for him.

Many complain of this woe some tragedy in their everyday life. There seems to be no harmony in such arranged marriages among their own caste and community strictly confining it to caste restriction. In Europe, Great Britain and America men and women of different nations and sect fall in love, utterly regardless of community, sect or race. There is the great social evil called Dowry, a bargain, a stock-exchange. A bride-groom gets riches and an education abroad. He buys love from a strange girl whether educated or illiterate. Men yield to gold first, the greed for gold; you ask, you crave, you dream of the future it holds and brings you. This is the sting of Dowry. The lovely birds are the brides adorned and decked. The trap is the dowry, the net is loveless marriage and the fowler the greedy-eyed bridegroom. That covetousness, that greed for gold, is more necessary for him than the love of the brides.

This is love bought, not given, it is just a barter for gold. Dowry entraps the rich, fair bejewelled bird into a loveless marriage and the chief actor is a Ghatak. Not the man or woman who are treading on life's future. They are a Revelation to each other. They drag on to a lucky or unlucky union. Love may come in the hereafter as happy instances in some cases but not all.

People suffer from this ancient tyranny, rather than revolt against it. If a true understanding between the man and the woman, based on a moral and intellectual affinity, with community of ideals in life, exists, then it would ensure the happiness of a bright future. The only thing that can invest marriage with a meaning profound and sublime worthy of a man is inter-caste marriage. So perhaps, orthodox cults, and customs may not move smoothly along with the trend of progress in these modern days.

The present day world is hankering for such a recognised Law. Why should there be any contending factions to dispute such an ideal love. Still, we have heard lately of many communal weddings purely through choice and love. A pure love arising from the heart would entail a mixed marriage. It should be a social uplift—utterly regardless of any obstacle, age, status, creed, caste or family resolutions. Think of these ancient days in history, when men as warriors of fame, bravery and trust won their wives. It is said that King Draupada sent a proclamation far and wide, to the effect, that he who strings the bow and shoots the mark with the arrows he shall obtain his daughter. Have you not also read of the untiring efforts of the Raja of Vijanagar to win Pretal the fair maiden of the village? He was a great Ruler and she was the daughter of a poor Sudra, a Ryot. Those were days of chivalry. The fundamental theory of a blissful marriage, is choice with love. The real affinity of the two natures, if it is going to be love abiding, in reality and truth, for without love it cannot be lasting.

Man is the best judge to choose his own wife whoever she may be. He is the maker of his own destiny. He has to use his own sense, to choose his own wife, to make his home beautiful and to be a loving companion. His future depends on his own making and not by others. He is the Master Mariner on their joint voyage over life's troubled seas. They both must know how they steer their course, over the fathomless waves, and anchor in their desired heaven. Let them show, how the humblest cottage, can become the home beautiful, where there would be love and happiness, where she would be a well trained and efficient mother to train, rear and tend her child carefully. This is the personal responsibility of each man and woman. One must realize that the present system of marriage, which is an observed law, is perfectly unendurable because in addition to the illiterate, superstition of the priest ridden caste, there is the low unintellectual and prejudicial status assigned to women Purdha. Two bogies 'Purdah and caste.' How then can a man have the consciousness to marry one whom he likes and take her whom the family will repudiate as outside the pale of their community. This is caste, Caste the great cankerworm gnawing at the roots of progress of a growing nation of men and women.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.*

In her address to the Alwaye Union Christian College Conference, Mrs. Kalyanikutti Amma made a fighting speech which deserves the attention of our reactionary menfolk. She declared roundly that the modern women 'will reverence not a Sri Rama who so grievously wronged his devoted wife but a Ram Mohan Roy, a Lenin or a Pandit Jawaharlal.' Our religious people who will never dream of treating their wives with the chivalry of Rama will be shocked at these impious sentiments. But, we have no doubt that Mrs. Kalyanikutti Amma speaks for an ever increasing number of Indian women who are chafing at their bondage of centuries and the only way by which the men of India can avoid a disastrous sex conflict is to appreciate and encourage the growing self-respect of our women and their thirst for freedom and equality.

Mrs. Kalyanikutti Amma referred to the reaction that is coming over Europe as represented by Herr Hitler's ruthless drive against women. It will not do to brush aside this phenomenon as a mere aberration in the progress of humanity. It is better to analyse and find out the causes of the setback. We are inclined to think that this reaction is partly due to the European women's disregard of natural facts in their craze for paper equality. Real equality between man and woman can be established only when both recognise the holy but burdensome task of motherhood that is laid upon women by an inscrutable providence. When this central fact is given its due importance and proper provision is made for it, it will be possible to establish genuine equality. Thus, it cannot be the right for a mother to leave her child to slave at a typewriter at an office. Education, nursing and house-keeping appear to be natural and necessary occupations allotted to woman in the economy of nature as manual and mental drudgery for man. Gifted women should have as much freedom as gifted men to follow their special vocations but in the bulk, the occupations of the sexes will have to follow the natural lines if society is to be stable. The path of wisdom seems therefore to lie in making society realise the honourable and precious work done by the women in the home and the kitchen rather than take it for granted that these are ignoble tasks compared with the professions in which men are usually engaged.

The present economic structure of society is mainly to blame for this distortion of values. If rights of property are justified at all, it is evident that women should be given a preferential share in view of her inevitable duty. If women is to-day a kitchen drudge and a domestic slave, it is chiefly because man is also the property owner.

HINDU CULTURE.

(By W. BALENDRA.)

The genius of a people is reflected by its religious culture. The religion of Hinduism was fashioned out to satisfy the needs of the people of India, and the Hindu culture suited the temperament of the people admirably. This culture is more than 4000 years old. Apart from the records available in Tamil literature, archaeologists have proved that the Indus Valley civilisation unearthed 15 years ago by Sir John Marshall is essentially Hindu in culture.

Truths and half-truths have been uttered for several decades about Aryan superiority and non-Aryan inferiority. We have been told by Aryan historians that the Aryans are the only peoples who fashioned out a progressive and civilised culture, and there is no virile culture worth considering seriously in modern times amongst non-Aryan peoples. The recent activities amongst the Mongolian races and the discovery of the Indus Valley civilisation have caused these Aryan historians to pause and reorganise their teachings.

Tamil historians always claimed that India was civilised before the Aryan invasion; and Siva worship along with all civilised habits of music, literature and arts, existed in the Dravidian civilisation of South India. This claim was not accepted in the proper spirit and even Oriental scholars of the School of Manu - Williams and Hopkins—were not prepared to accept this Dravidian claim to a highly developed culture before the Aryan conquest of India. In the light of the findings at Mohenjo Daro, valid proof has been found that a civilisation existed in India before this supposed Aryan contribution to human refinement.

The Hindu culture is the sum total of the experiences of man, dating back at least 4000 years. This civilisation has no rigid dogmas. It is prepared to examine and accept anything which is rational and which ennobles man. This tolerance and its open-mindedness accounts for its permanency, and as this culture satisfied the needs of the people inhabiting India 4000 years ago, it is satisfying the needs of their descendants living today.

The Dravidian races are contributing their share to this culture. The Aryan races are exerting themselves to regenerate this culture and adapt to the twentieth century needs; for the present needs are different to those 1000 years ago. It is the Hindu culture which spread its wings all over Asia. The Dravidians had developed a philosophy, art, and literature in South India. The Aryans descended on the plains of India some 3500 years ago and contributed their Vedic culture to the already thriving Dravidian civilisation. The Aryan invasion cannot be exactly called a conquest. It was an assimilation and purification of the Dravidian culture. The Aryans accepted the Dravidian Gods and Goddesses and the Dravidians were prepared to learn at the feet of Aryan teachers. This confluence of cultures produced a symbiotic phenomenon. There was no parasitism on either side. The Upanishadic teaching was a distinct contribution to human uplift. The Bhagavad Gita satisfied the intellectual needs of the advanced classes. Even today the teachings of the Gita can stand the critical examination of sociologists, psychologists and theologians.

One of the critical periods of Hinduism was about 2500 years ago. The culture was at a low ebb due to lack of energetic personalities to set the necessary impetus to dignify human thought and action.

Superstition was mixed with reason and there was a tendency to over-estimate temple rituals and undervalue right conduct. It was at this right period of intellectual ferment that the teachings of Gautama the Buddha gained ascendancy. The teachings of the Buddha were not new. The Buddha was a Hindu reformer and attempted only to purge the evils of expensive temple rituals and emphasise the value of right belief, right aspiration, right speech, right conduct, right mode of livelihood, right effort, right mindedness, and right rapture. These teachings are the via-media between extremes of self-indulgence and self-mortification.

The whole gamut of Hindu thought reveals the attempt of man to civilise himself. Hindu rituals portray the march of events of man trying to understand the Unknown. The ancient Hindus feared the Deity and fashioned grotesque idols. Later they loved the Deity and created idols of more pleasing appearances. In the effort to understand rationally life and death, they conceived the idea of Siva-Natarajah, the dancer depicting the cosmic energy. The Siva-Natarajah cult is a Dravidian conception; the teaching of the Gita is an Aryan contribution and the fusion of the two schools of intellectual beliefs of life and death produced the more mentally advanced Hindu beliefs of the modern age. The knowledge evolved by observation and reasoning was codified in the Upanishads. Some observations and conclusions were puerile, whilst others satisfied the more mentally developed section of the Hindus.

Modern archaeological research is leading to the conviction that there were cultural communications between the ancient Hindus and the Mongolians across Tibet and Nepal. The Mongolians were conversant with Vedic knowledge before the time of the Buddha, and the modern Japanese race acknowledge that Hindu Sanskrit literature influenced the religion of their ancient forefathers.

The teachings of the Buddha spread to Ceylon, Siam, Burma, Java, China and Japan because the Hindu civilisers had already prepared the way beforehand with their Vedic teaching. Even today after thousands of years, the works of Hindu colonists in building stupendous monuments in honour of their culture and religion are seen in Java, and Indo-China.

At one period the teachings of the Buddha permeated the whole of India and Ceylon. The temperamental differences of the Singhalese race from the original founders of the Hindu religion made the reformed teachings of the Buddha more acceptable to them.

Behind the teaching of the Buddha, there are 1000 years of Hindu tradition. The Hindus developed their belief of life and death from the primeval man. They notice the difference in the mental calibre of man and formulated the "Varuna Ashrama Dharma;" for all man are not equal either in spiritual or physical vigour. They recognised a unity in diversity and when they codified the caste system, the Hindus did not do so with a view to disparaging man. They only attempted to fit man into social niches in proportion to their mental and physical development. Some are intellectual others are martial in temperament. A section has a genius for trade and another section is only fitted to be serfs. The Hindus realised the biological fact that all men are unequal and, therefore, in their civilisation catered to the different wants of all these sections.

The Buddha was the first reformer to question these beliefs and His teachings were readily followed by an intellectual section of the Indians. It cannot be denied that India reached her pinnacle of greatness during, and 500 years after, the time of that great teacher. The Tamils in South India and the Singhalese in Ceylon were following the precepts of that great teacher at one time, for Buddhism did not divest itself from Hindu tradition. For all great achievement in man, centuries of tradition and training are necessary. Ceylon and India are culturally one; for by tradition the peoples of these lands are Hindus. The Tamils reverted to the ancient Vedic teachings because they are temperamentally suited to acknowledge the values of temple rituals in their social customs. Mere cold reasoning did not satisfy their emotions. The Singhalese still follow the precepts of the great reformer but in their temple ceremonies, their social customs and manners a permanent imprint of Hindu culture can be traced. Man is a creature of his traditions, and it is not possible to root out the beliefs of his behaviour-patterns easily.

Culturally the Singhalese Buddhists and Tamil Hindus are one and can combine for a common cause. Racially and linguistically they may be different, but tradition and culture are as important as race and language.

The twentieth century can be compared in some ways to the period of Buddhist reformation. This century is an age of intellectual ferment. Half-truths and untruths taught by historians and propagandists are examined critically and accepted at their own values. Nineteenth century Indians and Ceylonese accepted en masse every article and belief which originated from Europe. The twentieth century Indians and Ceylonese pause and question seriously the why and wherefore of things. The teachings of Gandhi threaten to revivify Hindu culture. Gandhi is attempting to purge the defects of the religion as Gautama the Buddha attempted at a previous age. The teachings of the Buddha are interpreted by him as propounded by the great reformer but he is careful not to overstep his mark. Gandhi has based his life on the bedrock of Hindu tradition. Hindu culture keeps its flame active and burning by teachers of the type of the Buddha, Sankara, Madhva and Gandhi.

The Singhalese and the Tamils may be different racially and linguistically but culturally they are one.

In the cultural problems which are awaiting solution in the twentieth century, the contribution of Hindu civilisation must be considered as one of the great forces which will energise the Asiatics to action again.

SOCIAL LEGISLATION IN BARODA.

In 1928 the Baroda State Legislative Council appointed a select committee to revise all the Acts relating to Hindu Law. The committee after labourious work submitted its recommendations to the Legislative Council some time back. The committee adopted the decisions reached by the Legislative Council on the recommendations of the Govindohai Committee appointed for revising the law relating to the rights of Hindu women over property. Other important recommendations related to amendments in (1) the Hindu Inheritance Act, (2) Hindu Undivided Family Act, (3) Hindu Disposition of Property Act, (4) Hindu Marriage Act and (5) the Hindu Adoption Act. These recommendations with certain alterations were recently sanctioned by his Highness the Maharaja Sahab.

The first important amendment is with regard to the rights of Dasiputras to inherit. Until now the dasiputras in the Shudra community inherited their fathers' and other relatives' property along with the legitimate sons, and became members of the joint family. In the three higher communities, the Dasiputras had a right to maintenance only and no right of inheritance. The law is now made uniform and Dasiputras now have only a right to maintenance in all the communities. The Dasiputras' right of inheritance and of membership of the joint family among the Shudras is taken away. (This reform makes the law uniform among all the communities.)

The second important change is about the liability of the survivors for the debts of the deceased coparcener. The law until now was that the survivors would not be liable for such a debt unless the undivided interest of the deceased coparcener was already charged or attached in execution of a decree during his lifetime. The law is now altered and it is laid down that even if the undivided interest of a deceased coparcener is not charged or attached during his lifetime, the other coparceners taking by survivorship will be liable for the debts to the extent of the interest which the deceased coparcener had at the time of his death.

The law until now did not allow a Hindu coparcener to dispose of by will his undivided share in the joint family property. This restriction is removed and coparceners have been given the right to dispose of by will their undivided share in the joint family property.

The most revolutionary change made is in the Hindu Law of Marriage. Until now the Hindu law as administered in Baroda allowed marriages between Hindus belonging to the same Varna. Intercaste marriages i. e. marriages between a bride belonging to a lower caste and a bridegroom belonging to a higher caste and between a bride belonging to a higher caste and a bridegroom belonging to a lower caste were held to be valid only if custom recognised such marriages as valid. In the absence of custom such marriages were held to be invalid. Parties belonging to different castes were compelled to resort to the Civil Marriage Act if they wanted to marry. This restriction of Varna is now removed so that a Hindu belonging to any caste will now be at liberty to marry a girl of any other Hindu caste without having recourse to the Civil Marriage Act. It is hoped that this change will facilitate such marriages and thereby accelerate the movement towards unity among Hindus of all communities.

The Hindu Adoption Act is also amended in conformity with the amendment made in the Hindu Marriage Act referred to in the foregoing paragraph. Until now the law allowed the adoption of a boy who belonged to the community to which the adoptive parents belonged. It is now laid down that if the adoptive parents belong to the same Varna, the adopted son shall also be of the same Varna; but if the adoptive parents are not of the same Varna, the son to be adopted shall be from the family of the adoptive father.

Some other minor changes have been introduced in Hindu Law but it is not necessary to refer to them at length.

Japan and British Trade:—The Association of British Chambers of Commerce, at the annual meeting, passed a resolution, regretting the breakdown of the Anglo-Japanese textile talks, adding that if early agreed measures cannot be relied upon, Government must take whatever action is open to secure stable markets for British exports faced with Japanese competitions. Mr. Bond, President of the Manchester Chamber, preferred to wash out Governmental conferences unless speedy results were likely. He declared, however, that if Japan, in currency, mercantile and labour questions, could avoid thrusting upon the world price levels, incompatible with the standards of life elsewhere, she would find in us her well-wishers, co-operators and not hostile critics. — Router.

SINO-AMERICAN POINTS OF CONTACT. *

(BY DR. BERTHOLD LAUFER.)

About a hundred and fifty years ago Americans first came in direct contact with Chinese when the American ship "Empress of China," sailing from Boston and rounding the Cape of Good Hope, cast anchor in the harbour of Canton. This occurred in the year 1784, under the reign of the great Emperor Ch'ien Lung, who was a contemporary of George Washington. Thus Americans were late arrivals—in fact, the last of foreign peoples to enter into commercial and political relations with China. Europeans—first the Portuguese, then the Spaniards, Hollanders, British, and French—had preceded them by several centuries. It is no empty saying that from the first days of Sino-American intercourse, the two great countries have been linked by bonds of sympathy which have not existed and do not exist between China and any European power. These bonds of sympathy and friendship have been strengthened from year to year, as witnessed particularly by the ever-increasing number of Chinese students and scholars annually flocking to our universities, athirst for knowledge.

What, then, have Americans and Chinese in common? I think a goodly number of very fine traits. First, the spirit of democracy which has pervaded China for more than two thousand years, ever since the First Emperor Chin Shi smashed the old feudal system. The principle of government for the benefit of the people certainly is American, but it is equally Chinese and goes back to the fourth century B. C., when Meng-tse (Mencius), the most gifted of Confucius' disciples proclaimed the doctrine, "The people are the most important in a nation, and the sovereign is the least important of all." Second, the spirit of religious tolerance. I know of no more tolerant nation than the Chinese. Third, the lack of a caste system and lack of a hereditary nobility. China was always guided and governed by an aristocracy of intellect, not of birth; the old system of free competition by civil service examinations recruited the best talent from all ranks of society. Fourth, American and Chinese do not suffer from the obsession of that great evil, the race superiority complex; they are averse to armed force; they are friends of peace and are animated by a deep sense of justice and fair play toward all, regardless of race, colour or creed. Fifth, and this is the greatest asset that the two nations have in common, they have an unbounded, almost religiously fanatic faith in the power of education and knowledge as the best guarantors of progress, as the best possible safeguards of the permanence of their social structure and institutions. With this capital of a common historical tradition and mentality—democracy, tolerance, equality, justice, and education—we are well prepared to stand the test and stress of the time.

Aside from these ideals, there are culture elements inherent in the two civilizations that establish a common basis for a harmonious social life and sympathetic fellowship among representatives of the two nations. In reflecting on cultural similarities between Americans and Chinese, it is advisable to proceed from realities and direct observations. A white man who is in a good state of health is able to live in China in a house of Chinese style with a Chinaman not only for years, but a lifetime, without suffering impairment or injury to his health. Chinese houses are very much like our own; their plan of arrangement comes very close to that of the ancient Roman house.

From "Open Court," Monograph on China.

Rooms are airy, spacious and well ventilated, and comfortably stocked with tables, chairs, armchairs, settees and sofas. There is no other nation in the world whose house furniture offers so complete and striking a coincidence with our own. In fact it is one of the amazing points of culture history that of all nations of Asia the Chinese is the only one that takes its meals seated on chairs around a table, in the same manner as we do. This custom was acquired by the Chinese only in comparatively late historical times. The ancient Chinese so down to the epoch of the two Han dynasties used to squat at mealtimes on mats spread over the ground in the same way as it is still customary with the Japanese and the peoples of India. The remarkable step leading to the use of raised chairs and high tables was taken in the period between the Han and T'ang dynasties as a sequel of many foreign influences that came from Central Asia at that time, and speaks volumes in favour of Chinese adaptability and readiness to adopt foreign institutions. The Japanese with all their temperamental changeability still adhered to the old primitive custom of sitting cross-legged on the mats covering the floors of their rooms; and, while an American, for the sake of curiosity or experience may enjoy living in a Japanese home for a few days or weeks, he will never acquire the Japanese mode of sitting which is a source of physical discomfort.

The objection may be interposed that many travellers and adventurers in almost all parts of the world have conformed to the life of the natives whom they set out to explore. Such examples indeed are numerous. Any normal individual of good physique and temperate habits is able to live wherever other human beings of whatever race can exist, whether they be Eskimos, American Indians, South Sea Islanders, Pygmies or Negroes, Berbers or Beduins; but such adventures are usually transient, and the explorer will always be glad once his task is accomplished to return into the harbour of "civilization." Speaking of myself it fell to my lot to live for many months among such primitive folks as the Gilak and Ainu of Saghalin Island, the Golde and Tunguisian tribes of the Amur region sharing their huts or spending the night in the open sleeping on a bearskin, living like them on salmon and game, even amid smallpox and trachema epidemics, without any harm to my health, save a temporary discomfort from parasitic insects. I could not, however, have stood this sort of life for a number of years, and while I enjoyed studying these tribes and gathering data concerning their daily life, languages, folklore and religion, I can not say that I felt at home with them, at least not so intimately, as I do feel at home with the Chinese. It was also my good fortune to spend a year and a half among the Tibetans, both the nomads and the agriculturist, just living like one of them, and while the Tibetans have my unstinted sympathy, the time I should be willing to dwell in their midst will always be one of restricted duration. The lesson to be retained, therefore, is that a robust man with a definite object in mind may live anywhere without hazard of life and welfare within a limited period, whereas no such time limit is attached for us to China. Again, it can not be doubted that many white individuals have settled women as their wives even adopting native speech, clothing and habits and thus ending their days. Examples of this kind are not typical, however, and such individuals have usually been fugitives, cast-aways, tramps, derelicts or sailors cast adrift.

In order to settle among the Chinese, no foreigner need feel anxiety about his health, at least no more than if he stayed at home, nor does he require the explorer's physical fibre. China beckons to the man of culture and the more cultured he is, the more welcome and the happier he will be there, since the Chinese are highly cultured, well-bred and well-mannered people. Even most Chinese farmers and labourers are gentlemen, and from many of them many a so called gentleman in our midst could learn a useful lesson in good manners or etiquette.

One of the most remarkable inventions ever made by the Chinese is the Chopsticks, "the nimble ones," as they are called in Chinese, the invention of which goes back to the days of the Chou dynasty. Chopsticks are not only characteristically Chinese but also set the Chinese people clearly off from other nations of Asia that are still in the habit of taking food to their mouth with their fingers, which is even done by so highly civilized people as those of India, Annamese Koreans, Japanese, and other peoples who came under the spell of Chinese civilization, adopted from the latter the use of Chopsticks. It is self-evident that these make for good table-manners, which are the first criterion of a civilized individual; and whatever opinions we may hold on the Confucian system of ethics, it is undeniable that it has at least brought about the one good effect to transform the majority of the people into a body of highly decent, respectable and well-bred men. The sanctity of the home and the purity of family life belong to the greatest achievements of Confucian social ethics. For all these reasons, official and personal intercourse of Americans with Chinese is easy and a source of pleasure. Their sense of humour, their delight in story-telling, their conversational flights and oratorical power are other qualities that will not fail to make a strong appeal and endear them to us the closer we get acquainted. At Chinese parties there is less formality than in our country.

Their eminent faculty of assimilating and absorbing foreign racial elements has struck many observers. In fact the Chinese no more than any other nation represent a pure race. The northern Chinese have a strong admixture of Tungustion, Mongol and Turkish blood; the southerners have to a great extent intermarried with the aboriginal tribes which preceded the Chinese as owners of the country. The question of intermarriages of Chinese and whites is naturally a delicate one, and it would be futile to generalize on so vital and large a problem; but if limited personal experience and observation may count a little, I may say that many happy marriages of Europeans and Americans with Chinese women have come within my notice. There is no gulf separating the two races, and there are no obstacles of a racial or cultural character in the way of such unions. The offspring of American fathers and Chinese mothers belong to the best citizenry of China, and commanding the two languages as they do, they make the best liaison officer to maintain and strengthen the bonds between East and West. Many of these Eurasians are splendid fellows, and I have found in them the most willing and enthusiastic helpmates in scientific investigations.

As an analyst of human nature I should be the last to deny that there are psychological differences between Chinese and ourselves. These, however, do not spring from a basically divergent mentality or psyche but are merely the offset of a distinct set of traditions and education based upon the latter. As the grasp of ancient traditions upon their minds will gradually loosen and as the best in our institutions and inventions will be adopted (I advisedly shun the ambiguous and much misused word "Progress"), these small divergences will gradually disappear or be reduced to a minimum. The abandonment of feet-binding and opium-smoking may be cited as relevant instances. The student of anthropology who has learned to fathom and to understand the customs and usages of every people knows only too well that the Chinese are not different from other peoples but are just human and humane. There is the custom in China that in one or another form would not appear among other peoples or even among ourselves. The Chinese worshipped their ancestors and to a large extent still do so; they are justly proud of their ancestors and in their modesty attribute their own goodluck and success to their ancestors' virtues and beneficent influence. We with our pride in ancestors and with our passion for genealogical guests, are no less ancestor worshippers; our "worship" has merely assumed a different form.

THE NEGRO IN RUSSIA.

Mr. Henry Le Moon writes in an article in the Nation:-

I have never felt more at home among a people than among the Russians, and I think that this is the common experience of Negroes who have visited the Soviet Union. One reason for this feeling is doubtless to be found in the ready attachment which the Russians show for the Negro. Incidentally, the Russians view the Negro as a being quite different from the white American, a view which arises inevitably out of their own experience. To them the Negroes of the American South are a national minority, comparable to the minorities of the Soviet Union. In line with this view the Russians generally expect the dark-skinned American to speak a language of African origin and to have customs distinct from those of the rest of the American people. They express surprise upon learning that the folk-songs of the race originated in the English language. And I have the impression that many among them fed upon stories of race conflict in this country, not only fail to understand, but in some measure resent, any expression of friendship between Negroes and American whites, especially if the latter are not identified with the revolutionary movement in this country.

While all Europe, save such centres as have succumbed to the rampant nationalism of post-war period, welcome the Negro as an entertainer, a student, or a traveller, Russians see him as a fellow-worker and freely offer employment opportunities. To be sure, the Soviet Union is to-day the only country in which such opportunities are generally available to any workers; but even in the pre-depression days there were practically no openings for Negroes in the countries of Western Europe.

Unquestionably, large sections of the Negro working class in America are measurably better off in material things than the bulk of Soviet workers. They are better housed, better clothed, and better fed, and they have more of the materials for comfortable living than the Russian workers. Yet there are things for which one would willingly exchange comparative comfort. Chief among these for the Negro worker is freedom from persecution. Add to this: security of employment, equal opportunities for their children's education and for their employment upon completion of their training, recreational opportunities unaffected by race, insurance against hazards of sickness and old age, and the zest that comes of taking part in the construction of a new society purged of the bitterness of race prejudice.

Writing in the Survey Graphic for November, 1932, Walter Duranty expressed the opinion that "it is merely a question of time for this country [the U. S. S. R.] to see a flow of immigration, not only from the United States but from Europe, which will catch and surpass the peak figures of foreign influx to America." Would the participation of Negroes in large numbers in such a movement change the present attitude of Russia towards this race?

There is a considerable school of Negro thought which hold that the Negro's problems are peculiar to himself and that he carries them with him wherever he may go in large numbers. The few may be accepted cordially, but not the masses. Those who take this position base their contention on the widely accepted axiom that "white folks are white folks," whether they live in Scottsboro or Moscow, whether they profess to follow the teachings of Jefferson and Wilson or those of Marx and Lenin. Pleading for a continued adherence to American principles, Kelley Miller, Dean of Howard University, in an article syndicated through the Negro press, expressed this point of view: "Ten million Negroes or Chinese in Russia," he said, "would in all probability arouse the same race antagonism we now see exhibited in Georgia. What guarantee, is there that communism would control the rancour of race in the midst of rival and competitive racial numbers?"

The number of Negroes now employed in Russia is still quite small, but efforts have been made to increase their number. There are a few skilled mechanics at work in the automobile factories of Moscow and in the tractor at Stalingrad; a teacher in the Anglo-American school in Moscow and at least three women in clerical positions in Moscow offices; a young engineer on irrigation project in central Asia. Last year a trained group of cotton experts, most of them products of Southern agricultural school, was in Russia instructing the Uzbeks of Central Asia in modern methods of cotton culture. This field of agriculture is of increased importance to the Soviet because of the second Five-Year Plan providing for greater development of the textile industry.

What Soviet Russia's answer would be I can conclude only by analogy. There are already ten million yellow and brown-skinned Orientals in the Union. As yet their presence has created no major internal problem. Certainly there is no evidence of racial conflict or of the subjugation of one racial group by another. Indeed, the development of national cultures along proletarian lines is an established policy of the country, even the Jews, who under the Czarist regime were more mercilessly and tragically persecuted than are the Negroes of the deep South, enjoy a new freedom. They are no longer limited in their choice of vocations, forbidden access to any institutions, or denied the privilege of residence in any section of the country. It is not here contended that all traces of anti-Semitism have been eliminated; it is patent, however, that its grosser manifestations have been entirely suppressed. It is possible, even likely, that its expression in more subtle forms may linger for a generation longer. Certainly it is being aggressively fought by the Communist Party. Moreover, the Marxists would probably point out that in the Soviet Union no races are competitive or rival. All are engaged in the gigantic task of building socialism, which in itself would mean the destruction of the roots of race prejudice. Marxism maintains that these roots are essentially economic. Race prejudice cannot flourish when its roots are destroyed.

Sir Maharaj Singh—A contradiction issued from Cape Town has settled for the moment the question regarding Sir Maharaj Singh's return to India. No information of such an intention had been received here and it very unlikely that an experienced official like Sir Maharaj Singh would communicate for publication any such intention before intimating the fact to his Government.

KINGSLEY HALL.

(By Miss Muriel Lester)

Whoever has visited England has probably been the recipient of the usual false rumour that is handed on to one person after another from generation to generation.

"Don't go to the East End! Or if you do, go by daylight. It isn't safe to go alone! Even the police go down certain streets only in couples."

Yet you will never understand the real England unless you know the people, the real people, the 90 per cent of the population who have to work for their living, and you will never know London unless you shut your ears to these absurd injunctions and meet its people on their own ground.

They are the kindest, most courteous and generous people imaginable; it is safe for a woman to walk about in Bow at any hour of day or night. Statistically the East End is the least criminal district in London, according to the magisterial records.

Great factories and little low roofed workmen's houses fill its odd 20 square miles. At almost every other street corner stands a public house. These are not patronized as mere drinking places but because there's often nowhere else for a man to go to in the evenings, and a man must go somewhere when he is living in a one-roomed home with his wife and some six children. It's not healthy for the children who ought to be in bed and asleep if the fathers stay in these small stuffy rooms, for the long hours of a winter's evening in London.

Thirty years ago, I went to Bow and became a member of a factory girls' club, and of a women's meeting. I began to go in and out of most of the houses in the neighbourhood. I wanted to learn from the people instead of adding one more to the number of middle-class women who were trying to teach the East End something. To this end I took a room in the neighbourhood and welcomed there in my one-roomed home, good and bad, clean and dirty, clever and simple alike. I was eventually counted as an East Ender myself. I threw in my lot completely with my neighbours.

There were plenty of agitators and plenty of orators making embittered speeches against the tyranny of the rich and the sins of the governing class, at the street corner, open-air meetings and in the local park, but making sarcastic speeches is an easy thing, once you get the trick of it, and it was obvious that what Bow needed was a strong public spirit that would go a stage further than mere criticism and start to construct, to build, to create a new and better social system.

But where was it possible for people to get together and plan out their schemes and programmes for practical work? The public houses were working in the opposite direction, yet they were the only common meeting place for this purpose.

A group of workmen and I met together in my room every Sunday morning for some 8 weeks discussing very freely what we considered was the most urgent need of the inhabitants of Bow. We came to the conclusion that it was some kind of public centre, a big room or a small hall where anyone could come in, at any time, where all would feel utterly at home, where there would be no barriers recognized between the various classes creeds and countries of the world, where the motto should be "honour all men," where no one would be unwelcome, whatever his character, where everything should be done by voluntary service in humility and the spirit of brotherhood.

So was Kingsley Hall planned. We had no idea that our dreams and schemes were to be realized.

in a few short months but so it was. My brother Kingsley a young idealist who was a favourite whenever he came with me to Bow, died, and instead of mourning him my father decided to give his name to an ever-living memorial to his unquenchable spirit.

So the workmen found the right premises, my father bought them, the building was altered, the place was made clean, gay and bright and Kingsley Hall was opened on Thursday, 14 February 1915.

It was given to the people of the neighbourhood for their common use; they were to be responsible for keeping it clean and orderly; they ran lectures and concerts, clinics and classes, clubs and parties.

Ever since that day the place has served the public in any way that presented itself. It has always held very strongly to the idea of voluntary poverty, non-violence and prayer. It is never any use concentrating in the sorrows of one's own district or one's own country, to the exclusion of the clamant needs of other parts of the world and the people in Bow have kept up a lively interest in what is going on in various parts of the world. Poor as they are and suffering from lack of nourishment as well as disease, they have always put their hands into their pockets to help all distress that they hear of.

In 1918, they started collecting money and food to send to the people of Germany, even before peace was signed. They heard from their sons and husbands in the army of occupation in Cologne at the time of the Armistice, that the people were hungry and thin, that the children used to gather round the British Tommies every evening, when their rations were distributed because they gave them a share.

Bow people, because they know what it is themselves to be hungry, have organized poster processions and living newspapers on many occasions to draw the attention of the public to the unnecessary suffering inflicted by harsh policies such as the allied blockade against Germany, the boycott of Russia, the cut in the social services, and repressive measures in India.

Regularly they make public protest against the evils of imperialism and militarism.

Several of them have served on the Local Government as Aldermen or Councillors. They have helped in the energetic administration of the Child Welfare and Maternity Act, that has done so much towards bringing down the infantile mortality rate from 153 per thousand to 63 per thousand in a period of 12 years.

Kingsley Hall is run by nine inmates who scrub the floors, cook the meals, run the clubs, teach the classes, lead the prayers, stoke the furnace, visit the neighbours, and organize the camps and conferences.

Indians in U. S. A:—Dr. Dinshah Pestanji Framji Ghadiali, of Malaga, Ohio, who in 1917 became a United States' citizen, after serving with the American army during the World War, may be deported from the country on the ground that he comes under the ban against Asiatics, states New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Harlan Besson District Attorney, announces that Mr. Ghadiali will be given a hearing on May 8 before Judge Jhon Boyd Avis, in Camden, New Jersey. Mr. Ghadiali, in his own defence declares that he is not subject to the ban because he is descended from the Parsee Zoroastrians, rulers of ancient Persia, who are classed by historians as Aryans. "The complaint" he says "seems actuated by some idea that because the respondent was born in Bombay, India, he was therefore, ineligible. On the obvious grounds that an Englishman born in Africa does not become a Negro, the respondent born in India is a free white person and racially eligible."

NOTES

The Bombay Strike:—The strike of mill workers which was announced to take place on Monday as a protest against a recent cut in wages began on Monday. On Friday morning when this is being written the number of strikers has swollen to 60,000. There have been some clashes with the Police who prevented processions of strikers passing before mills which were working; some of the leaders who were arrested have been released on bail. The general opinion is that the grievances of the workers are not without justification but that the strike is ill timed. However that may be, the immediate problem for Government and the public is how to end the strike as soon as possible. The Government attitude seems to be that they will let the employers and employees settle their differences, themselves merely keeping the peace. This is not the right attitude, and it cannot be maintained for long. The consequences of the strike if prolonged, even if there no breach of the peace, will be serious to the community in several ways. Further, in a conflict like this the two parties are very unequally matched in respect of resources, leadership and staying power. The worst incidence of the strike will soon be felt by women and children, and the public can not stand by while the combatants fight out the issue between them to a finish. There is another consideration. In the old days when the mills had to struggle against the excise duty which typified the then policy of Government to the industry, Government intervention would have been misunderstood and resented. The situation to-day is completely different. The Bombay mills are no longer competitors with Lancashire but allies. They have just secured a heavy protective duty on the plea that they could not continue to exist without it. Government and the public have, therefore, a perfect right to insist that the sacrifice which the consumers are called upon to make in the interests of the industry should accrue in the first instance to the workers. Otherwise, the industry will exist by exploiting both the consumers and the workers, that is, the vast majority of the population; and the question must soon arise whether in such circumstances an industry is a benefit to the country. The movement of prices is not a true test of incidence on the workers' cost of living. It is notorious that the workers are all in debt and chronically so. A fall of prices does not reduce the amount of debt. Reduction of wages drives the worker deeper into debt. We are sure that millowners are keen on ending the strike immediately. The initiative should be taken by Government by appointing a conciliation committee, the wage cut being suspended pending its report.

Extension of Service:—The Statute governing certain high appointments lays down the period for which they are tenable. Viceroys, Governors and Members of their Executive Councils hold office for five years. As these appointments are made by the Crown, the individuals holding them have an assured tenure and are expected to bring an independent judgment to bear on the problems of administration. Of late years a practice had grown up of giving extensions to holders of these offices. In the case of Members of Councils, this has led to the suspicion that extensions are securable by subservience to the head of the Government for the time being. It was announced this week that such extensions are no longer to be given. One immediate result happens to be that an Indian Member of the Bengal Executive Council who, as senior Member, would have acted for the Governor when he goes on leave shortly will not have the satisfaction of serving a term as acting Governor as his confreres in Allahabad and the Punjab. But as the principle is sound, the new rule will have general approval and it may be hoped that it will not again be changed. While the change in this case is right in principle, the appointment of the retiring Law Member of the Government of India to succeed the lately deceased Indian Member of the Executive Council of Bengal, can not be commended. Apart from the emoluments which in the new position will be about one half of what he was receiving as a member of the Government of India, a person who has held the status of member of the Government of India is not a suitable candidate for any lesser appointment. There is the same incongruity about this appointment as there would be if Lord Willingdon when his term expires as Viceroy should accept the Governorship of Bengal, he having already held that office in Bombay and Madras. No English publicman would do it and no Indian should regard himself as being exempt from the considerations which weigh with Englishmen in such matters. The only conclusion possible is that the Bengal Government was unable to find another suitable person willing to take the office, and that Sir Brojendra Mitter has been pressed to take it notwithstanding that his doing so will be wholly unprecedented and open to criticism.

Crucifying the Flesh:— A Lahore telegram reported on Thursday that five mourners who accompanied the Mohurram processions had been removed to hospital suffering from self-inflicted injuries with daggers in the course of beating of chests and backs as an expression of grief at the martyrdom of the heroic Hussain at the battle of Kerbala. Two of them are stated to be in a precarious condition. Many mourners were bleeding profusely. About one hundred mourners who saved their skins and salved their consciences by inflicting minor injuries on themselves were given first aid on the spot by the Punjab Boy Scouts Association. Several mourners fainted. Beating their breasts and backs with daggers and iron chains in Mohurram celebrations is a common practice. It is intended to give concrete expression to a pious sentiment as in the case of hook-swinging among Hindus. The Madras Government has issued strict orders that hook swinging should not be allowed under any circumstances. Public opinion in South India will support Government in carrying out the order. In fact, if the unfortunate Magistrate had visited the village and spoken to the leading men a few days before the festival he would probably have persuaded them to give up the offensive part of the ritual or at least to substitute a goat for the man as is done in some places. For our part this would be a worse cruelty as the man is a consenting party whereas the goat is a helpless victim. But the law takes a different view.

Hanging:—Dr. Pattabhi Sittaramayya was asked by the Editor of Triveni to write an article for that journal of Indian Renaissance. The Doctor chose as the most suitable subject "Hanging." He has taken pains to show that hanging is the least painful form of putting an end to the life of a condemned murderer, less painful than electrocution and guillotining. He has described in minute detail the jail routine for carrying out a sentence of hanging. He affirms that "when you eliminate hanging you put a premium upon murder." We must differ. In unsettled societies every man killed his enemy whenever he was able to do so. The primitive State forbade private vengeance but could get its subjects to acquiesce in the prohibition only by undertaking to do the job itself.

Capital punishment is thus a survival from a rude time. It is an act of vengeance pure and simple. The civilised idea of punishment is that it is a means of reclaiming the offender and a deterrent to others. You can not reclaim the criminal by hanging him. As for the deterrent effect of capital punishment, violent crime was rife when capital punishment was inflicted not only for murder but also for other crimes some of which are now regarded as trivial. The humanisation of punishment has resulted in the steady decrease in crime. The other day a man was hanged by mistake in a Punjab jail through an official order not reaching the authorities in time. Except in the few cases where the murderer is caught in the act, there is always an element of doubt and the risk of an innocent man being hanged outweighs in sensitive minds the possibility of some criminals going free. More than that it is a profound mistake to think that it is the fear of capital punishment that protects us from being murdered by our neighbours. The human mind in most communities recoils from murder as an anti-social act which, if it became common would lead to chaos.

Social Legislation in Baroda:—The Legal Remembrancer to the Government of Baroda has issued a second and revised edition of his memorandum on recent social legislation in that State. We reprinted last week the paragraphs in it which did not appear in the first edition a large part of which was also reprinted in the Reformer of January 6 and 13. In an editorial note in that issue we hinted that there was a feeling that the pace of social legislation in the State was a little too fast although every measure had been adopted after ample consideration and investigation. A press message states that His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda has withheld his sanction to the Act prohibiting marriages between old men and young girls, a common evil prevailing in many castes in Gujerat and Kathiawar. In passing the order his Highness remarked:—"We should not overdo social legislation. Society should be strong enough to purge itself of such abuses without depending on Government to pass laws. It is the consensus of opinion that Baroda has taken a lead in matters of social legislation and has gone far ahead of the times. The time has come to call for a halt and review the working of the Acts that have come into force before launching into new channels." We think that His Highness has decided wisely. Social reform in the last resort depends not on legislation but on the quickening of the public conscience. The work of the reformer cannot be delegated to the policeman. As for the marriage of young girls with elderly men, surely when the law forbids the marriage of immature persons who can not exercise an informed judgment on a matter of such vital concern to themselves, it has done all it can and should. If two grown up persons choose to marry without regard to the disparity between their ages, it is their own affair.

BOMBAY, APRIL 23, 1934.

SIR SANKARAN NAIR.

Though Sir Sankaran Nair was well past three score years and ten, we were not prepared for the news of his death which took place on Wednesday. About two months ago, he had written asking for some information and we gathered that he was engaged on some literary work relating to the Indian political movement. He was physically a strong man and took particular care of his health. He had regular habits and was entirely free from the besetting sin of many Indians, that of worrying over the irrevocable past and the undescernible future. This was due to a large extent to his deeply religious temper. He was a devout Hindu. He spent two hours every morning on his yogic practices which kept him fit physically and mentally. Another great quality which he had in abundant measure was courage. He feared neither man nor beast. He took the straight course as he saw it regardless of consequences. At the Malaviya Conference held in Bombay and over which he had come all the way from Indore, where he was then engaged as political adviser, to preside, he without a moment's hesitation picked up his hat and walked out of the Hall when he found that he and Gandhiji differed on a fundamental issue. There was a time during his tenure of office as education member of the Government of India when he was not on speaking terms with any of his colleagues. This writer vividly remembers Sir Sankaran standing alone in the centre of an evening party in the Viceregal Lodge looking at the ceiling in serene composure. When he was appointed to the office, Lord Hardinge told him that he was there to press the Indian point of view as strong as possible leaving it to others to deal with other aspects of questions; and that he (Lord Hardinge) would expect him to do so. The advice was superfluous in his case but he was grateful and so long as he retained his post he never lost sight of it. When Dr. Besant was released from internment she went straight up to Simla, sending a telegram to Sir Sankaran that she was coming. A copy of the message reached Lord Chelmsford before Sir Sankaran received it. A hurried telephone message from Viceregal Lodge intimated that it would be embarrassing if Dr. Besant were to be a guest of a Member of Government so soon after her release. Sir Sankaran said that he was not accountable to anybody for what guests he received in his own home, that he had not asked Dr. Besant to be his guest but that if she came to him he could not as an old friend refuse her hospitality. In the suit brought against him by Sir Michael O'Dwyer for a statement in a book criticising Non-co-operation, he was not deterred by the fact that a large section of Indian opinion was opposed to him from sticking to his resolve to contest the claim. He was consistent in his support of social reform and held that in regard to it there was little to choose between the Brahmin and the Briton. He was a strong believer in English education for the reason that "you can not argue a man into slavery in the English language." When the Simon Commission was appointed this writer met Sir Sankaran at a garden party in Madras and asked him that he thought of the exclusion of Indians from it. He said that he did not think much of it and that everything would depend on the attitude of the Indian Members of the Government of India. He was only one in the days of the Montagu Chelmsford reforms but on most of the points on which he differed from his colleagues, his opinion carried weight with the Parliamentary Committee and the Cabinet. On his way to Delhi to preside over the Indian Committee which co-operated with the Simon Commission, he showed us his own scheme elaborated in a series of memoranda. He was very patient of suggestion and would instantly change his views if he found that he had overlooked any material point. Although in a sense the originator of the non-Brahmin movement in Madras he was utterly out of sympathy with the turn it took under Dr. T. M. Nair and Mr. Theagaraya Chetty. From almost its commencement, the Reformer had in him a careful reader and friend. Sir Sankaran came up to our idea of a model Indian public man more than most of others of our time. Always a lonely man, since his wife's sudden death some years ago, his solitude weighed heavily on him. Death to him was a release.

The Dnyanodaya on Missionary Duty:—The Rev. Loy L. Long of Sholapur wrote two articles in the Bombay Chronicle about the economic issues involved in the mill strike in his town. The Dnyanodaya concludes an appreciative reference to them with the following courageous declaration: "Some people may say that such articles should not be written by a missionary, just as they might think the Dnyanodaya ought to soft pedal on such subjects as drink, opium and prostitution. To such people our reply is: "For what do missionaries come to India if not to apply the dynamite of Jesus Christ to public evils?" We say, bravo! Some missionaries have had to leave the country for applying the dynamite of Jesus to certain ordinances which they felt were not according to the mind of their Master. We hope that such a contingency will not arise in the case of our valued friend, the English Editor of the Dnyanodaya. By the way, we do not like the word or the thing, dynamite. Apart from the danger of casual readers sticking at the dynamite, leaving out Jesus, the process of social and moral reform is more aptly described by an epithet of growth than one of destruction. The leaven and mustard seed, and not any high explosive, was chosen by the Master himself to typify the incoming of the Kingdom of Heaven.

THE INDIA ACADEMY OF AMERICA.

The India Academy of America has its head-quarters in the city of New York. It was founded in January, 1931, and incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. It is an institute of cultural co-operation and, in the words of Prof. John Dewey, exchange of 'spiritual influences' between the East and the West. The Academy is strictly non-political, non-sectarian and non-profit-making. It aims, on the one hand, at making India's culture, composite as it is of Hindu, Islamic, Christian and other elements, better known to the West, and, on the other, at bringing India into a closer and more effective touch with all that is of real value in the cultural life of the West.

In the matter of India's philosophy, for instance, a great benefit to India is almost certain to follow by way of reaction, if the efforts of the India Academy in the direction of having chairs of this branch of India's cultural achievement founded in some of the American universities are finally successful. Some of the latest findings, theories and surmises of the foremost men of modern science concerning the ultimate nature of things are fast approximating some of the most fundamental and universal doctrines of India's ancient philosophy. On this point, Prof. E. Washburn Hopkins of Yale University has observed:— 'It will be a surprise even to those conversant with the Hindu system to see how close is the analogy between the idealism of the Vedanta and the tendency of European opinion and to learn that India's outlook on life may in essentials be that which modern scientific thought is almost prepared to adopt.'

It is also being increasingly recognized by some of the leading Occidental thinkers that the social chaos, which has resulted from the outlook on life hitherto prevailing in the West, can never be restored to an orderly condition again, without a complete change of this outlook. These thinkers are also beginning to realise that it is a proper understanding and a full acceptance of the essential philosophy of India which alone can bring about the change so urgently needed now. In reference to this essential philosophy of India Will Durant, the most widely read philosophic writer in America, has recently declared:— 'This gospel of self-control and quiet thinking is just the sedative we need for our Occidental fever.'

And yet, in the whole of India, there is not a University which has a professorship of India's philosophy. All the holders of the chairs of philosophy and all heads of the departments of philosophy in Indian Universities are men who are required primarily to be proficient in Occidental philosophy, which, unlike the philosophy of India, has no practical end whatsoever in view, and attracts, therefore, the fewest number of students in the West itself. But let there be a chair of India's philosophy established at Harvard, Yale, Columbia in America and it will not be long before Oxford and Cambridge follow suit. Then only will some of the Universities in India wake up to the fact that India has a valuable philosophy which should be given the first place in this department of study, and not the philosophy of the modern West which consists mostly of uncertain speculations as admitted by its own advocates.

But perhaps the greatest benefit of all would be a better mutual understanding among the representatives of the various culture groups at home in India. At present they know so little of one another, even though living side by side for centuries. Whatever might have been the case in the days of Islamic rule over India, it cannot be said now that, considering their numbers, there are many Hindus who study Arabic and Persian at present or know much about or appreciate fully, the extent and significance of the cultural achievements of Islam. Similarly, the number of Indian Mussulmans who know correctly or fully anything of the ancient culture of the land,—which is as much their home as of the Hindus,—can be counted almost on the tips of one's fingers, in spite of the fact that the vast majority of the Mussulmans of India are of Hindu origin and racially Hindu. In the case of the Christians, whether Indian by race, pure Europeans or of a mixed descent, if any of them knows anything of India's cultural life, whether Hindu or Islamic, he knows only a garbled version of it from the writings of missionaries or Western authors who mostly have themselves so little understanding of the matter. The result is that the various communities of India are almost absolute strangers to one another in regard to their respective cultural achievements and aspirations. What is worse is that, in consequence of this ignorance of one another, they almost despise and hate one another—certainly in private and not infrequently even in public. Now, if the various elements of India's composite culture are fully recognised in the West, it may be reasonably expected that, as a reaction to this, a larger number of people belonging to the different communities in India would study properly their mutual contributions to the general culture of the land and there would in consequence be a far better mutual understanding and much more mutual sympathy than now. Besides, representatives of the different culture groups of India, working side by side in foreign lands—as the officers, scholars, students and other members of the India Academy would be doing—would certainly develop a spirit of co-operation, and even oneness in regard to India, vis-a-vis the foreign countries, where they may be; and this spirit would have, without question, a very salutary reaction on India.

There is another way, though a very indirect one, in which India is expected to be benefitted by the India Academy working in America. It is the aim, even the ambition, of the India Academy to be, in time, a link and an interpreter between the whole of the East, including China and Japan, and the West. But apart from this, it is both desirable and necessary, in these days of world-wide intercourse, that India should revive her ancient cultural relation with the 'Far East,' in addition to establishing new lines of cultural co-operation with the West. This can, of course, be best done by establishing direct lines of approach to these lands of the Pacific region. But the India Academy has opportunities of doing a great deal, even in this field, in America. Not only are there in America large Chinese and Japanese Colonies where one can study and know something of Chinese life, but there are, at certain educational centres on the American continent, great institutions providing excellent opportunities for Chinese studies, which Indian students can find nowhere else in the world; not excepting perhaps China itself. The India Academy expects to co-operate increasingly with these Chinese and other Far Eastern Institutions in the Universities of America as well as with the China and Japan Societies there; it will also do everything to help its students and workers to study cultural subjects pertaining to Far Eastern and Pacific countries whenever they desire to do so and thereby help in re-establishing India's ancient cultural relations once more with those lands on a better and wider basis. Thus India is expected to benefit greatly—indeed, as much as, if not more than, the Occident itself—by the activities of a movement like the India Academy of America, even though such activities will have to be carried on largely in the West.

And this is just the time when an organised and sustained effort, along the right lines, to make India's culture more fully recognized and appreciated by the Occident is almost certain to produce the desired result. The visits paid by such outstanding personalities as Swami Vivekananda and Rabindranath Tagore have aroused in the West a great deal of cultural interest in India. This interest has become still more widespread by the extensively reported doings of Mahatma Gandhi, in the realm of the spirit even more than in the field of politics. As a result there has come about a new demand for cultural co-operation; and in response to it much good work is being done by various cultural organization, as well as by a member of individuals, working on behalf of India. But, with perhaps one exception, none of these organisations is devoted exclusively to the task of spreading information regarding the cultural and spiritual life of India.

There are also the Vedanta Societies and certain other 'religious' organizations which are doing excellent work. But, in the Occident, the word 'Religion' has a very different connotation to what 'Dharma', even though translated as 'Religion', has in India. The term 'Religion', in reference specially to movements connected with India, is taken usually in the sense of a 'cult.' As a consequence, the Vedanta Societies, like other similar institutions classed as 'religions', appeal only to a particular and a rather limited group. On the other hand, the interest of the West, specially of America, in India's cultural and spiritual life is being exploited by certain self-seeking individuals, who are thereby doing a great deal of harm both to India and the West. On this point the following extract from a letter recently addressed to Sir Radhakrishnan by Mr. John B. Chevalier, Secretary to the American Asiatic Association will speak for itself: "We have suffered in the past in New York from individuals who were in no way qualified to expound the intellectuality of India and they have done much damage to the cause we have at heart."

The India Academy of America has, under these circumstances, been heartily welcomed by some of the most distinguished and leading personages of the West. The membership of the Academy includes several professors of Columbia, Yale, Harvard, Chicago and California universities, as well as prominent people in other important walks of life. As Mr. K. Natarajan, who visited America recently and came to know something of the India Academy, has, in a note published in the Indian Social Reformer, said:—Its membership consists largely of scholars." Mr. Natarajan has also observed that the India Academy, because of its scholarly character, is "free from mystical associations of some other Indian cultural propaganda."

GOVERNMENT BY THE MAJORITY-DEMOCRACY.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. T. Sivasankaran's comments on my notes under this caption in your issue of March 24th, 1934 are an apt and perfect illustration of that complete lack of "political sense" and confusion of thought which those who believe that understanding of the British Government is a sine qua non of peace in India, are fighting against as the deadliest enemy. If this were the mental attitude of the majority the outlook would indeed be black.

But that there are glimmerings of comprehension breaking through the clouds, I have reason to believe, and thank God for every ray of light.

TRAVANCORE AND TEMPLE ENTRY.

The following is a summary of recommendations by the Travancore Temple Entry Committee appointed by the Government to enquire into and report on the question of Temple-Entry.

The Committee says: "We may now summarise the conclusions we have arrived at. This may best be done by answering the points raised by the Government in their proceedings constituting the Committee. We shall take the points in order and record our answers to them.

"Whether, in all or any of the Temples within the State the Caste Hindus have either an exclusive right of worship or recognisable civil rights in the matter of such worship, e. g., as being sole beneficiaries, owners, etc."

The right of the Savarnas to keep the Avarnas out of Savarna temples is a recognisable civil right capable of adjudication in a court of law. That right the Savarnas have only as the beneficiaries entitled to worship inside the Temples, and not as owners. Certain persons, as individuals, may be owners of certain Savarna temples, but there is no temple of which the Savarna community is, as such, the owner,

According to longstanding usage and religious authority, the Avarnas are entitled to worship at Savarna temples from the position outside the temples assigned to them by usage.

"Whether in any particular caste Hindu temple there is any local practice allowing the entry of non-caste Hindus.

"The general feeling among non-caste Hindus about the efficiency of religious worship or rites within the temple itself or within its precincts in the case of temples now open to caste Hindus alone."

There is a general feeling among non-caste Hindus that religious worship or rites performed within a temple will be more efficacious than such worship or rites performed outside its precincts.

"The general feeling among caste Hindus about the efficiency of religious worship or rites if Temple-Entry is allowed to non-caste Hindus."

The feeling among the Savarnas is divided. The general feeling among those who favour temple-entry is that there will be no loss of efficacy in worship if Avarnas are admitted into Savarna temples. The feeling among those who are against Temple-entry is that efficacy will be lost if Avarnas are admitted into Savarna temples.

"The extent of any feeling among (1) caste Hindus and (2) non-caste Hindus in regard to the creation of social and religious equality by allowing temple-entry and whether the movement for temple-entry is a separable or integral part of such a programme."

From a preponderance of oral evidence of the Savarna witnesses and the information as to the general feeling in the country, which we have been able to gather from that evidence, it is clear that there is a strong feeling among Savarnas in favour of temple-entry being allowed. At the same time, it has to be recognised that there is considerable opposition from a large body of Savarnas on the other side.

The general feeling among Avarnas is in favour of temple entry.

Though it is conceded that temple entry will not by itself produce social and religious equality, allowing temple-entry will, to that extent, remove the inequality in those respects. It is possible to work out a scheme for the social uplift of the Avarnas independently of the temple-entry movement. The Committee suggests for this purpose action on the following lines—

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 28

(i) Distance pollution or "Theendal" should be moved by appropriate legislative measure subject to reservations in the matter of entry into temple and into their adjuncts like temple tanks, temple wells, Homapuras, Anakottils, etc., and subject to the following provisions:—

(a) Public tanks used for bathing purposes should be thrown open after separate cisterns are attached to them or portions of them are walled off, where people could wash their clothes, etc., before getting into the tanks for bath.

(b) Public wells should be thrown open, after they are provided with cisterns, in which water should be stored from the wells by municipal or Health Department employees and from which water should be drawn through taps.

(c) Government Satrams (Choultries) should be thrown open, after they are provided with separate kitchens, as in the case of such as are already open to all classes.

The Committee thinks that prompt action should be taken as regards these items.

(ii) Arrangements should be made for providing Bhajanamatoms, instituting religious lectures, opening schools for adult instruction and for proper housing and sanitation and the adequate supply of wells and tanks, for such Avarna communities as in the opinion of Government require such assistance. This item may be worked as to be completed in a definite period, say ten years.

(iii) In important centres, temples may be built and consecrated where Savarnas and Avarnas may worship together, such Savarnas retaining their rights of worship, etc., in temples where Avarnas are not now admitted.

"The probable results (a) temporary and (b) permanent, of allowing temple-entry."

The following results are likely to ensue:—

(i) Some breaches of the peace may occur. But it will be possible to prevent them by proper precautionary measures.

(ii) A large number of Savarnas will keep out of the temples and a large number of Avarnas will come in.

(iii) Many of the priests (Pujaris Tantris) will be unwilling to continue their services. Other persons belonging to the communities from which they are recruited may be willing to take their places. But they may not in general command the same respect.

(iv) Some of the temple servants may discontinue their services or demand remuneration in cash instead of cooked rice allowance. The Government may fix cash remuneration and get over this difficulty.

(v) Of the Savarnas who first keep away, some may, in course of time, come back. The number of Avarnas going to temple for worship may also be reduced. But the total number of worshippers is not likely to be less than at present.

If any entry that is allowed is with the concurrence of a Parishat the evil results anticipated will be considerably minimised.

"The possibility of a compromise being arrived at between the orthodox Hindu community and other Hindus with regard to the question of temple-entry or any aspect of it. And if there is a possibility the best methods of effecting a compromise."

A compromise in the strict sense does not seem to be possible. But a few middle courses have been suggested of which the Committee think the following two deserve to be considered:—

(i) Entry being allowed to Avarnas as far as the "Balivattam" in all Savarna Temples and (ii) throwing open some of the existing temples in the several talukas for all Hindus, the others being reserved for exclusive worship of the Savarnas.

The Committee suggests that these two middle courses also may be referred to the Parishat.

"The bearing on the question of temple entry, of the principles, rules and practices regulating religious worship and rites in caste Hindu temples."

The principles and rules regulating religious worship and caste Hindu temples are set forth in the Agamas; and the Agamas prohibit the entry of Avarnas. The practice in temples is also to the same effect.

"The extent to which Government can interfere or has interfered in private temples whether or not under Government management."

The Government have assumed the management of many Savarna temples in the exercise of the Sovereign's right of 'Melkoima.' In administering these temples, they have, by virtue of the 'Melkoima' right, the power of supervision and of assuming the management, if that step is necessary for the proper administration of these temples. In the capacity of 'Melkoima,' Government have modified a few practices in some temples. But no change in practice or usage involving modification of important principles of the Smritis or important rules of the Agamas can be effected, except by the Sovereign on the advice of a Parishat.

"The commitments, if any, made by Government."

In the opinion of the Committee, no commitment has been made by Government which restricts their freedom of action in the matter.

On the general question of temple-entry, the Committee is of the opinion that there is such a change from the past in the circumstances of the present day, as to make it desirable that whatever steps are possible should be taken to give the Avarnas greater facilities for the purpose of worshipping at Savarna temples, but that it is necessary that the faith of the orthodox Hindus in temples and in the sanctity of the deity installed in them should not be weakened. The Committee thinks that the extent to which the present rule prohibiting the entry of Avarnas into temples may be modified should be determined by the Sovereign on the advice of a Parishat.

WHAT IS BUDDHISM?

The Hungarian scholar and Orientalist Mr. Felix Valyi delivered an interesting lecture on "Buddhism and its significance to the Western mind" on Sunday morning at the Anand Vihara, Bombay. A large gathering, including a number of ladies attended the lecture which was arranged under the auspices of the Bombay Buddha Society.

"Wherever I go, I find the misunderstanding of the Oriental mode of thought and view of Life and Religion, and a discarding of the same for materialistic forms of thought, peculiar to the Western Mind," declared the lecturer in introducing the subject of the lecture.

"The best in Oriental Religion, Art, History, and Life has not been understood properly and transmitted for modern use anywhere, and this will certainly create a tremendous mischief in future when the Western materialism is accepted without scrutiny" was Dr. Valyi's prophetic warning.

"The dominating spiritual and moral influences which pervaded the psychology of Asia were Buddhism and Islam," declared the lecturer, both of which "until to-day are living forces undergoing constant evolution." To explain the psychology of Asia meant the explanation of the fundamental notions of Buddhism and Islam in their relation to Asiatic History. "The Human appeal of Buddhism and Islam is even now so powerful that no one single aspect of Asiatic life and mentality could be explained without a profound knowledge of both doctrines."

To understand Buddhism in its entire purity one should go to the pristine teaching of Gautama himself, explained Dr. Felix.

Buddhism is "a perfect formulation of the ideal" that Buddha postulated, which related more to the ideal of purity and perfection for transcending material desires, passions, and egoism that debase the eternally free mind, than to any other aspect of human striving.

One of the misunderstandings in the Western mind was the misconception due to the "the Nihilistic School in Buddhism—the attempt to take away the mind from real Life in the world" and which was "the real cause of the decline of Buddhism in India."

"The pessimistic interpretation of Buddhism" in the West for which Schopenhauer of Germany was largely responsible was only the interpretation of "the decadent form of Buddhism" that was a result of "the formulation of the ideals of monastic life," in later Tibetan Buddhism of the ninth century.

"Buddhism, if anything, shows how to transcend the material life by resurrection of 'the noble, pure, and the moral' in the human mind, which always felt the need to rise 'ethically, morally, and culturally' to the higher plane of life, added Dr. Valji. This attempt to purify life was not to debase life but to give stronger 'wholesome zest to Life.'"

The central motivating Power in Gautama's mind was the "spiritual transcending power to rise above the chain of material passions, desires, lust, vanity, and ignorance" that debased humanity. The great Buddhist ideal of "the freedom of the mind" which was present in every vital religion in the world—was the search for the outlet, from "the jungle of Asiatic symbolism and to recover for the mind its original purity." Buddha showed the way "to rise above the limitations,—geographical, historical, ancestral, congenital, and the traditional"—with which the human mind had been shackled by centuries of custom and thought.

"One single ideal of Buddhism was a nearer approach to profound life than the dissertations of Aristotle."

Those who assume that Buddhism was a school of inertia and pessimism, from the very beginning, forget the five centuries of Buddhism when the wonderful influence of Shakyamuni awoke to action the sleeping forces of the Indian soul.

The inspiration which came from Gautama's teaching pervaded the Indian soul with a new ideal of morality by severe discipline of human passion and human instinct without inflicting upon it the prejudices of Brahminism and Hinduism. Buddhism was a reaction against the rigid system of Brahminism and as a democratic religion with an aristocratic ideal of Buddhahood, its failure in India was perhaps the greatest catastrophe for the Hindu people. For, in Japan Buddhism became again a doctrine of action under the influence of the "Zen" sect—namely, the stoics of Japanese Buddhism, whose "purifying influence has been recognised as one of the essential characteristics of the Japanese mind."

One and the same fundamental thought inspiring all the manifestations of early Buddhism, continued Dr. Valji, was the ideal of Universal Love including the whole of mankind without preference of race or caste or creed.

In the sixth century B. C., scientific, mathematical formulation of Universality in Religion was not possible, as the symbolic language was the predo-minent method. The symbols of the "lotus flower" and of the "white rose" of Persia were examples proving the enormous significance of symbolism in art and religion. The profound significance of Oriental symbolism in history and its effects on events and thoughts, and its wide ramifications throughout the world could be traced into the historical past over wide spaces and over long periods.

Thus the Muhamadans in Spain were responsible for the fertilising stream to Christianity that became subsequently democratic. The Muhamadans in turn had been affected by the fertilising streams from Oriental religions and art. These historical links are even now of great import in History and human culture. The relation of life to art and the place of symbolism in Art, Life and Religion could also be understood, by the study of Indian art. The immense beauty—the monumental and the symbolic in Indian art—all were keys to the human mind that did not reject life but wanted to transcend life and its materialistic passions and desires.

Chinese, Japanese, Hindu and Islamic modes of life and thought showed the mark of the vivifying, spiritual, and purifying influence of the great personality of Gautama.

LEGAL POSITION OF WOMEN.

The following appeal has been issued under the signatures of Lady Abdul Qadir, President, Rani Lakshmibai Rajwade, Chairwoman, Mrs. Charulata Mukerji, Organizing Secretary and Mrs. Renuka Ray, Social Section Secretary, All-India Women's Conference:—

The iniquity of Hindu Law, so far as women's rights of inheritance and marriage are concerned, is almost without parallel today. Whenever efforts have been made to ameliorate the position of women by trying to rectify any particularly pernicious and objectionable provision of the law, the religious injunctions or the Shastras have invariably been brought forward to support the existing system in all its details. A proper study of the old Shastras will prove conclusively that when the laws were codified those Shastras and Smritis which were favourable to the rights of women were ignored—it almost seems, with a preconceived and deliberate purpose. Mohamedan law is more equitable in some respects but even here a great deal is still to be desired before the law is interpreted so as to give women equal legal rights with men.

Although we are grateful to those great men who have from time to time during the last century made efforts to improve the legal position of women, it cannot be gainsaid that, with a few exceptions only, those efforts have been and are still being largely ineffectual because they have met with opposition and been reduced to half-measures. Women are realising to-day that, if they are to take their rightful position in society and discharge their duties as responsible citizens, it is of the utmost necessity to have a wholesale revision of the legal code in matters affecting women, not only in their own interest, but in the interests of the nation as a whole. Palliatives and half-measures will no longer do. It is the considered view of the representatives of India's women, as expressed in the last Annual Session of the All-India Women's Conference at Calcutta, that a commission with a non-official majority and a strong representation of women should be appointed without delay to enquire into the present disabilities of women in regard to marriage and inheritance, and make suitable recommendations to remove the same. This is an appeal to all women interested in women's welfare, to start a nation-wide campaign to arouse public opinion and impress on the Government of India the urgent necessity of appointing the commission. We must make it clear to the authorities that it is not a mere passing of a resolution at the Conference, but that we are earnest about it, and we shall only be satisfied when our just and reasonable demand is fulfilled. We are sure that we shall obtain the unstinted help and support of those of our men, who have helped with so much enthusiasm the cause of women's advancement so far.

CHRIST AND CHRISTIANITY.

M. Alfred Loisy, one of the outstanding biblical critics of the day, has published a book in French on the development of Christianity entitled "La Naissance du Christianisme" which has been favourably reviewed in the Hibbert Journal by the Editor, Mr. L. P. Jacks, in an important article. We give below a few extracts from the book :

The tradition which has preserved for us the memory of the Jesus was, in its origin, entirely other than historical: at the very first it was the tradition of a faith, and almost immediately afterwards the tradition of a cult, which grew more fervid as it developed to the deification of its object. In a word, memory was transfigured into faith and adoration. Strictly speaking the Gospels are not historical documents. They are liturgical catechisms containing the cult-legend of the Lord Jesus Christ; they announce no other content and claim no other quality. Even the teaching attributed to Jesus has been built up to meet the needs of the Christian propaganda, for the edification of the first communities or again, and especially in the fourth Gospel, to elaborate the mystic theory of Salvation by Jesus Christ. One cannot pretend that, behind all this work of faith, the real traits of Jesus, his own doings, and the exact circumstances of his preaching and death, are to be recognised clearly cut. What the historian here comes into direct contact with is the faith of the first generations and the intensity of their devotion to Jesus the Saviour.

There is nothing to make good this inadequacy of the evangelical testimony. The Acts of the Apostles, which are supposed to record the history of the first Christian age are, rather, the continuation of the legend and, at some points, of the myth, while the general perspective of the book is as artificial in its own way, if not more so, than that of the canonical Gospels.

Christianity is not founded on a doctrine laid down in a book. It formed its own doctrine as it grew, and the books which properly belong to it are the products and witnesses of the doctrinal elaboration as it was accomplished in the course of the first hundred or hundred and fifty years of the new religion.

In a very real sense the history of primitive Christianity is a kind of pre-history which has to be reconstructed—one might almost say, guessed—from documents which reflect it. But were neither conceived nor put into shape for the purpose of narrating it.

The imminent return of the Christ had been proclaimed for a long time before recounting, in oral preaching and evangelical books, the details of what Jesus had done, said and suffered, that he might ascend into heaven in preparation for the day of God. The Gospel was the proclamation of that Day before it became the story of the Christ's teaching and of his saving death.

Of what the preaching of Jesus really was we can form only an approximate idea from the teaching which has been attributed to him. It may be said without the least paradox that the teaching he actually gave was never collected. Neither the preacher nor the most faithful of his hearers had any thought of fixing the tenor of it for transmission to posterity; the imminent prospect of the reign of God left a preoccupation of that kind out of the question. After the death of Jesus the first apostles continued to announce the near-coming event, which was now to be that of the Christ in his glory. It was only at the end of a certain time, when the groups of believers were organized into permanent brotherhoods that the need was felt for a completer instruction, in which the teaching about Jesus and the teaching of Jesus, already strangely modified and augmented, were progressively amalgamated to form the books of liturgical catechism for which the name 'Gospel' was kept. The contents of our Gospels, the Synoptics especially, are rather the elements of the primitive Christian catechesis than instruction really given by Jesus in Galilee or at Jerusalem, and it is unnecessary to prove that the mystical gnosis of the fourth Gospel was entirely foreign to him.

The origin of Jesus was of the humblest. It is improbable that the name of his father, Joseph, and that of his mother, Mary, were invented in the tradition... Doubtless he was born in some hamlet or village of the region (Capernaum) in which we first see him teaching. We may also believe that before himself embarking on the proclamation of the coming reign of God he was for some time attached to John the Baptist or at least affiliated with the sect which made use of John's name.

It was probably not without motive that the Gospels defined his teaching and that of the Baptist by the same general formula: 'Repent, for the reign of God is at hand.' But this indication, simple and yet widely comprehensive, is the most certain knowledge we have of his doctrine. We can hold it for certain because this was the fundamental element of the faith held by the first votaries of Jesus, by those who continued his work after his death in proclaiming him the Christ, and because the later work of Christian tradition, always tied to this initial datum, consisted in successive retouchings and attenuation of the same theme—the coming of the great Kingdom. We know, moreover, that in this was summed up the Jewish hope of which Jesus was regarded as destined to bring the fulfillment for those who were his..... Jesus, then, taught, if not the end of the world—for it would be difficult to say what idea he had of the universe, or even if he had one at all—at least the end of the present age, the end of Satan's reign, and of the powers set up by him, the advent of God, the reign of the just, the resurrection of the dead, and the Grand Judgment which was to exterminate all the wicked and sweep them from the face of the earth. With this judgment in prospect men must repent, must change their lives.

That Jesus baptised, as John did, is not affirmed by the Synoptics, and critics generally are disposed to say that he demanded nothing more than a change of heart. In this way they would make Jesus the teacher of what seems to them a pure religion, divested of all magic ritual. But Jesus had no intention of founding a religion and gave no thought to that matter.....

Did Jesus attribute to himself an eminent place in the coming Kingdom? Many in these late days, have believed themselves able to answer in the negative, but without pausing to consider whether they are not investing Jesus too freely with their own mentality, or with their own religious ideal. Jesus, according to them, was a mystical philanthropist for whom the Kingdom of God was a thing essentially interior and moral, the presence of God in the soul, the revelation and intimate consciousness of the divine goodness and fatherhood, the law of love, the dignity of man. That is what the Gospel, viewed from afar off, and sifted by the experience of nineteen centuries, may seem to those who are intent on finding themselves in it. But it was not in this simplification that Jesus lived. Christianity was not born in an atmosphere so transcendent... The value of the human soul... is not defined in the Gospel independently of the individual's destiny in the coming Kingdom; the law of love is not laid down independently of the renunciation of earthly things prescribed by the imminent revelation; the uplifting of the poor is not conceived independently of their exaltation in the eternal realm. In plain truth, neither the revelation of the good God, nor the value of the soul, nor the law of love, nor the dignity of the poor have the eminent place in the primitive Gospel which some in our days attribute to them; they are the elements of the Gospel which, more or less enlarged in our view of them, happen to be, for us, the least out of date. As the historian sees the matter, it is ever and always in the eschatological notion of the Reign of God that the Gospel can and must be summed up; all the rest is subordinate to that.

Jesus did not offer himself to his contemporaries as a sage or a moralist, nor as a prophet pure and simple, but as one sent from God. He claims a special and unique mission in regard to the Great Event, though perhaps not defined with precision, which in our language would be equivalent to the title of Grand Ambassador (Grand Envoye)... There could be no question of his being the Messiah there and then, since the Messiah was the prince of the Grand Reign and there could be no Messiah except in the reign of God... (He) was Messiah in expectation; Messiah presumptive.

HITLER'S FOREIGN POLICY.*

(BY MILDRED S. WERTHEIMER.)

The immediate object of National Socialist foreign policy is the attainment of equality—in armaments and status—and re-establishment of the Reich as a great power. The Nazis believe that as a consequence of the war and the Versailles Treaty, the world has reduced the Germans to the position of a second-class people, and their policy is concentrated on wiping this blot from the German scutcheon. The foreign political goal as set forth both in the National Socialist party's official programme and in Hitler's autobiography, "Mein Kampf"—which has become the bible of the Third Reich—is the union of all Germans in one great Germany. Hitler places special emphasis, moreover, on the acquisition of new territory in Europe on which Germans might settle and which would insure freedom of existence to the German people. In order to attain this end the Reich, he said, must have military allies, for "an alliance whose aim is not war is senseless." No state, however, would want to ally itself with present day Germany, which can give no military help; hence the immediate object of German foreign policy must be transformation of the nation into a strongly armed military state. "Oppressed peoples," wrote Hitler, "are never freed and unified in a common empire by means of framing protests, but through a sharp, unsheathed sword. The forging of this sword is the task of the leaders of a people's domestic policy. The consummation of this work of forging the sword and the securing of military allies is the task of the leaders of its foreign policy. Hitler envisaged Italy and Great Britain as the two future allies of the Reich. The French, he declared, will remain the "inexorable, deadly enemy of the German people." Germany must turn its eyes toward the East, for only in Russia and the Baltic can the Reich secure the new territory which will rectify "the false relation between our people and our land," and thus "free the Germans for ever from the danger of disappearing from the earth or of becoming a slave people." We National Socialists, stated Hitler, "consciously draw a line through pre-war German foreign policy. We begin anew at the place where history stopped short 600 years ago. We will end the continual migration of Germans to the south and west of Europe and turn our eyes to the land in the East. We will finally end the pre-war era and pass over to the land policy (Bodenpolitik) of the future. And when we speak of new territory in Europe today, we can only think first of all of Russia and of the Russian border states."

This Eastern policy was also stressed by Alfred Rosenberg, now head of the Foreign Affairs Bureau of the National Socialist Party and cultural dictator of the Reich. Rosenberg, who was born in Estonia and educated in Tsarist Russia, strongly advocated a Nordic Europe with a German "Mitteleuropa" as the foreign political solution of the future. Russia, according to Rosenberg, must be pushed back into Asia, and then Germany will be able "to procure sufficient territory for its future 150 million inhabitants. In this great battle for existence of the future and struggle for honour, freedom and bread a creative nation such as Germany can have no consideration for impotent, worthless and presumptuous Poles, Czechs, etc. These people must be forced eastward in order to free territory for German peasants to cultivate. Only thus can there be the possibility for the German People to breathe again. Thus also will the foundation of a new cultural epoch for the white race be made possible."

These and many other statements of Nazi foreign political philosophy and aims before the party assumed power form a striking contrast to Hitler's speeches on foreign policy since he became Chancellor of the Reich—in which he has attempted to reassure the world that Nazi Germany desires only "work and peace."

The foreign policy of the Third Reich thus comprises conflicting elements. In speeches delivered since he came to power, Hitler has professed peace and abhorrence of war in direct contradiction to his earlier statements. He has also given some proof of the sincerity of his pacifist protestations by concluding a Polish-German non-aggression pact and by offering to sign similar agreement with all Germany's neighbours. The Third Reich's foreign relations, however, have been complicated and injured by efforts, directed from Berlin, to Nazify German minorities living within the borders of these neighbouring states.

The same paradox appears in the disarmament situation. While denying warlike aims, Nazi Germany is rapidly proceeding with thorough militarization of the German people. There would seem to be considerable evidence also that physical re-armament of the Reich has already far exceeded the limits laid down by the Versailles Treaty. International disarmament negotiations, meanwhile, have reached a complete deadlock.

While disarmament negotiations are deadlocked, there appears to be some basis for the French contention that the Reich is engaged in re-armament and the militarization of German youth. This development is particularly noticeable in education. In the lower schools the teachers are told that "in every branch of learning there are four great principles which must govern all instruction, race, arms (Wehr), leadership, religion.....Regard everything in relation to these four imperatives, and you will be surprised to discover that pacifist and similar trends of thought have disappeared." In the colleges and universities the emphasis is the same. Chairs of a new science of Arms (Wehrwissenschaft) have been established in all the important universities and colleges. Furthermore numerous books dealing with the subject have been published recently. The most notorious of these is the work of Ewald Banse, professor of Wehrwissenschaft at the Brunswick Technical College. Excerpts from this volume, were published abroad and aroused considerable comment. As a result, the book was banned by the Hitler government on October 20, 1933 with an official statement declaring that Prof. Banse's ideas did not correspond to those of the German Government and should be regarded merely as his private opinion. Nevertheless, when Banse's book was first published late in 1932 the official Nazi organ reviewed it favourably. Banse, moreover, still retains his post in Brunswick, and has recently published another book, Geographie und Wehrpolitik, which reproduces all the important sections of the prohibited volume; some conception of Banse's ideas may be gathered from the following quotation from his latest work:

"German education of this kind is struggle and war.....because it gives youth conviction that..... only through war can the things most sacred to it be preserved and because youth is thus prepared always to offer its entire life, thought and work for these sacred possessions... which are territory, people (Volkheit,) culture and security of the state."

German youth, however, is not confining itself to study of the science of war. One of the chief purposes of the official National Socialist Students' Association is the "education of the Students for military service and for co-operation with the German people as a whole by means of military and labour service and physical exercises," in all the colleges organized under control of the Storm Troops.

A further obligation for German students is the voluntary labour service which is carried out in camps organized by the Nazis as part of their drive against unemployment. It is estimated that there are some 250,000 men already enrolled in labour camps. These men work half a day and drill the other half, wear uniforms and are organized on regular military lines. They are commanded by former army officers and subjected to rigid physical hardening. Part of this process consists in so-called Geländesport and Wehrsport, or terrain manoeuvres.

The Nazis are also using sport in general to further their ideal of a strong, military nation. They "regard sport as service to the people just as formerly military training was service to the people." Furthermore, they argue that physical training is the best means of instilling self-confidence in the people. The whole education of the nation's youth, they declare, "must be directed to inspiring the conviction that Germans are superior to all other peoples."

The world is confronted by a difficult choice. Is the Hitler government sincere? Should its pacific intentions be trusted despite existing evidence of Germany's moral, if not physical, re-armament? If these questions are to be answered in the affirmative, the heavily armed powers should take steps to reduce armaments, and rely on general international supervision to secure fulfillment of the disarmament Convention by Germany and other nations. If the peaceful aims of the Hitler Government are not to be trusted, the alternative may be a renewed arms race, ending eventually in war.

MOHARRUM.

(BY KAMAR ALI.)

To the beating of drums is proclaimed the advent of the solemn Moharrum celebrations. In the din and confusion caused by the superficial aspect of celebrations, one is apt to lose sight of the real significance that marks the solemnity of the occasion, and of its back-ground of tragic grandeur.

The hustle and bustle of popular activities, the glamour of magnificent Taziyas and the sanctity attached to Swarees are all the outcome of the exuberance of popular enthusiasm which marks the psychology of the mass mind, the fervour of sentiments aroused therefrom. So while one section of believers plunge themselves head-long into the welter of varied types of demonstrations, there are others, who do a bit of thinking and throw themselves into profound contemplation.

The glorious episode of the tragedy of Karbala centres round Imam Husain, the grand-son of the illustrious Prophet Mohamed and his valiant band of seventy-six faithful followers. Even in the life-time of our Prophet the message of Islam had spread far and wide and after his death his glittering message was shining with transcendent glory. Imam Husain was the accredited representative of Islam on earth after the death of Imam Hasan, his elder brother. The power and glory the message of Islam brought to the successors of our Prophet, naturally excited the envy of the neighbouring chief, Mavza, who was out to capture power for self-aggrandisement. He was one of the most unscrupulous intriguers of his times who soon began to hatch plots and devise ways and means to realise his ambitious designs.

Representations were made to Imam Husain and he was flooded with letters of entreaties to come to Koofa for preaching the gospel of Islam. This was evidently a trap to beguile him. Imam Husain, fully conscious of the impending danger, nobly resolved to enter the fiery ordeal after considerable inner struggle and searching of heart. The voice of conscience clearly revealed to him the duty of holding aloft the torch of Islam, even against heavy odds. Then follows the glorious spectacle of Pilgrims Progress—the Prince of the Desert passing along with his kith and kin and in the company of his faithful followers through the scorching heat of the waterless desert to a distant place and among strange and treacherous people. On reaching the fateful scene of Karbala tragedy, Imam Husain finds himself amidst his relentless foe, determined to give him a battle to seize power and glory.

Imam Husain was not perturbed in the least, though he has been made a helpless victim of colossal fraud, played upon him. He resigned himself to the Will of God and prepared to offer resistance to the enemy. Imagine Imam Husain with his handful of followers pitted against an overwhelming majority, imagine again little children and innocent women with him in his camp, and above all, imagine the water supply being strictly forbidden to them, then we will be able to catch a glimpse of his wonderful courage and fortitude and of his remarkable power of patience and perseverance. The question before him was, should he surrender meekly and yield submissively before the threatening enemy and save himself and all his nearest and dearest or rather, should he hold aloft the torch of Islam, with undimmed glory, no matter even if he perished in the attempt.

The redoubtable champion of the cause of Islam, was not to be daunted. It was an extraordinary exhibition of courage, very rare indeed, in the recorded history, of mankind. He went to the extent of advising his followers to go back, leaving him alone to defend the religion of Islam against the calculated onslaughts of the designing hypocrites. But his valiant band was made of sterner stuff, there was the blood of martyrs running through the veins of everyone of his followers. They vied with each other to offer up their all in the cause which Imam Husain represented. Yazid did all he could to make them yield but it was in vain. The heart-rending and nerve-shattering scene of the last three days, that is 8th, 9th and 10th of Moharram are too terrible for word painting. Women and children with parched lips and sunken eyes crying for water! On the 10 of Muharram Imam Husain decides to give them a battle in the name of the great religion of Islam. His followers were few, but they were fired with the spirit of a Gazi. One after one fell in the great strife, each proving his own mettle. After the 76 followers earned their martyrdom came the turn of Imam Husain's kith and kin, who surprisingly offered magnificent resistance and smilingly courted death, defending the cause of Islam against impostors. It was a sight for gods to see Imam Husain all alone, in the battlefield of Karbala with his valiant followers all laid low by the icy hand of death. It was one ghastly sight of death and devastation. Will he still yield? No, and thousand times no. He would very much prefer to suffer the agonies of death for speaking truth rather than that Truth should suffer for want of its speaking. He joyfully and smilingly faced the assassin's dagger. Here is an unique instance of a battle where the victor is thrown into the limbo of oblivion and the vanquished is glorified and immortalized. Truth was pitted against falsehood. The beauty of sacrificing spirit was matched against selfishness. Truth comes out triumphant and the lesson of supreme sacrifice of Imam Hussain is engraved in the heart of every Mussalman. O Death where is thy sting?

INDIA'S CULTURAL ORIGINS.

Professor N. N. Ghose, Dean of the Faculty of Law in Dacca University, has written a book, entitled "Indo-Aryan Literature and Culture (Origins)" which is very appreciatively reviewed in the current number of India and the World. The reviewer indicates in the following passage, the key thought of Professor Ghose's work: "In the broadest outline his theme is that Indo Aryan literature-cum-culture is, materially speaking, more non-Aryan (Vratya as the author would prefer to call it) than Aryan. Recent archaeological discoveries have perhaps made this general thesis more readily acceptable than was the case some years ago. But it is in working up the details of this thesis into coherent history that the author most directly and acutely antagonises established opinions and shakes them up to the foundations. The Puranas, the Atharva Veda, the Upanishads, he finds, are basically non-Aryan literature, though transformed, no doubt, in varying degree by the directive Aryan genius which progressively displaced their original non-Aryan (Vratya) creators, professors and ministers, so that he feels himself justified in characterising this synthetic culture and literature as, on the whole, Neo-Aryan and not neo-non-Aryan. The Sad Darsanas (which must include Buddhism as the seventh) are all according to him non-Aryan, (Vratya) by origin. His Vratya is the Eastern Vratya and not a Western wave which may be supposed to have followed on the wake of the Vedic Aryans, though he has nothing to say against his having preceded the Vedic Aryans in some remote antiquity. Caste and asrams, according to him, are both relatively indigenous Vratya contributions. But these are not just his opinions. He started like others before him with every pre-disposition to trace them all to Vedic Aryan sources. But, one after another, these ancient prejudices fell or surrendered at discretion before scientifically tested data, of proved historical value which he came across in the course of his investigations into this literature."

A BLUNDERING POLICY.

The suggestion of Sir Henry Lawrence, in an address to the Conservative India Committee, for a regrouping of British Indian provinces so as to make them larger and fewer, in the interests of economy, writes the Leader, shows a better sense of proportion and greater regard for stubborn financial facts than the policy of creating new, small provinces fed out of all-India revenues because they cannot pay their way. This is a senseless misuse of the taxpayer's money, for not very convincing or commendable political reasons. In what way will the taxpayer of, for example, the United Provinces, benefit by the creation of Orissa or Sind as a Governor's province? If he does not thereby stand to gain in any way, why should he be compelled to pay for the satisfaction of narrow provincial or communal pride of people who cannot or will not pay their own money for that boon? Moreover, if this tendency is not checked, there will be no end to this process of disintegration. Today, it is the Muslim community which demands Sind and Baluchistan to be made independent provinces; tomorrow it may be the Sikhs of the central districts of the Punjab who will plump for separation and the day after tomorrow the Hindu Jats of west U. P. and east Punjab may ask for a separate province for themselves by the amalgamation of those areas which are their strongholds. The demand for an Andhra province is by now fairly old; while the Canarese and the Malayalees have also begun to make a similar demand.

Where will this end? Government will have to fritter away a considerable part of the resources of the country in creating subsidized provinces. That must inevitably result in the still further restriction of beneficial services for the good of the people in general. This in its turn will increase discontent, which even the favoured communities may eventually swell when their immediate objective has been achieved. Considered from this larger point of view, it is a wrong and unwise policy on which the Government have embarked.

It may not be feasible now to undo the mistakes of the past and to give practical effect to a bold suggestion like the one made by Sir Henry Lawrence. But is it equally useless to hope that the blundering policy may be stopped? According to Sir Henry Lawrence the White Paper scheme is financially insolvent; and it is politically bankrupt in the view of Indian nationalists.

Girls Abducted in Kashmir:—The Srinagar correspondent of The Tribune writes:—The report of the abduction of 11 Kashmiri Muslim girls in one day has caused a great sensation. It is understood that two of the abducted girls were found in a public brothel in Maisume bazar. It is remarkable to note that for some years past the Kashmir State has become a centre of "Bardafroshi" or enticing away the girls. This grievance was laid before the Glancy Commission by the public and the Commission recommended several measures to stop this nefarious trade.

A LEGISLATURE FOR KASHMIR.

The regulations for the new Legislative Assembly in Kashmir are issued. These follow closely the recommendations of the Glancy Commission, and the constitution will resemble that introduced into British India after the Morley-Minto Reforms.

The regulations give the members of the Assembly the right of free speech and of criticism of the budget and other measures, introduced by the Council.

Certain subjects are reserved and cannot be dealt with by the Assembly. These are: (a) matters relating to or affecting His Highness or any member of the Royal Family or the management of their household; (b) relations and treaties, etc., between the State and the King Emperor or the Government of India or with foreign power or any State in India; (c) matters concerning the Gilgit and Ladakh Frontier; (d) rights specifically granted to illaqadars or jagirdars by their Sanads; (e) the organization, discipline and control of the State Army; (f) the State departments now under the charge of the Minister in waiting on His Highness and specified in the schedule; (g) the Dharmarth Departments; (h) the provisions of this regulation and the rules thereunder and their repeal or modification.

The Legislature of the State will consist of the Council and the Assembly. The Council, with the Minister as President and such other Ministers as His Highness may appoint, will superintend, direct and control the administration and the Government of the State.

The President of the Assembly will be appointed by His Highness for such term as he may fix. The Assembly will continue for 3 years from its first meeting unless dissolved or its life extended by His Highness. The Assembly will ordinarily hold two sessions annually, in October in Srinagar and in March in Jammu. His Highness has the right to certify any regulations rejected or altered by the Assembly, if considered essential for the good Government and the safety and tranquility of the State.

The first session of the Assembly will probably be held in October.

HINDI PROPAGANDA IN SOUTH INDIA.

The bi-monthly journal of Indian Renaissance, Triveni, observes with reference to the propaganda in favour of Hindi that is being carried on by Hindi Pracharak Sabhas in different parts of the country: "A batch of Hindi Pracharaks (propagandists) have left Madras on a tour to North India. The object is to bring together North and South, and enable lovers of Hindi to compare notes with a view to future work. Young men and women whose mother-tongue is Telugu, Tamil or Kannada have pledged themselves to spread a knowledge of Hindi in their home provinces, and the results of their labours have been very encouraging. Every year thousands of persons, young and old, sit for the examinations held under the auspices of the 'Dakshina Bharat Hindi Prachar Sabha,' and acquire a good knowledge of Hindi. But as there is no living contact with people who habitually speak Hindi, the knowledge so acquired is apt to be bookish. Needless emphasis is laid on the study of Hindi literature, and the spoken word is subordinated to the written. What must be aimed at is an adequate acquaintance with spoken idiomatic Hindi, so that men all over India may readily enter into conversation through the lingua franca. The study of Hindi literature as such may be left to a few who feel a special aptitude for it, or desire to translate the best in Hindi into their own language. Frankly, we do not desire that Hindi should take precedence of Tamil, Telugu, Marathi or Bengali, as the language of culture in the respective provinces. It is no comfort to exchange the domination of English for that of Hindi. Even ardent advocates of Hindi do not pretend that, as a medium of culture, Hindi is superior to the languages mentioned. Every one of them has a rich heritage in the shape of literature in a variety of forms. One year's intensive study, or six months of travelling in Hindi-speaking provinces, ought to be sufficient training for most of us. But little children of nine and ten, who have not learnt even the rudiments of their mother-tongue, are being put through the mill of Hindi examinations. In our view, all examinations are an abomination, particularly those that, in effect, impose a tongue other than the mother-tongue at a comparatively immature age. We wish to commend this aspect of the question to the consideration of Hindi propagandists in South India".

"GIRLS' PROTECTION BILL."

The text of an unofficial Bill calculated to stop the evil of "daughter selling," which has been introduced in the Assembly, is published in the Bombay Government Gazette, dated April 19.

The author of the Bill, Kunwar Raghubir Singh (Agra), says that the evil of "daughter selling" has assumed dangerous proportions in Indian society and has considerably increased the number of widows in the Hindu society. This practice is opposed to all canons of morality and the best ideas of every community. Religious organisations are all opposed to such practices.

The Bill provides for the protection of minor girls (a) against inequality of ages of bride and bridegroom and (b) against their treatment as commodities as opposed to human beings.

The following is the text of the Bill:—

Whereas the evil of "daughter selling" has assumed dangerous vogue in society; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

(1) This Act may be called the Girls Protection Act, 1934. It extends to the whole of British India.

(2) "Parent" in this Act means the father, the mother or any other guardian of the girl under whose protection she is living before her marriage. A girl shall be deemed to be a major on completing the age of 14 years.

(3) If a parent sells his or her daughter before she has attained majority, he or she shall be liable to punishment which may be an imprisonment for two months or a fine which may extend to Rs. 200 or both.

(4) It shall be within the cognizance of the police to arrest a parent if there are sufficient reasons to believe that the parent has sold the girl.

(5) All offences under the Act shall be bailable and shall not be compoundable.

(6) It shall be within the competence of the Court of Sessions or a first or second class Magistrate to try an offence under this Act.

Indian Gold Exports :—During the week ended Saturday, March 31, bar gold of the value of Rs. 97,09,964 was booked from Bombay to Europe and America. The consignment was carried by the s. s. "Mooltan," which sailed from Bombay on Saturday. It consisted of bar gold worth Rs. 88,82,766 and sovereigns to the value of Rs. 5,27,098. The bullion was booked in two consignments the larger of which Rs. 44,72,418, was destined for London, optional New York, Paris, Amsterdam. The second consignment, Rs. 42,10,358, was also booked for London, optional to Amsterdam. The Sovereigns were destined for Paris via London, optional to New York, optional to Amsterdam. The total value of gold so far exported from Bombay since Great Britain went off the gold standard amounts to Rs. 1,75,17,92,812.

"ABOLITION OF UNTOUCHABILITY."

The Government of Bombay have invited opinions of all classes of the Hindu community on Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah's Bill regarding the abolition of 'Untouchability' among the Hindus. The Bill provides that notwithstanding anything contained in any existing enactment, regulation or order and notwithstanding any custom or usage or interpretation of law, no penalty, disadvantage or disability shall be imposed upon, or any discrimination made or recognised against, any subject of the State on the ground that such person belongs to an untouchable caste or class among Hindus, and no civil or criminal Court shall recognise any custom of untouchability or base its adjudication on such a custom.

The object of the Bill is explained by the author as follows:—

"The custom of segregation of certain Hindu classes as outcaste and untouchable and the social and other disabilities they suffer under in consequence of such custom, have been the subject matter of universal condemnation. There has been continuous agitation on the part of the leaders of these Depressed Classes as they have been commonly called, as well as on the part of reformers among the main body of Hindus to put an end to this custom of untouchability and to the disabilities arising therefrom. Recent events have brought this agitation to a head, and there is at present a great wave of feeling throughout India for the removal of the disabilities of these Depressed Classes which in the interest of humanity and general welfare advantage should be taken of by the State. It is, therefore, desirable that a general law should be passed prohibiting the recognition of any rights, or disabilities arising out of the usage regarding untouchability, either in civil or criminal Courts".

The Bill has been published in the Bombay Government Gazette of April 26 and copies, both in English and Vernacular, can be had, free of charge, from the Manager Government Central Press, Bombay, on application within two months from now.

Those who are interested in the Bill should submit their views to the Secretary to Government, Home Department, Bombay, before the 1st July 1934.

PROTECTION OF ALL MINORITIES.

The Secretary-General of the League of Nations has received from Count Raczynski, Permanent Delegate of Poland accredited to the League of Nations, a communication requesting under instructions from his Government, that in conformity with the rules of Procedure of the Assembly of the League of Nations a draft resolution regarding the minorities question sent by him be placed on the agenda of the next Assembly.

The draft resolution points out that the Minorities Treaties at present in force and declarations on the international protection of minorities made before the Council by certain States were binding upon only certain members of the League of Nations, leaving minorities of other States without any possibility of recourse to the League of Nations.

The minorities of race, language and religion; which are not covered by the existing system for the protection of minorities but which have the same moral right to the protection of the League of Nations as the protection of minorities, were to be found in almost all European and extra-European countries.

To remedy this defect, the draft resolution urges the convening of an international conference composed of all members of the League with instructions, to frame a general convention for the international protection of all minorities of race, religion and language.

Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan on Muslim Education:—The acting Governor of the Punjab, Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, made an admirable speech in reply to an address presented to him by the Anjuman-i-Hamayat-i-Islam of Lahore congratulating him on his appointment as acting Governor. This is not the first time that Sir Sikandar has enjoyed this honour but to the Punjabis, Muslim and Hindu, it offered a welcome opportunity of expressing their confidence in him. His Excellency comes from an ancient family with traditions, very different from the carpet-baggers of the present day, of close and friendly intimacy with the leading families of other communities. Raja Narendranath, the venerable Hindu leader, who moved a resolution of congratulation in the Punjab Legislative Council referred to the friendship between his and Sir Sikandar's families. In his reply to the address, Sir Sikandar took occasion to remark on the inadequate attention paid to women's education by the Anjuman. He said:

You have asked for my views on education, and perhaps, you will be a little shocked at them. But when I consider carefully the history of your Anjuman, I find much therein to support the theories, which I have formed for myself. These theories, you must be careful to remember, I give you in my own name only, and not in that of my Government. My esteemed colleague, the Hon'ble Minister for Education, may hold them orthodox and incorrect. But let me remind you that the very first programme undertaken by the Education Society, out of which your Anjuman has developed, was the establishment of a primary school for girls. There you have in one word my first point. Your forefathers and mine paid great attention to the education of girls but in the years between we have forgotten this, and labour almost exclusively for our boys. I wish to hark back to those early leaders and impress on you the necessity and importance of the extension of education among our girls. I commend to your very earnest attention the suggestion that you devote more care towards the education of our girls.

These wise remarks, though addressed to the Muslims, are worthy of the serious attention of all communities. The education of a boy advances his prospects in life. But that of a girl uplifts a whole family and ensures for all time that the light of education will never be allowed to go out in that family. There is one observation in Sir Sikandar's speech of which we rather disapprove. His Excellency seemed to suggest that higher education should be mainly confined to rich people's sons and the poor man's son should be content to drop off at the upper primary stage. Not communists only but individualists also, will take exception to this recommendation. The rich man's son is often apathetic to education, higher or lower. Taking a dozen of the men distinguished in the life of modern India at random, ten or even eleven of them were not born with a silver (even German silver) spoon in his mouth. As Sir Sikandar knows the Indian aristocracy was one of culture and not of property. Sir Bampfylde Fuller says in his 'Reminiscences' that a millionaire even with a European coachman would pass unnoticed in the streets of an Indian town while a fakir or a sanyasi walking along with his begging bowl, would be saluted with respect by every shop-keeper in the street. We do not agree with the cry that education is being overdone in this country. Education can not be overdone anywhere. The proposition is self-evident to any one whose ideas of the aims of education are not warped by the economic issue which has really nothing to do with it. The aim of education is not to make millionaires or even to provide its possessor with a livelihood. Its aim is to ensure that the everyday work of the world should be done intelligently and effectively and with an eye not mainly on one's own good but of the good of humanity. There is no proof that if all our colleges were closed, as Sir P. C. Ray would like them to be, there would be less unemployment in the land than there is. It is better any day to be educated and unemployed than to be uneducated and unemployed.

A Biting Retort:—Sir John Megaw is a recently retired official of the Government of India. He tried to do his bit to enlighten British opinion on Indian affairs by reading a paper before the East India Association in London on "Population and Health in India." The papers read before this body of mutual admirers are generally nowadays made up of anecdotes of unverified, sometimes unverifiable, origin, conversations with villagers carried on by officials who know no vernacular, and obiter dicta on subjects outside the competence of retired men, the object being to furnish relaxation for the boredom of suburban life to which the erstwhile Indian Sahibs are doomed to the end of their extraordinary longevity. This Surgeon General's contribution to the humour of the evening was the story of a Mahratta State Karbhari, who requested a pre-historic predecessor of Lord Brabourne's, Sir Richard Temple, "to use his high character and transcendent ability to restrain, in some measure at all events, the inordinate aptitude of the people to increase the population." Sir Richards indignant reply was that "he would do everything in his power for the increase and nothing for the diminution of His Majesty's subjects." This story is full of improbabilities: There was no great increase of population in Sir Richard Temple's time; on the contrary the country had just emerged from a devastating famine; there was no Mahratta Karbhari at the time who was capable of conveying in the English language to the high and mighty Governor his views on the population question supposing he had any. The only element of probability is the utter absence of the sense of humour of Sir Richard Temple as an illustration of which the story was very likely concocted by a retired Anglo-Indian official who found time hanging heavily on his hands. Well, Sir John Megaw waxed eloquent on the population problem as expounded in Dr. Hutton's romantic thesis in his Census Report. "Nature now threatens," said the Surgeon General, "to take her revenge for our interference with her destructive power." There was an old gentleman in the audience who took this as a personal reflection. It was Sir Leonard Rogers. Sir Leonard's remarks are worth quoting:

I have listened with somewhat mingled feelings to the paper of my old friend Sir John Megaw, because I cannot help wondering if, after having spent my life in finding new forms of treatment and prevention of cholera, dysentery, liver abscess, etc., I might not have been better employed in finding a lethal gas which would put the excess population out of their misery. However, as I have often felt that one of the greatest disappointments of a research worker is that when he does make discoveries they can rarely be applied in India on any large scale, because the majority of the people live in villages where they cannot obtain or afford to employ a medical man, so I now have the consolation that I have not saved as many people as I might otherwise have done. We control epidemics to a large extent, but I am not sanguine as to the control of all cholera outbreaks. We have not had very big epidemics lately owing to good monsoons; so we have been very fortunate in recent years. In the famine years 1875 and 1892 and 1900 we had big cholera epidemics, which are likely to recur under similar conditions. The greatest Viceroy I have served under, Lord Curzon, showed his wisdom in taking up the question of improving agriculture. He started the Agricultural College at Pusa to improve food supplies. That is the best way to deal with the problem, as what we want to do is to increase our food supplies for this increased population, and this is gradually being done.

Princes and the Press:—A valued friend writes, "As recently there was so much talk and writing about the steps taken by the Government to protect the Indian rulers from the criticism of "the gutter press," I wonder whether your attention has been drawn to the story called "Durbar" appearing as a serial in the Illustrated Weekly of India. Those of my friends who have read it all complain that it is just in the same vein as Miss Mayo's well-known book. I read a good part of it and felt disgusted with the manner in which Indian life has been presented in it. The story is more or less an adaptation of Rasputin.....The veil in "Durbar" is very thin and Indian readers must have attributed all that is written within to a particular state and to a particular princess therein. The pity of it all is that the well-known firm of Indian publishers advertise this "Durbar," and also another book by the same author called "The Cactus Land." In doing this—about the latter book—the announcement states, 'Mr. (Denis) Kincaid writes of these varied scenes with the same intimate knowledge of native life, the same detached impartiality which distinguished his earlier book and with a sense of character which makes a moving story as well as a brilliant picture of a little known and fascinating corner of India.' We have read neither of these books or serials and from what our correspondent says they are not worth reading. It is evidently a catch-penny affair, like the sensational prize competitions of the "get rich quick" type by which circulation has to be maintained. The Princes Protection Bill does not really protect the princes but is a Damocles' sword hanging over the Indian section of the press.

An "Asiatic Year":—We publish elsewhere an interesting article on the "Asiatic Year" of the Student Christian Movement by Dr. W. A. Visser't Hooft. The writer has some interesting remarks on the types of Christian Students in different countries based on personal experience and welcomes the opportunity afforded by sessions at different towns in Asia for contacts between Christians of all nations.

would like to know, is what is the positive plank in the Party's programme? It would, of course, make the national demand. If it is carried, what then? If it is rejected, would the Swarajist walk out of the Assembly and proclaim another boycott? Are they prepared to accept office unlike the old Swarajists? If they are, how will they be less open to the charge of job hunting than the Liberals and Communalists? If they are not, then what is the kind of constructive activity within or without the Assembly and the Legislative Councils that they contemplate? Is there no possibility that the electors may argue that a policy of co-operation is better carried out by people who have all through been consistent co-operators than by people who have adopted it only because they have found their own policy of non-co-operation has failed—that is adopted co-operation as a matter of expediency, if indeed, not as a more effective means of non-co-operation?

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, MAY 5, 1934.

SOCIAL REFORM AND THE INDUSTRIAL PROBLEM.

The history of the reform movement resulting from the impact of western civilisation on the Indian mind is an interesting study. The man who first caught the impulse and transmitted it to his and succeeding generations was Raja Ram Mohun Roy. He was a religious, social, and political reformer in his single person. He was a lover of freedom. He welcomed British rule as a great emancipating influence in the whole field of national life. His religious reform movement was based on the ancient Indian principle of reverence for all religions. He was instrumental in getting the practice of sati put down and he inaugurated the movement known specifically as Indian social reform which dealt mainly with the customs affecting marriages and women generally. He was followed by other great men who working on the lines which he laid down were able to bring about a revolution in the public mind in respect of the position of women in society. For nearly a century, reform of customs which cramped the growth of women and deprived society of their powerful aid in progressive movements, occupied and absorbed the energies of social reformers. As the result of their persistence, women today are no longer in the background. They have their provincial and All-India organisations affiliated to international organisations and a recognised place in legislative and other statutory bodies. The progress made in the advancement of women has set social reformers free to turn their attention to reforms connected with the structure of society and the relation between different castes and communities. The disappearance of the old village industries and the growth of modern industries in the country have called into existence a new problem, namely, the relation between employers and workers. So long ago as 1919, Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, then General Secretary of the Indian National Social Conference, in a message to that body which met that year at Amritsar, pointed out that the time had come to expand the scope of Indian social reform so as to include the subjects which in the West go by that name. Among these he mentioned the condition of workers in industries. Mr. G. K. Devadhar, President of the Servants of India Society and the founder of the Poona Seva Sadan, in his address to the Social Conference held in Madras a few months ago, again called attention to this question and urged prompt action in the direction suggested by Sir Narayan Chandavarkar fifteen years ago.

There is a great advantage in the relations between capital and labour, employers and employed, being discussed as a social problem rather than as either a political or purely economic

one. Workers and employers are, equally members of the social body and when we recognise this fact there are better chances of finding a way to agreement between them than if we persist in thinking of them as belonging to two antagonistic groups each of which is intent on exploiting the other. The capitalist and the worker belong to the same species. Nature has not endowed the one with a pair of horns nor the other with a tail to distinguish them from each other. A turn of the wheel of fortune changes the employer into an employee. "If I were not born the son of a millowner I would be a Bolshevik," remarked one of them to this writer in a moment of frank disillusionment. What makes employers and workers feel towards each other as enemies is the system which holds both in its grip. This system, which India has had forced on her from the West, is based on and has for its chief motive the profit of the persons who furnish capital and is indifferent to the interests of the worker but for whom capital can not function. This system which far-seeing men condemned at its very birth as anti-social, has since the War come to be recognised by every thinking man as a hideous failure. Sir George Schuster is no longer connected with the Government of India and there is, therefore, no impropriety in referring to what he said one evening in an informal exposition of Indian Finance to a gathering of passengers in a boat bound for Europe in the middle of last year. He plainly declared that the industrial system of which private profit was the motive power was doomed and must be replaced by something more in accord with public interests. We reprint in this issue an excerpt from an article in "Current History." The writer shows how economic nationalism, which is the system based on private profit magnified and aggravated into national dimensions, is imperilling the peace of the world. In every country in the world (except India) the capitalist system has either been abolished or brought under severe state control. Russia has sought to save herself by abolishing capitalism. Italy has sought a solution by making the employer and worker subject to State control. Germany under a different label is doing the same thing. The United States under democratic forms is following the same policy. Great Britain has swept away all her old landmarks and what were deemed hateful heresies ten years ago (including default of debt) are now her guiding principles. As Mr. J. A. Spender observed in his article in "Current History" a part of which was reproduced in the Reformer of March 31, she has adopted the method of bringing about a drastic redistribution of wealth by heavily taxing the rich to provide assistance for the unemployed.

India is the only country in the world, ruled by a Western country, in which the control of capital carries with it no obligations except that of paying taxes. Once the taxes are paid there are no further obligations to the community.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 5

—realpatidar.com—

This is not the Indian idea. On the contrary, it is wholly opposed to the Indian conception of the duties of wealth, Indian civilization unlike the Western in this as in all other respects being one based on duties rather than on rights. The Strike of Textile Workers in Bombay City which has been in progress for nearly two weeks, offers a topical illustration. Before the Strike began Government announced that it will 'keep the ring,' as if it was a sort of boxing match got up for the amusement of the public, free of the Entertainment Tax. In four days the majority of the mills were closed and the number of workers on strike swelled to 60,300. Government promptly threw aside their proclaimed policy and arrested the leaders under a law which even the Times of India (the brave champion of the mill workers in the halcyon days of Lovat Fraser) had to admit applied only to civil disobedience and must disappear with it. We publish the Government Note in justification of their action and side by side with it the weighty, cautious and candid statement issued by Mr. N. M. Joshi whose knowledge of Labour conditions in Bombay is unique because it has been gained by prolonged social service among the workers. The two documents speak for themselves and the intelligent reader can judge between them. We should like to say a word, however, on the argument that the arrested men were professed communists. The mere profession of communism is not a sin, especially now that the Soviet Government is recognised by the most orthodox Anglo-Saxon Governments and is in a fair way to become their colleague in the League of Nations. If there is any evidence that these men were using or trying to use the strike to overthrow the State, it should have been published and the men prosecuted under the law. The Bombay Government have instituted a Departmental Enquiry and the workers are told that they should have awaited its report. Why not apply the same reasoning to the employers? They did not wait for any Government enquiry before they cut the wages and what is more there is no knowing that they will accept the result of the enquiry if it is not in their favour. Meanwhile they have secured a heavy protective duty on imported piecegoods. In reply to a question in the House of Commons the Under Secretary of State for India denied that the workers were being forced by Government to accept lower wages. This is technically correct but actually, the question was not off the mark. It is reported that one or two mills have evicted the workers from their residential quarters and that they have shifted to other places. They must have gone to live with their relatives in overcrowded chawls, endangering public health. The workers, it is said, are unorganised and there is no body with which negotiation can be carried on. Their very disorganisation is the strongest reason why Government should feel a special responsibility for their interests. The fact that disorganised and resourceless as they are they have come out in their thousands and have been holding on for about a fortnight, shows that the grievances which have driven them to this course are sufficiently coercive without any extraneous persuasion.

THE SWARAJ PARTY.

The Swaraj Party was formed at Patna at a meeting of Congressmen who had discarded the method of non-co-operation as unsuitable to the circumstances of the country. The Party, it is said, will be a wing of the Congress like the All-India Spinners' Association and the Harijan Seva Sangh or Sabha. We do not know about the Spinners' Association but this is the first time that we learn that the Harijan Seva Sangh is a wing of the National Congress. There is surely some mistake here. Mr. G. K. Devadhar is President of the Maharashtra branch of the Sangh and he is a prominent member of the Liberal Party. So is Pandit Hridayanath Kunzru, President of the United Provinces Branch of the Sangh. There are, on the other hand, members of the Congress who do not approve of Gandhiji's anti-untouchability methods. Pandit Malaviya is a conspicuous instance. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru described some of these activities as fit only for old women. In fact, the Poona Pact with its communal primary electorates is a distinct violation of the Karachi Congress resolution. If this process is carried further the Congress will be all wings and no body. Dr. Ansari has been elected President of the new Party but as he can not stand for any non-Muslim community, the honour and the responsibility for leading it in the Legislative Assembly has been assigned to Mr. Bhulabhai Desai who aspires to be elected by the late Mr. Patel's constituency in Gujarat now represented by Mr. Anklesaria. Dr. Ansari is quite sure that the Swaraj candidates will sweep the polls but he has not given any reasons for his belief. We pointed out in a recent issue why this confidence may prove to be misplaced. We may add that Dr. Ansari's hope extends only to the general, non-Muslim electorates to which he is debarred access. The new Party, it is said, will seek the suffrages of the electorate on three issues: rejection of the White Paper, condemnation of Government's repressive policy and the adoption of the national programme put forward by Pandit Motilal Nehru some ten years ago which most people have forgotten. Surely, the Party can frame a programme of its own with closer reference to the events which have happened since the Pandit planned his scheme and the conditions prevalent at the present day. Nobody is much enamoured of the White Paper scheme; and the policy of the Ordinances is, of course, indefensible by any Indian whatever his political creed. But these are negative objects which contain no mandate to the Party. There are many other things which may be condemned, for instance, the exchange ration. But what the electors

THE BOMBAY TEXTILE STRIKE SITUATION.

Following the arrest of fourteen strike leaders under the Emergency Powers Act in Bombay on Monday (30th April) morning two important statements have been released to the press which we give below. The first explains the Government's point of view and the second gives the Labour attitude.

1. BOMBAY GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE.

The strike in the Bombay textile industry has now been in progress for a week. After watching the course of events for this period Government have thought it necessary in the interests of the public safety and peace to arrest and detain 14 prominent strike leaders and they desire that their reasons for taking this action should be understood, says a press note issued by the Director of Information, Bombay.

Government, in accordance with their general policy of allowing the utmost possible freedom to labour movements consistently with the requirements of the public safety and peace, placed no obstacles in the way of the proposed strike, and have used its opening stages to test the bona fides of the organizers and the wishes of the workers. The response on the opening day, when only four mills employing about 5,000 operatives were closed, showed that there was at the outset no general inclination on the part of the workers to support the strike.

It was not until two days later that the strike assumed large proportions and in the meanwhile processions had been active in the mill area, stones had been thrown at working mills and at the police, a number of assaults had been made on individual workers and secret intimidation was actively practised at the workers' chawls. It was at this stage that orders under Section 144, Criminal Procedure Code, regulating the routes of processions and the places of meetings became necessary. Inflammatory speeches continued, however, to be delivered at meetings urging the strikers to bring men out of the remaining mills, to prevent the re-opening of those already closed and to disobey the orders of the police, and these speeches had their natural consequence in acts of violence. On Friday, April 27 after such a meeting a large body of strikers made a fierce and wholly unprovoked attack with stones on the workers of the Textile Mill while they were returning from work accompanied by a few unarmed police, and a most serious riot was only stopped by a few police officers with their revolvers.

On April 28 leaflets were distributed and speeches delivered urging the strikers to concentrate on the remaining working mills in order to make the strike complete by May Day, and it was suggested that the railwaymen and tramwaymen should be persuaded to join in the demonstrations although they have no connection with any textile dispute. Similar speeches were delivered on April 29.

Having regard to the way in which such advice has been interpreted in the past, Government considered that owing to the manner in which the strike was being conducted an emergency involving grave likelihood of disorder has arisen and that it was necessary to use the powers conferred by the Bombay Special Emergency Powers Act to remove the ringleaders mainly responsible for this situation. While Government have always been reluctant to use these powers in regard to labour dispute, they indicated to the Legislative Council at the time when the Act was passed that it might be necessary to use them to deal with persons actively furthering a Communist movement for the overthrow of the existing structure of society. The persons arrested are all professed communists and have been conducting this strike not with a view to a settlement but with the apparent object of spreading and intensifying disturbed conditions.

It is clear to Government that, after the strike leaders have had a week in which the opportunities for meetings, discussion and persuasion have been little restricted, there is a large body of workers who have continued and are anxious to continue at work. The determination of the strike leaders to include these workers in the ranks of the strikers could only succeed by increasing the methods of intimidation which have already been in operation. In the opinion of Government these workers have every right to protection and the time is ripe for definitely checking the methods which have been used to induce them to leave their work.

Government desire to make it clear that no restriction has been placed on the functioning of Trade Unions and that these continue free to conduct the strike on behalf of workers who have grievances which they desire to have settled.

Government have made no reference in this note to the merits of the dispute but desire to bring it to public notice that they have already taken the action which seemed most desirable, the institution of an expert fact-finding inquiry into the effect of wage cuts and rationalisation and into conditions generally in the textile industry of the Presidency. This inquiry was begun in March and it is hoped that the results will be ready for publication about June.

2.—MR. N. M. JOSHI'S STATEMENT.

The present strike in the textile industry of Bombay is organized by the Girmi Kamgar Union under the auspices of the All-India Trade Union Congress. The National Trades Union Federation and the Bombay Labour Union which is affiliated to the Federation would have co-operated with the Trade Union Congress if their co-operation had been sought on equal terms from the initial stage of the consideration of the present position of the workers in the industry and of the steps to be taken for the protection of the workers. Unfortunately, the co-operation of the Federation and the Union was not sought in the way in which it could have been given. Under these circumstances, those who belong to the Federation and the Union thought it their duty not to intervene in a dispute to which they were not a party. But now a stage is reached when silence on the ground of internal organisational differences cannot be justified, though we have no desire to intervene in the dispute unless our intervention is sought or forced upon us by further developments.

To judge whether the textile workers in Bombay have a good case or not, a reference to only a few facts will be sufficient. Since March 1933 more than forty mills have reduced wages from 7% to 25%; some others have made unspecified cuts.

In para 45 of their report the Tariff Board make a definite statement that the wage level in Ahmedabad had gone above that of Bombay after the wages in Ahmedabad were raised in 1930. After the reduction of wages that has taken place in Bombay since 1933, the Ahmedabad wage level must have gone up higher still.

Moreover, in para 89 of their report, the Tariff Board state that the proportion of cost of wages to the total cost of production in Bombay is 49.40 while in Ahmedabad it is 53.80. Nobody will suggest that the cost of living in Ahmedabad is higher than in Bombay. The Tariff Board in para 1 of the Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations state that in Bombay, although the number of working spindle les has fallen 15%, the number of looms by 5.4% and the number of persons employed by 13.5%, the production of yarn and cloth has increased by 28.4% and 32% respectively. This is a clear indication that the efficiency of labour has considerably gone up. The Millowners may use the argument of the fall in prices and cost of living. Unfortunately the cost of living index number of the Bombay Labour Office has been admitted to be faulty. Moreover the standard of life of the textile workers is so low that the advantage, if any, of the fall in the cost of living, cannot be reasonably claimed by the workers. Furthermore the textile industry is now a sheltered industry under strong tariff protection.

Whatever may be the merits of the case on both sides, it cannot be denied that the workers have a strong case to fight—at least a case that requires careful investigation. That the textile workers are uneducated and mostly unorganised is also an admitted fact. Under these circumstances if their interests are to be protected, they must be protected by some others.

In a dispute between an individual millowner and his workers, the former is not expected to speak for and stand for the latter.

But the Millowners Association which is a body of educated and influential men, if they care for the interests of the workers, should stand for the workers against the action of its individual member in at least protecting its members against internal competition in wage-cutting. Unfortunately the Millowners' Association does not control its members in this respect. It will also be admitted that when one of the two parties to a dispute is weaker, it is the duty of Government to protect the weaker in a dispute with the stronger party. Unfortunately our Government which consists of men trained in British traditions, consider that their duty ends with the "keeping the ring clear." They forget the difference between British conditions where the two parties are more or less equal and the Indian conditions where the workers cannot be regarded to be equal. Under these circumstances if some persons, whatever may be their political opinions, intervene on the side of the workers, they cannot be blamed.

It is true that the Government of Bombay ordered an enquiry into the issues involved in this dispute in February last. But even then instead of resorting to an open inquiry under the Trade Dispute Act in which the Court conducting the enquiry has the power to order papers and records and take evidence, they ordered a departmental enquiry. The Royal Commission on Indian Labour has commented on the unwillingness of the Provincial Governments to make use of even the small powers given to them under the above mentioned Act. Moreover, it must be remembered that this inquiry was ordered after, and not before, the decision to organise a strike was taken. If it is wrong to declare a strike after the inquiry was ordered, it is equally wrong to wait for the ordering of an enquiry till a strike is decided upon. It is true that, as there are grave risks to the workers in a strike, leaders of workers should have waited for the result of the departmental inquiry and should have also pressed for the hastening of its completion. It is for this reason that the Bombay Textile Labour Union did not take part in strike. But let it be remembered that if blame is to be fairly allocated, it must not be laid on one side only.

It is said that the strike is not a voluntary and a spontaneous act of the workers and that it is created by the propaganda and even by intimidation. This is not a fair comment. No strike or any other action on a large scale can be voluntary and spontaneous.

It requires organisation and propaganda, and some degree of coercion is inherent in organisation to compel a hesitant or unwilling minority to fall in line with the majority. Where there is no organisation and when it is difficult to say on which side the majority lies, people unjustifiably presume coercion and intimidation to a degree to which it may not exist. In any case it is difficult to make a definite statement about their extent.

It must be remembered that the millowners by their own action have made a spontaneous strike impracticable. They deliberately chose the policy of resorting to varying rates of wage-cuts in one mill after another in order to prevent joint resistance to them by the workers. It cannot be denied that on several occasions of the wage cuts, spontaneous strikes did take place. But on account of the large number of workers who have been unemployed for a long time, the workers were beaten every time.

Thus the millowners themselves forced upon the workers the necessity of a bigger strike covering the whole industry. Such a strike after the workers were beaten sectionally, cannot be expected to be spontaneous. If the millowners had themselves taken concerted action simultaneously with the sanction of their Association, there are sufficient grounds for predicting that there would have been a strike in the whole industry spontaneously. To resort to a device of sectional wage-cuts in order to beat the workers and then complain that the strike is not spontaneous, is not fair.

There is a good deal of talk of the use of violence generally by means of stone-throwing. It cannot be denied that some times undisciplined workers throw stones; but it cannot be equally denied that on some occasions stone-throwing is resorted to by "agents provocateurs." It is the duty of the police to prevent violence, but unfortunately "respectable looking persons acting as "agents provocateurs" escape suspicion and arrest, and, where "agents provocateurs" belong to the working classes, they are mistaken for strikers.

Admitting that Government have a duty to maintain law and order, indiscriminate arrests under the Emergency Acts are not justified. Moreover, if emergency powers are to be exercised to keep law and order, a Government that recognises its responsibility to protect the weaker section of the community, must not hesitate to take special powers to enforce a reasonable wage.

It is not yet heard that the Government has such a power; nor is it heard that they are speaking it. It is the duty and the responsibility of the Government towards this city, towards the industry and towards its weaker section, namely the workers employed in the industry, to put an end to this dispute. They should expedite a thorough inquiry and pending the result of the inquiry should assume special powers to compel the millowners to restore the wage-cuts. They should also arm themselves on this occasion with power to enforce the recommendations which may be made as a result of this inquiry.

General Higgins to Retire:—General Higgins has resigned the office of the General of the Salvation Army with effect from November 10. Announcing his decision to retire from the Salvation Army, General Higgins says that, when accepting the leadership of the Salvation Army in 1929, he was unable to promise to continue after his seventieth birthday. A few months back he was urged by leaders throughout the world to extend his period of office, but he was compelled to accept the verdict of two eminent physicians that his health was likely to be adversely affected by such an extension and so he had decided to retire at the end of the present year. General Higgins' successor will be elected in London by the High Council in August.

THE WORLD'S STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION IN ASIA.*

(BY DR. W. A. VISSER 'T HOOFT.)

A world-movement, worthy of that name, may not remain chained to headquarters or to one limited geographical area. It must be constantly "on trek" demonstrating its vitality in one part of the world after another and concentrating all its available forces on different continents in turn.

Since the days when John R. Mott taught Student Christian Movement leaders to think in world-terms this conviction has been particularly influential in the shaping of the policies of the World's Student Christian Federation. Instead of following the line of least resistance and holding its meetings always in Europe and America, it has therefore often mobilised its forces for an attack on the problems of Asia. Tokyo, Peking, and Mysore (India) represent important dates in Federation history. It was therefore natural, particularly in this period of great transformations in Asia, that the Federation would make the world 'East of Suez' the centre of its activities. This was done throughout the latter part of 1933.

The centre of these activities was a meeting for students and student leaders held near Batavia. The recently formed Student Christian Movement of Java had initiated this conference in order to present itself to the Federation and the Federation to its members at the very outset of its organised life. Java has relatively few international contacts and it was thought that a concentrated dose of such contacts might help the Indonesian Christian Students to see their own task in the setting of a common world-wide mission.

Delegates came from Japan, China, the Philippines, Straits Settlements, Siam, Burma, India, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand and the Dutch East Indies. And the West was represented by various members of the Federation Executive Committee. The programme, drawn up by a representative Eastern committee, centred in the main problems of Christians in Eastern Universities, that is to say the issues of nationalism, communism and syncretism, as well as the underlying question of "the significance of Jesus-Christ." Since the discussion of these questions revealed clearly what main tendencies of thought and life confront Christian students of the East to-day it may be of interest to summarise the main conclusions arrived at.

With regard to the problem of nationalism all reports spoke the same language. The disappointment over internationalism and the desire for national consolidation along military and economic lines among Chinese students, the powerful fascist movement in Japanese universities, the more recent but very real growth of self-consciousness among the Indonesian peoples and the grim struggle for freedom in India—these are all elements of one and the same Eastern awakening which affects young intellectuals in a very special way. But Christian students may not let themselves be swept off their feet by it. In the report of the special group on this issue, Mr. Ralla Ram stated: "Our positive task of witnessing to the reality of the World Community of Christians, existing eternally in the Church, limits our loyalty to the nation." And the spirit in which Japanese and Chinese, Javanese and Dutch, Eastern and Western mixed during the conference was a strong illustration of the genuineness of this conviction. Communism is not quite as all-persuasive as nationalism. But in China, in Japan (in a secret and underground way) and more recently in the "Youth Movement" in India, Marxism in its fully materialistic and violent form has made a deep impression on large sections of the student community. In this realm the one effective answer is practical rather than ideological. It must be demonstrated that Christians are not indifferent to the suffering of the underprivileged masses. The Eastern Student Christian Movements are therefore embarking on student campaigns for rural service. These pioneer-adventures in national reconstruction are already under weigh in India and China.

The problem of the relation between Christianity and other Faiths was of course uppermost in the minds of many delegates. Can we co-operate in religious matters with adherents of other faiths? Is Gandhi right in his rejection of conversion from one religion to another? Is Christianity absolute? Such questions were discussed with great passion, especially after the powerful address of Dr. Kraemer of Java on this subject. But the outcome was by no means an acceptance of a vague syncretism. It is true that many difficulties in this thorny realm remained unsolved, but the general tenor of the discussion was one of definite willingness to accept the authority of Jesus-Christ as ultimate and all-sufficient.

With this last sentence we touch, at the same time on the deepest note that ran through the Conference—a note which augurs well for the future of Christianity in the East. It was one of willingness to accept the Lordship of Jesus Christ in all realms of life. T. Z. Koo of China in his very simple and direct presentation of his own pilgrimage with Jesus Christ struck that note forcefully. And it was echoed in many statements made by students during and after the Conference.

In the months following the Java meetings leaders of the Federation visited various Asiatic countries. Thus Francis Miller, the Chairman, toured Japan and China, accompanied by Jean Gestambide of the French Student Christian Movement. Instead of only addressing student audiences, they concentrated in both countries on small regional meetings with student movement leaders. It is certainly due to this policy that they have been able to help so materially in drawing up new plans for service and action along the two important lines of rural reconstruction and study of the Christian message in relation to its modern "rivals." In both countries new groups have come into being to stimulate student thought about the great themes discussed at Java. At the same time, however, they have given much attention to the needs of students in government schools who are largely untouched by Christian influences. They report unexpected and most encouraging response to Christianity among these students. If persons can be found who can present the Christian message in a simple and challenging way to these students masses, they do not doubt that a great evangelistic forward movement is possible.

Another stream of life went from Java to India. In the Quadrennial Conference of the Indian Student Christian Movement at Allahabad the influence of the Java meeting was noticeable in the programme as well as in the presence and contributions of several 'Java delegates' from India itself, from Burma and from Java which had sent a special delegation to follow up the contracts recently made. The Federation as such was represented by the present writer who made a tour through Indian colleges and universities before and after the meeting.

The four to five hundred Indian Christian students gathered at Allahabad came largely from mission-colleges and represented therefore the somewhat "protected" rather than the "exposed" type of student.

Their main problem was to translate the Christianity which in their Christian institutions they were perhaps tempted to accept too passively into reality and into action. At the same time however, they were keenly aware of the rising tide of anti-religious sentiment among their fellow-students, who tend to turn away from the religious and traditional nationalism of a Gandhi to the anti-religious and revolutionary nationalism of a Nehru. Here again the two emphases on the rediscovery of a personal and victorious faith and on the necessity of ministering to the needs of suffering India were central. An older member of the movement, who had seen many Indian Student meetings, called it the most evangelistic student conference in his experience. Nevertheless it was also at Allahabad that a new Student Volunteer Movement for rural service was founded.

During my journey through India I had occasion to address many student audiences and to enter into the life of the movement. I came away with the impression that in spite of the atmosphere of despondency which has come over Indian students in the last two years, the movement is very much alive and that if it can strike the right note, it has great opportunities in the field of evangelism. The breakdown of religion as well as political idealism among students has created a void which demands to be filled.

Thus the spiritual process begun at Java has already radiated in different directions. And there is good reason to hope that it will continue to do so. The Eastern movements have not yet come to know each other sufficiently well. It seems sometimes as if Shanghai is nearer to Geneva than to Calcutta, or as if Batavia is nearer to Amsterdam than to Tokyo. Through the new contacts made, however, it has become possible to get these movements, so similar in many of their problems and characteristics, to collaborate more closely. Various plans for interchange are already made. Before long India will send a student delegation to Java. China and India, as well as China and Japan, are also discussing possibilities of inter-visitation. Again a special study group on "Christianity and other Faiths," largely composed of Eastern leaders, will soon begin to function as an advisory agency to all Eastern movements which are concerned about this problem.

In closing it must, however, be said that there is no desire in Federation circles to create an Asiatic consciousness as opposed to a European or American consciousness. Our goal remains a pioneer Christian World Community of Christian students. For that reason contacts between East and West must be encouraged in addition to the purely Eastern plans mentioned above. Thus T. Z. Koo's visits to Europe and America, the visit of a Negro-student delegation to India and the rapprochement between Asiatic students in Europe with their European colleagues are as important as the projects born at Java. But that is another story and carries us into another year. The purpose of this article was only to describe an "Asiatic year" in Federation life.

Austria Goes Fascist:—Austria officially became a Fascist state on 1st May, the Labour Day. The Parliament ratified the new constitution and then died. A crowd of 50,000 gathered at the Harplatz in Linz to hear Chancellor Dollfuss explain the constitution. An official account of the new constitution of the Austrian "Guild State," given to the press by Dr. Otto Ender, Minister of the Constitution, shows that in case of failure of the proposed Federal Council to act on Government Bills, the Government is empowered to proclaim emergency martial law.

BHIKKHU DEVAMITTA DHAMMAPALA

(Contributed)

The first death anniversary of Sri Devamitta Dhammapala fell on the 29th of April, 1934. It was celebrated under the auspices of the Maha Bodhi Society with the Hon'ble Mr. Justice M. N. Mookerji as president.

It was forty-two years ago that Anagarika Thammapala paid his first visit to India. A young man of twenty-six years of age he had already distinguished himself in Ceylon by his determined efforts in the cause of Buddhism. He came of a rich Buddhist family in the Island which had produced many leaders honoured all over Ceylon.

Dhammapala left all prospects of material advancement and at an early age dedicated himself to the work of spreading Buddhism. His visit to India was a turning-point in his life. The neglected condition of the Buddhist temple at Buddha-Gaya made him organise the Maha-Bodhi Society for the purpose of recovering the Temple from the Mahant's hands. This led to a troubled, and rather tempestuous chapter in the life of the great worker. The Temple was not recovered. Long possession pitted itself against a higher right and defeated it in the law suit that followed. But the struggle which was a long-drawn-out one opened Dhammapala's eyes to new problems and, heroic fighter that he was, he prepared to face them all in a satisfactory manner.

Meanwhile he sprang into international fame by his addresses at the First Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in 1893. He travelled in Europe and everywhere his personality and persuasive eloquence evoked the highest admiration. He was a Power in Ceylon. He made enemies. He heeded nothing except the goal before him. He lost the favour of the Government and there was a time when the most severe punishment might have been summarily executed on him if only he were present in the Island. He was interned in Calcutta for about six years (1914-1920).

Work was life to Dhammapala. He edited half a dozen papers all of which he had established himself. He wrote articles, gave public lectures, and attended to a voluminous correspondence with three continents. He besides organised a number of schools and colleges in Ceylon and at least one Hospital in Colombo. He was imbued with progressive ideas and a knowledge of the sciences was regarded by him as an essential requisite for a cultured man. He encouraged industrial education and it was to his efforts that Ceylon owed the beginning of a training in this direction. He sent some youngmen to Japan for a training in industrial arts and was thus a pioneer in this field.

That a man with his ideas should provoke a large section of the public could be anticipated. He had to fight incessantly but he had the soldier's reward at the end. He won and today his name has passed into a legend and Ceylon reads into it a profound significance in the annals of her national life.

In India too his achievements were of no small account. Sarnath, the historic site where Lord Buddha opened his mouth for the first time to preach the gospel of enlightenment, lay in utter neglect. Dhammapala built here the now famous Mulagandhakuti Vihara and restored the place to some of its lost glories. At Gaya, too, he erected a Rest House for Buddhists, and Calcutta he created a centre of Buddhists of College Square in the shape of the fine Dharma Rajika Chaitya Vihara. There is also a branch of the Maha Bodhi Society in London on the Gloucester Road, Regent's Park.

A year before his death Dhammapala became a fully ordained Bhikkhu and retired from active life.

Such was, in brief, the life of the great leader whom many countries honour and revere. The story of his life will not be complete without a reference to Mrs. Mary Foster of Hawai who, in return for some spiritual help received from him, most generously seconded his efforts with her money. She is the benefactress of the Maha Bodhi Society to the extent of about eight lakhs of rupees.

Dhammapala had one great unfulfilled desire at the time of his death. He wanted to organise an International Buddhist University at Sarnath. At the memorial meeting held last year which was attended by a large body of prominent citizens the idea of organising a University was accepted. A Bulletin was issued by the Maha-Bodhi Society in which this proposal was supported by Dr. Rabindra Nath Tagore, Sir J. C. Bose, Sir C. V. Raman, Sir P. C. Roy and other notable persons.

The Dhammapala Memorial Committee has prepared a scheme for the proposed University and has suggested the establishment of an Academy of Fellows for the promotion of Research in Buddhist fields.

It is the duty of the public to co-operate with the promoters of the scheme. It will tend to a better interpretation of Indian culture and the true patriot will glorify his country by aiding in the best representation of his country's past to the world outside.

THE HINDU MAHASABHA.* (BY RAJA NARENDRA NATH.)

The Mahasabha was established about 17 years ago. The Muslim organisation had been in existence long before. The Hindu leaders of the time thought that the separatist tendency of Muslims, initiated and inspired by their organisations must be checked. The political leaders were of opinion that the best way of evolving a nation was to begin by uniting the Hindus more closely as parts of one organic whole, and to promote good feelings between the Hindus and other communities in India and to act in a friendly way with them. Under the conditions which existed then and which have existed since, no other way of evolving or building up a nation is conceivable. The institution of caste is peculiar to the Hindus and though it served a purpose in the Hindu History, there is not the least doubt that it has stood in the way of creating a feeling of religious fraternity, which the followers of other religions evince. Brotherly feeling between different communities, one of which lacks brotherly feeling amongst its own constituents, is to me inconceivable.

The teachings of Christ and the philosophy of Vedanta supply us practically with the same rules of human conduct. Territorial patriotism developed in countries in which Christianity spread. But nowhere did Christianity come across the conditions which caste system creates in India. The idea of religious brotherhood is due to Islam. It originated with its great founder, and was immensely strengthened by the turn which Islamic history took. Christian countries were unable to resist the impulse. At the time of the ascendancy of Islam even Christian nations imbibed the ideas, which formed the groundwork of Islamic civilisation. I find little difference between Crusade and Jihad or between Christendom which at one time was a word to conjure with, and Islamic brotherhood or 'Akhos Islami' or between Papacy and Khilafat both being theocracies. A question which deserves very serious consideration at the hands of our political leaders who hastily condemn the activities of the Mahasabha and of its enthusiastic workers, is whether in matters sociological we can skip over a stage. In the domain of physical science students need not be taught to believe in all the theories which have been exploded since they were discovered. In Astronomy, for instance, the younger generations need not be taught the system of Ptolemy, before being taught the system of Copernicus. The system of Ptolemy has now only a historical interest for us. But the case is quite different in matters sociological in which the mind has to be trained, and emotions to be moulded and shaped with due regard to the surroundings. It seems to me that to ignore the laws of growth by natural selection and evolution is to create the greatest confusion and chaos in society.

I explain more fully, what I mean. We need a Hindu organisation, for organisations facilitate concerted action. Organisations need not be belligerent. Action need not always be militant. Even peaceful action better succeeds in achieving its end, if it is backed up by an organisation. Surely no one will condemn an organisation simply because it is apt to become belligerent. The idea of "nation" at present is inchoate. A few nationalists at the top cannot make nationalism a living force in the masses. My fear as to the sort of society which would be evolved, if the laws of progressive evolution by Natural Selection is ignored, is best illustrated by an example. I relate to you an incident which came to my notice sometimes ago. A Relief Fund was started in the Punjab some years ago. As often happens, several associations took up the work of collection, Arya Samaj, Sanatan Dharam Sabha and Hindu Sabha. There were some gentlemen who waived off the demand of each association on the excuse, that they would rather pay their subscription to the other association, but ended by paying to none. I apprehend that the young men of the future will resist the claims of caste organisations, for conduct requiring self-sacrifice on their part, on the ground that the institution was dying out, and nothing should be done to strengthen it or to prolong its life. The Hindu organisations will be met by the excuse that they are communal and that the cause of the country was dearer than that of a community whilst the nation will be put off by excuse that a nation was only in course of formation. The young men of the future, I fear, would concentrate their energies only on promoting self-interest or at the best on self-regarding virtues. I am fully aware that in India at present enormous sacrifices have been made by large numbers in the cause of the country. But all this has been done under an impulse created by a few noble souls. What is wanted is, to create a noble impulse in the mind of each individual citizen, an impulse which guides him to noble actions, apart from any guidance derived from external sources. The creation of that noble impulse must be preceded by the disappearance of separative forces (religion being only one of them) which cover a wide range. All this takes time and has to be done by stages. But what we need is that the goal towards which we move and the ideal which we keep before us, should be one consistent with, and conducive to, progress, one which takes us gradually towards a larger and larger altruistic circle, a circle with a larger and larger orbit. It is, however, a pity that Mahasabha does not get sufficient support at the hands of those who call themselves Nationalists, when the Sabha demands that in matters with which religion has no connection, difference of religion should not be allowed to operate as a separative force.

The Mahasabha is not a religious body. It may help religious and social reforms, but religious and social reform is not its first and avowed object. It wants to foster the idea of Hindu brotherhood amongst the Hindus as a whole, whether they are strict conservatives (Sanatanists), or men of advanced views, progressive liberals, or radicals. You may have to wait for a century or more before the endogamous character of caste is broken. The whole community may be divided into the groups, "changers" and "No Changers" and these groups may last for generations. In the meantime the Hindus cannot be left without guidance and without a rudder. They cannot be allowed to be split up over differences about retaining or abandoning the endogamous character of caste.

Some of our critics maintain that economic interests will in future be the only uniting force in human society. The ideal commends itself to some amongst the rising generation as it is believed that it will be possible thereby to over-ride other barriers, which the society has framed. I should like to examine the proposition a little more closely. Is it possible that economic interests would be a stronger bond of union than all others which may exist? Is no other platform of union needed? Whether such a union replacing all other links of union would be desirable? Amongst the links of union, other than economic, I may mention the following:—

- (i) Local contiguity;
- (ii) Common language;
- (iii) Common social institutions including what are termed personal laws; laws relating to marriage and succession to property and if these are intertwined with religion as they are in India, then common religion;
- (iv) Common race.

I deliberately omit to mention culture for the term is vague, and undefinable. Assuming that it conveys some meaning, I hold that a progressive society should not be conservative about its culture.

I have put religion almost at the end. I am supposed to argue with an adversary who assigns no importance to matters spiritual and who takes into consideration only matters of every day concern which cover our material interests. I do not see how it is possible to ignore the bond of union which all the factors enumerated above create. I may have common economic interests with a man in Timbuctoo. Is it expected of me that I should think less of the man living next door to me, who speaks the same language, observes the same social rules (I am taking the term in a wider sense) as I do, but whose economic interests are not the same as mine and more of the man who lives far from me, speaks a different language, observes a different set of rules, simply because his economic interests are the same as mine? Were such a change to take place, humanity would be degraded rather than elevated. Every citizen of the future will be a wretch concentrated all in self, whose affections and tender emotions stimulated by his economic interests will overcome the emotions on which other stimuli may work.

Economic interests mean nothing more than the immediate and palpable self-interest of individual citizens composing a State. Those who look upon economic interest as a healthy uniting link worth fighting for cannot with any show of consistency condemn pursuit after the "leaves and fishes of office" as an unworthy object. For under the present conditions in India, specially in the Punjab and your province, there are few other avenues of livelihood open to respectable Indians. When offices are bestowed on the basis of caste and creed conflict between castes and creeds is due to diverse economic interests.

But there is nothing in the aims and objects of the Mahasabha which imposes an impediment on the score of difference in religion on the combination of different classes and communities, if their economic interest are common. Such combinations are by no means uncommon even now. Popular opinion on excise duty against sugar and matches has shown no communal bias in the Punjab. On the contrary, the Mahasabha has always been opposed, as I will show later, to a policy of discrimination on the grounds of religion for the acquisition of civic rights. It has always advocated that difference of religion should not be allowed to come to the fore and a constitution which allows and encourages discrimination in civic rights on the basis of religion must be condemned. In the Ajmer session under the presidency of Bhal Parmanandji the Mahasabha passed a resolution that unity is not to be purchased by surrender to communalism. All that the Mahasabha wants, is that, if in countries in which territorial patriotism is well developed, Lord Reading's resignation of the membership of a German Association, when Germans launched on a policy of persecuting the Jews was commendable, and the Archbishop of Canterbury was justified in drawing the attention of the Members of the House of Lords to atrocities committed on Assyrian Christians by Iraqis, Hindu political leaders in Poona, Bombay, or Allahabad, should not be ashamed of attending to the grievances of Hindus in Peshawar, or even to those of Afghanistan and Kashmir. The Mahasabha tries to create public opinion which would make such apathy and indifference impossible.

There are critics who spurn all religions and say that religion has been responsible for all the mischief that has disgraced the history of mankind. I am unable in this short address to attack their position. The subject needs a separate discourse. Suffice it to say that there is a psychological basis of religion. As long as human nature is what it is, it cannot spurn religion. There is difference between forms of religion and the spirit of it. Temperaments have not ceased to exist, who attach more importance to forms than to spirit.

The political creed of the Mahasabha is misunderstood and misinterpreted. The Mahasabha is as keen on the attainment of Swaraj as any other body, but it postulates that inter-communal relations should be so framed as to lead to Nationalism. For this, it is necessary to base the constitution on the following propositions:—

1. All minorities should be treated on a uniform principle with a view to the eventual merger of minorities in majorities;
2. The constitution should provide that a communal or a caste label gives no claim to the acquisition of any civic right and creates no preferential ground for the acquisition of any such right.

In my address at the Multan Conference I explained at length that Hindus were not a majority community in every province. The Mahasabha at its session of 1926 passed a resolution the 3rd clause of which is given below. It is identical in terms with similar clauses occurring in the constitution of other countries.

"That in any future scheme of provincial autonomy or responsible Self-Government an express clause be inserted declaring it illegal for any Provincial Government to discriminate by caste or creed in respect of acquisition of civic rights or recruitment to posts in public services."

PARSI INTERMARRIAGES.

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,
It is not necessary to reply to "V. A.'s" remarks on "Are Intermarriages a Problem?" in your issue of the 14th April because any intelligent reader of your journal can form his own opinion about its self-discrepancies and dogmatic assertions. But as "V. A." professes to be a purely rational critic it is best to disillusion him. "V. A." writes "Both the dates (1919 and 1933) marked the emergence of the Parsi community out of a decade of phenomenal increase." "The birth rate has steadily fallen among Parsis in recent years until in 1921, as Mr. Hutton remarks, it was lower than among the French." "The increase, in the census enumeration in spite of diminishing birth rate is explained by a low death rate and the influx of Iranis from Persia. The influx of Iranis according to the late Sir Jivanji Modi recent Zoroastrian immigrants from Persia, has been large enough to present a difficult educational problem."

The indiscriminate quotations from census and other reports do not at all support "V. A.'s" contention that the fear of extinction due to frequent intermarriages among Parsis is "illusory." "The agitation against intermarriages that rose to frenzied heights twice, during this century" may have been greatly responsible for the phenomenal increase in the Parsi population. If the community had shut its eyes to these intermarriages the census reports might have told a different tale. There is not the slightest attempt on "V. A.'s" part to prove that the danger to the life of this community through intermarriages "is more imaginary than real."

2. "Figures for intermarriages are not available. Intermarriages are far too few today to constitute a problem."

If "V. A." is a Parsi he is likely to know that since 1931 the number of intermarriages among Parsi girls is greater than even before. If the community tolerates these intermarriages the presumption is that they will tend to increase. And if they increase the danger of extinction would correspondingly increase. It is significant that "V. A." has not adduced a single argument to disprove this contention.

3. As for "V. A.'s" plea for a more tolerant treatment by the community of those members who desert it by marrying outside the community, the matter is not so simple as it seems to "V. A." If "V. A." cares to read my article again he will find that it contains, by way of caution, a plea for finding out ways of preventing the evil other than mere persecution of the erring individuals. But one should have liked "V. A." to make clear what he means by "more tolerance." Intolerance by itself is not wrong. Society has to be intolerant to those of its non-comprising members who injure it. It is not only the right but the duty of every society to curb "the liberty of its individual members" under certain circumstances. "V. A.'s" demand for liberty reminds me of the motorist who wanted to drive on the wrong side of the road in the name of liberty. The real question is as to the degree and extent of such intolerance or limitation of liberty. The agitation against the defiant members of the Parsi community has a great deterrent effect and the temper of the community is not out of proportion to the magnitude of the danger. There are conflicting parties in the community who are able by their mutual antagonism to maintain the requisite balance of temper.

4. One of the ways of preventing intermarriages was to bring up the Parsi children with a sane but increasing attachment to their peculiar traditions and culture. "V. A." seems to dislike the suggestion but his own conclusion appears in the end to support it when he says: "If in these circumstances any community loses its identity the causes will lie in the fact that its members did not care sufficiently for its culture and traditions to secure its preservation." But "V. A." adds: "No conscious effort on the part of individual can arouse a love in community for its culture if its members are indifferent to it." As usual "V. A." offers no proof of this astounding assertion. In India itself our indifference to our art and culture had been very great. But the "conscious efforts" of men like Tagore and Gandhi and other nation-builders are bringing about a new renaissance. The Reformer itself is an example of what can be achieved in social reform by conscious efforts of determined individuals.

5. As for "V. A.'s" use of the Census Commissioner's remarks on the causes for the falling birth rate among Parsis, readers of the Reformer know full well how much importance is to be attached to the obiter dicta of a Census Commissioner or to "statements of fact mixed up with much speculation by an imaginative Census Commissioner" as the Editor very well puts it elsewhere. However the question of falling birth rate is outside the scope of the subject and so "V. A.'s" ironical or absurd suggestion about its prevention has to be left severely alone. For all these reasons "V. A.'s" question "Are Intermarriages a problem?" is very much like a deaf man asking "Is there a noise problem?"

THE WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF FAITHS.

The inaugural meeting of the World Fellowship of Faiths was held at the Blavasky Lodge Hall, French Bridge, on Sunday evening, with Sir Govindrao Pradhan in the chair.

Addressing the meeting, Raja J. P. Bahadur Singh said that the object of the meeting was to inaugurate in Bombay an Indian National Committee of the World Fellowship of Faiths, a movement intended to realize world peace and unity through faiths in Fellowship.

It was during the lecture tour in Europe which he undertook in the year 1929, that the speaker came in contact with the Threefold Movement and it was then conceived that the World Fellowship of Faiths should be held at a Second Parliament of Religions at Chicago's Second World Fair in 1933.

The two great factors that were to distinguish the World Fellowship of Faiths from the first Parliament of Religions that was held in Chicago during the Columbian Exposition of 1893, were; First, in place of a competitive parade of rival religions, all faiths were to be challenged to focus their best inspiration on man's present problems. Second, not only all religions were to be invited to participate, but all faiths, with the understanding that "faiths" include all types of spiritual consciousness and conviction which are determining the actual lives of significant groups of people.

During the sessions it was decided, said Bahadur Singh, to make the World Fellowship of Faiths a permanent organization, and accordingly an International Committee was formed with the Maharajah of Baroda as its president. The work of the International Member consists in assembling a national committee in his respective country with representative members of every faith in the country, and with as many provincial city centres as possible. "I have been appointed International member to organize the national Committee in India and to be its Chairman. To-day's inaugural meeting is the result of my labour in fulfilment of the duty assigned to me. When the national Committee is well established attempts will be made to form provincial or city centres in other parts of the country."

"Fellowship of Faiths" means "friendship between faiths." "Faiths" has been defined by Bishop McConnell, the American National Chairman, "to include all types of spiritual consciousness or conviction, determining the actual lives of significant groups of people." This does not mean that we shall leave out individual faiths, for they shall also come under the term "faiths." The object of the World Fellowship of Faiths, is to bring all faiths, both of the groups and of the individual, to a common fellowship by making them realize the underlying oneness of purpose—namely alleviation of human suffering.

We find that by applying the principles of the world Fellowship of Faiths to the problems we are facing in India to-day, we may be able to arrive at the best of all possible solutions. The method of the Fellowship being peaceful propaganda and cultivation of the mind of the masses to achieve their end in a spirit of conciliation and good-will, it is sure to satisfy the aspiration of every party or class or creed. The political aspiration of India may also be better satisfied by bringing about the required change of mentality amongst the rulers and the ruled so that they may not regard each other as foreign and opposed to each other. Propaganda amongst the parties themselves against their own evils will bring about the needed change much sooner than by one party condemning the evils of another.

Enforcement of reform by legislature has been observed to prove a failure in such instances, as prohibition in America and restriction of child-marriage in India. The World Fellowship of Faiths, therefore, insists on bringing about the reform from within the mind of the people, thereby effecting the necessary reform without offending any one's convictions. There will, then, be no offence against the orthodox, nor need the reformers lag behind. Cultivation of the ideal of Fellowship is the only method by which disparities in social opportunities may be smoothly adjusted. The acceptance of the principle of Fellowship would, necessarily, mean the denial of untouchability. There is no political, economic, social or religious problem that cannot be solved by the method of Fellowship in the best possible manner. If you, sympathisers, to whom this appeal is made wish to help this mission of bring peace to the distracted and troubled world, all that you are requested to do is to accept the ideal of peace and unity as the guiding principle in your own life and to lead one other, every week, into the acceptance of these ideals. He or she, in turn, should undertake to do likewise, so that in time, every one in the land may be comprised in the all-embracing bond of Fellowship.

The World Fellowship of Faiths is planning to hold its next world Conference in India in 1936.

Dr. Felix Valyi, speaking next, emphasized the fact that the whole value of the history of mankind lay not in conquest, but, in the willingness of man to stretch out his hands to all races and fellow-beings, with whom he happened to come in touch, in the course of his daily life irrespective of creed or caste. Buddhism was the only religion that had attempted to do this in the past on a world-wide scale, and it was when Buddhism was expunged from India, that the downfall of India actually commenced and gathered momentum day by day.

About a dozen other speakers addressed the meeting on the various religion and faiths that were being followed all over the globe, and each tried to set forth in detail the best trends of his or her religion.

Exponents of Hinduism pointed out that Hinduism was the seniormost religion of mankind and the best adapted to be a universal religion when some of its "indignities," pre-eminently the caste system and untouchability are expunged from it. Hinduism was a living force, an inspiration, revealed to all by the three-fold paths sung in the "Song Celestial" (1) the path of duty or selfless service of mankind; (2) the path of 'bhakti' or selfless devotion to God and (3) the path of self-control or the conquest of one's own passions. The purity of heart and the purity of action were thus maintained by the individual thereby promoting the universal brotherhood of man.

Speaking of Judaism, Miss Reuben said that the essence of Jewish scriptures were non-aggressiveness or tolerance as well as the service of mankind. When you are scorning your neighbour, it should be remembered that you are scorning the God in man. Miss Reuben, moreover, held that it was not the diversity of faiths that was mainly responsible for the evils of the world, but something else; and it was the duty of the Committee of Fellowship of Faiths to find it out.

Mr. B. T. Ankdesaria then spoke on Zoroastrianism. He pointed out that his religion was based on the great immutable laws of the world, the law that moves the waters, the law that governs life, in short, the laws of Nature. There was no sectarianism in those laws, and as such there was no other religion better adapted to promote peace and good-will in the world.

Expounding the principles of Buddhism, Prof. N. K. Bhagat remarked that the life and teachings of Buddha were founded on tolerance, self-control and love. The history of Buddhism showed that it had at one time in the past nearly become a universal religion, and the speaker hoped that history would repeat itself.

Dr. Clifford Manshardt, speaking on Christianity remarked that religion was "a common quest for good life" and Christianity amply fulfilled it.

"The essence of Islam," said Maulana Mahamaddy, "is the complete surrender of self and implicit resignation of will for the sake of peace and goodwill for mankind."

Mr. Jamiat Singh, explaining the principles of Sikh religion, said that it was futile to speak of religion and the Fellowship of Faiths in India. India was the land of slaves, and slaves had no religion of their own. Unless slavery was abolished in India there could be no mutual good-will and peace in the land. The Sikhs were wedded to service of mankind and their religion bade them fight and die if need be, for the sake of righteousness.

The Chairman in his concluding speech remarked that every speaker tried to show the best in his or her religion. But the tenets of all faiths were only taught rather than practised. The idea of universal brotherhood of man was a Utopia which could hardly be realised. The present times boded ill to peace, the prospect of the feeling of fellowship and goodwill was dark and dismal. Materialism was running rampant in the world, the chairman added, and it was only when the wolf and the tiger in man was killed that universal brotherhood of man could be possible on earth.

With a vote of thanks the meeting terminated.

THE UNITED STATES AND ECONOMIC PEACE.

Mr. Gardner Harding writes in Current History:—
In five countries outside the United States the will to gain markets is at present most fully armed and most swiftly proceeding. These, in the general order of their disregard for economic peace and their will and capacity to exploit the present disorder for their own purposes, are Great Britain, Japan, France, Germany and the Soviet Union.

The first requirement of economic peace today is that the United States and Great Britain come to an understanding. First there is the breach over the stabilization of exchange. The two governments at present each have a stabilization fund of about the same amount, with offensive and defensive powers hardly differing in essence from the purpose of their respective navies. The action of the British in July, 1933, in suddenly converting £133,400,000 in gold dollar bonds into sterling at a discount of 100 points, or a dollar in the pound, coincided with the halt in the rising prices which had steadily continued in the United States since March. The Stock Exchange had its fourth busiest day on record, a day of panic. The pound dropped from £4.85 to £4.58 within two days. Wheat and cotton prices fell from 10 to 20 per cent before the end of the month. The vigorous revival of prices, of carloadings, of general production in the United States, was definitely suspended and changed again to a decline, not to be reversed until late in the Fall.

Though many other factors coincided in this event, hundreds of thousands of Americans realized that our policy was at odds with the British. The confirmation of that view by the failure of the London conference, before which at that very time Secretary Hull was fighting his courageous battle for a world limitation of trade barriers, was accordingly less of a surprise. But other deeper issues have come between the two nations. The long-delayed programme of imperial preference has at last, after a generation of liberalism in Great Britain, been put into effect, and with it a fully implemented domestic tariff system sharply separating British trade policy from the rest of the world. The result has not been so much actual damage to American trade as the withdrawal of support by the British for trade recovery measures save as they are narrowly limited for their own benefit. Under the Ottawa agreements Canada must import, for example, oranges from South Africa instead of from California and Florida, and give an increasingly substantial preference to manufactured goods from British factories 3,000 miles away instead of from across our so-called "undefended" frontier. The same preferences applied throughout the British Empire strike the United States first and foremost and it is estimated that our loss of trade, through the present operation of these agreements alone, amounts to £50,000,000 a year.

It is reasonable and logical that ultimately the American and British currencies must hold a common level. Nine at least of the world's fifteen primary commodities particularly cotton, wheat, tin, wool, jute, and to a large extent rubber, have their world prices set on the London market in any case. But prices are made by trade and not by money, and our disparate trade policy must yield to conciliation before we meet on the currency level. Yet in Argentina and Brazil, the prime markets of our competition, Great Britain demands a favoured policy from the first nation as its largest customer and an equal standing with the second where our purchases create most of the exchange. This is due not so much to the British people themselves as to the triumph of the present nationalistic coalition Government.

NOTES

Another Bengal Outrage:—After an interval of some months, political assassination gave proof of its existence this week by a daring attempt on the life of the Governor of Bengal at the race course near Darjeeling. Two Bengali boys fired at the Governor but fortunately the shots fell wide of the mark and His Excellency, who had his daughter with him, sat through the whole of the day's programme. The armed guards who were in attendance, fired at the assailants. One of them is reported to be in a precarious condition. This attempt is noteworthy as an attempt on the head of the province and more so as made in the summer headquarters of the Bengal Government, a Hill station in which suspicious characters are easily tracked down. The futility of political assassination as a means of achieving anything good, has been demonstrated here and elsewhere again and again. But it seems to be lost on those who instigate such attempts as those in Bengal. They are utterly indifferent also to the cruel hardships to which the innocent people are exposed by their insensate methods. If the movement spreads beyond the two districts affected hitherto, the measures taken to repress it there will no doubt be extended to other places; and one shudders to think of the misery and humiliation that it will bring in its train. Unhappy Bengal! Once the leader of religious and social reform to all India, she is now the victim of ideas which are opposed radically to the trend of her past history and tradition. The Government measures so far adopted have not improved matters. They seem on the contrary to have made them worse. No one would advocate condonation of murder or attempts at murder but no attempt has so far been made to get at the causes which have made and keep the soil of parts of Bengal favourable to such noxious growth. The investigation is well worth making either by Government Commission or by a responsible non-official agency such as the Universities.

The Redemption of Hinduism:—We publish in this issue the beautiful address on his Master, Swami Narayan Gurudeo, which Swami Dharma Theertham delivered at a meeting of South Kanara followers of the Swami in Bombay last Sunday. Swami Narayan was born in 1856 and belonged to one of the antyaja castes of Travancore. He was endowed from birth with spiritual qualities of a very high order. He had, besides, great gifts of leadership, a magnetic personality. Working quietly he was able in about forty years to raise the educational, moral and material condition of his people to the level of the most advanced communities. Not only that but also to permeate the atmosphere of the places in which he lived and laboured with his own spirit embodied in his maxim, "One caste, one religion, one God." The most remarkable feature of the Swami's work was that it did not antagonise the high caste Hindus, several of whom, including Swami Dharma Theertham himself, became his disciples. Swami Dharma Theertham, indeed, holds that his Master's mission was to apply the philosophy of Shankara who was also a native of Malabar to social life. That philosophy does not stop short at exhorting men to love their neighbours. It teaches that there is a solidarity between all men—we are all members of one another, said St. Paul—which makes their interests identical and that therefore injury done to another is injury done to oneself. The future religious reformer of India will arise from among the antyajias. That they have plenty of spiritual material in them is attested by the numerous saints of low caste origin revered by all Hindus. The unification of Hindu society must be effected by a Teacher sprung from the lowest class. Swami Narayan Guru was handicapped by circumstances from becoming an All India Teacher. He was fifty years before his time. But his work will endure and inspire increasing numbers of Hindus to press steadfastly to the goal of "One caste, one religion, one God."

Vilifying India —The wrangles on the White Paper between British political fractions do not concern us. Sure enough they will both make up their quarrels and we should not be surprised if one of its stronger opponents comes out as Lord Willingdon's successor to carry out the White Paper scheme. The type of British statesman who took politics seriously, Peel, Gladstone, Asquith, is nearly extinct. Mr. Baldwin is, perhaps, the last of the Romans. The rest are nearly all opportunists and it is not safe for India to build upon their foundations. We are, therefore, unconcerned about what happens to the White Paper. There is no question of accepting or rejecting it. If it cannot be cured it will have to be endured. But we must resent the use of arguments for or against the White Paper which are flagrantly untrue and which amount to a perversion of her history and tradition. Sir Henry Page Croft's letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury asserting that Christianity and Christians would be in danger if Indians are placed on power, is a monstrous libel. We are glad that two of our Christian contemporaries, one Catholic and the other Protestant, have come forward to rebut Sir Henry's calumny. We reprint their articles in this issue. The principle of respect of all religions, implicit in the philosophy of India, has been an organic feature of Indian polity from time immemorial and Sir Henry Page Croft had no right to pervert history for paltry political ends.

Lord Lothian on Christian Colleges:—Either Lord Lothian has not read the Lindsay Commission Report or he is deliberately closing his eyes to the plain objective of those who wrote it. We are unwilling to believe that he is deliberately deceiving himself. It is quite true, as he is reported to have remarked in his address at Manchester, that few people in India regard the Colleges as propagators of an alien religion but this, as the Commission points out, is deeply regretted by the teachers and managers of many of these institutions. The Commission's recommendations are directed to make them more efficient as propagandists of the Christian faith camouflaged as Christian character. If character is to be deduced from behaviour—and there is no other way of deducing it—we really can not say how Christian character differs from non-Christian. Lord Lothian talked of the important part which the Indian Christian Colleges must play in future in the work of training Indian leaders. It is more likely that the future Indian leaders would be trained in technological institutions, in military and naval academies and in science colleges where they may learn to do things which is understood and appreciated by the West. The East says to the West today,

Good my brother, do not as some ungracious pastors do,

Point to me the steep and thorny road to Heaven.

While thyself the primrose path of dalliance treads.

The path of the West is not exactly a primrose path at present. But so it seems not only to the youth of Asia but also to many of its elders and, it may be, that once started on the road the East may go farther than the West in Materialism because of its greater capacity for concentration.

Materialism and Religions:—We published last week an article by Dr. W. A. Visser't Hooft on the Student Christian Movement's Asiatic year. A warning note is struck in the concluding paragraph against organising Asiatic Christian nationals in opposition to Europe and America. That danger is to-day a remote one, largely on account of the European and American personnel of the controlling bodies. Few will agree with Dr. Hooft—he rather exaggerates the influence of Marx in India—that non-Christian students are turning away from their traditional faiths to a materialistic view of life and that therein lies a unique opportunity for the Christian evangel. Miss Kate Richards O'Hare, on the other hand, remarks in an article entitled "Wanted: A Religion of Courage" in The World Tomorrow: "Since 1917 we have all pretty much scraped the bottom of Hell, and felt ourselves helpless to help ourselves. Bewildered, disillusioned, cursed by want in the midst of plenty, we have turned to cults strange and fantastic.....But to whatever strange cults man has turned, they are definitely away from organized and conventional Christianity. Bewildered youth, without chart or compass, without faith in God or respect for man—at least for the so-called leaders of men—without spiritual anchorage, because it has grown up since the World War swept the old verities into the vortex of ruin and disorder, has frankly embraced a paganism of its own making." And it is a strange coincidence that Mr. J. V. Nash in a recent article in the Open Court remarked that "the growing penetration of Hindu philosophy into Occidental thought and literature...has been much hastened by the advent of the new physics, following the discovery of atomic structure and the consequent downfall of the old materialistic conception of the universe."

Are there no Swadeshi Engineers?—As the result of Mr. C. F. Andrews' speeches and lectures in Europe, a Swiss engineer who it seems is also a leader of the Pacifist movement, has come out to inspect devastated Bihar and we are told that there are several others willing to come over to help in reconstructing that province. What is wanted in Bihar is money not men. There are large numbers of Indian engineers with expert knowledge of the country who would be glad to give their services either free or at a small remuneration to help Bihar to resume normal conditions. We are utterly unable to understand what purpose is served by importing a number of foreign engineer who have yet to learn the A B C of Indian conditions. If Government had called in half a dozen foreign engineers, our nationalist newspapers would have made a tremendous uproar but we have not seen a single word of protest raised against this preposterous proposal. It is indeed very difficult to understand some of our nationalist leaders,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, MAY 12, 1934.

A WAY TO SOCIAL PEACE.*

Mr. Wickham Steed is one of the eminent publicists not only of Great Britain but of the world. His experience of European politics and social and economic conditions before and after the War, is unique. After acting as its correspondent in important European capitals he became Foreign Editor of the Times (London), and on retiring from that position he took over the conduct of the Review of Reviews which acquired a high status as an international journal under his editorship. Mr. Steed is a thinker and a man of ideas. Journalism to him was a means to other ends besides providing a personal career. Another great British journalist has observed that journalism has few attractions from the point of view of material success; its fascination for men who have some great cause at heart is due to its offering them, as no other profession does, opportunities of striking a blow for it. In his "A Way to Social Peace," Mr. Steed has used his vast and varied knowledge of present economic conditions in the West to indicate the direction which offers, to his mind, the best prospect of a peaceful settlement of the conflict between Capital and Labour. His solution in a single sentence is, 'Limit the power of wealth.' Monarchy in Britain has been preserved and has come to be cherished as a national institution by the constitutional limitations which, originally imposed on it, have been willingly accepted by the Crown. The limitation of the power of Capital will, Mr. Steed suggests in his Halley Stewart Lectures, (1933), have the same effect. Mr. Steed does not elaborate his suggestion. He does not explain how this is to be done. The monarchy is a hereditary institution capable of creating and conserving tradition. Capital by its very nature is incapable of being fixed to any institution or even country. Limitations on the power of Capital can be enforced only by the State and this is what is being done in nearly all countries of the world.

The chief interest of these lectures lies in the lucid exposition of the issues involved by a publicist of wide experience and mature judgment who looks at the problem from a detached point of view and with a single eye to economic peace and international goodwill which is associated with it. Mr. Steed is not one of those to whom 'communism' and 'communists' are as red rags. He freely acknowledges that there are essential truths in Communism which can not be coerced out of existence by the use of force. He thinks that there are other truths which Marxists ignore, and that Communism, therefore, is not the true way out of the economic tangle. But the opponents of Communism do the same thing and it is the business of statesmen and social reformers to find a solution which will give adequate weight to all the truths involved in both sides of the struggle. One of the axioms of Communism is that the bulk of the surplus value accruing to raw material from the application of labour, belongs to Labour. Mr. Steed does not agree to this proposition. "Yet," he writes, "it is undeniable that modern conditions of industrial production do raise, with increasing urgency, the question of the proper relationship between the human workers in a community and the ownership and control of its machines." Communists think that the question can not be solved except by a revolution. On the other hand, an increasing number of capitalists realise the need for closer co-operation between Labour and Capital and are trying in various ways to ensure it.

The industrial problem has implications, and grave ones too, affecting national and international wellbeing. The first is the danger, foreseen by Hyndman, of its economic slaves becoming the masters of a free community. "In our industrial and political life," writes Mr. Steed, "two tendencies have run side by side for the past century at least. The first has been the tendency towards the substitution of power-driven machinery for human labour, and the other, the tendency to extend the parliamentary franchise, irrespective of party allegiance, to all classes of adult citizens; that is to say, to bestow full political citizenship upon them." Mr. Steed holds it to be unquestionable that human labour is being enslaved by machinery in a sense that could hardly have been imagined when power-driven machine industry began. He mentions two cases which, though superficially contradictory, really support his view of the effect of machine industry on the personality of workers. In one case, a man who was earning 16 dollars a day in Mr. Henry Ford's factories accepted a job on 6 dollars a day in another concern because, he said, he feared that "placing screw number 13" which he had been doing at Detroit for years, if continued much longer, would drive him mad. The other was that of a woman employed in a large gramophone factory who was offered work more varied than the semi-automatic movement of the arm and hand to which she was accustomed. She refused saying, "No, I do this work almost unconsciously and it leaves me free to think about other things." In both cases the work by which the workers earned their living was totally alien to their mental life. That is the essence of slavery. Mr. Steed observes that the British working classes, who used to be dominated by religious ideas like the Indian masses, are becoming rapidly "continentalized." How will they use the franchise which they now have in full measure? The international bearing of the Industrial Problem is even more serious. Karl Marx held that international hostility will not cease until the class conflict ceased within nations. Mr. Steed's comment on this is worthy of note. "Had I not lived among peoples and moved in the society of statesmen and others who frankly thought of war as the best way out of social and economic difficulties," he observes, "I might have hesitated to take this Marxist doctrine as seriously as I have come to take it."

Mr. Steed gives several instances of capitalists and employers who in their individual capacities have realised the present anomalies and have attempted to remove them in their own spheres. One such may be commended to our mill-owners at the present time. During the coal strike of 1926 the proprietor of one of the mines "not a hundred miles from London" found that the strike funds for the maintenance of the miners' wives and children were running low and would be exhausted in less than a month. He discovered also that the cost of feeding the women and children was about £ 100 a week. So he offered to give £ 100 a week to the women and children as long as the strike lasted. The further story of this mine is interesting. The owner, even after stringent economies, could not work the mine without loss. As the sole alternative to closing it down he offered to let the workers themselves manage it. "The effects," writes Mr. Steed, "were marvellous. In a short time the losses dropped from £ 1,000 to £ 200 a week. The men admitted that hundred of tons of coal had been unnecessarily burned in the boiler house, and that, below ground, all kinds of deliberate waste had gone on unbeknown to the management or to the owners." These things were swiftly put right. Unfortunately the proprietor died. Owing to heavy death duties and depression in the coal trade, it looked as if the mine could not be carried on. "It was then," continues Mr. Steed, "that the associate system proved its value, for the men, seeing that their own wages were the biggest item in costs, proposed that wages be cut by as much as 20 per cent in the highest grades, and proportionately less in the lower grades." The magic of property, in the old economic phrase, turns sand into gold.

THE INDIAN PROBLEM.

Mr. Horace G. Alexander who is well-known in India, has contributed an article to the New Statesman and Nation of April 14th on the Indian political situation. Mr. Alexander pays qualified tribute to Lord Sankey and Sir Samuel Hoare for their defence of the White Paper. He is rather hard on the Indian delegates to the Conferences in London when he calls them "amenable Indians" and "all kinds of people who are eager to keep on good terms with us." Mr. Philip Cox has written a protest to that journal and he inquires why Mr. Alexander fails to be as charitable at least to the Indian delegates as he is to members of the British Government who have worked for the White Paper scheme. He also objects to Mr Alexander's assumption that Gandhiji is the "one man who can deliver the goods." There is much in Mr Cox's objections. Whatever the goods might be which an Indian leader is expected to deliver there is small reason to think that Gandhiji will be able to do so better than some of the men who represented India at the London discussions. Mr. Cox seems to be under the impression that the White Paper embodies the proposals of the British Indian delegation. If this were the case there would have been no occasion for the publication of a separate memorandum.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Cox accepts the proposal put forward in Mr. Alexander's article for a constituent assembly to be held in India to discuss the new constitution. This is quite a different thing to leaving the burden of political decisions to Gandhiji. Very few in India today would consent to abide by a constitution arrived at through discussions between Gandhiji and British politicians. Gandhiji himself will probably hesitate before accepting that heavy responsibility. But a discussion in India, we have always urged, is inevitable before launching on a new reform scheme and that must be with as representative a body of Indians as possible. The objection to the London conferences was not so much on grounds of personnel as for reasons of venue. It would not have been easy, for one thing, to have continued sitting in India when the jails held record numbers of political prisoners. Moreover the London discussions were for the most part conducted in an atmosphere of unreality and; so far as Indians were concerned, might as well have not been held at all.

The Textile Strike :—The strike in the Bombay textile mills has been in existence for nearly three weeks. It is surprising that nothing has been done yet to provide relief for the starting women and children of the strikers. The Mayor of Bombay was requisitioned several days ago but nothing further has been heard of the matter. Meanwhile a small committee has been formed of individuals interested in the plight of the strikers apart from the merits of the strike and appeals for funds have been issued under their names. The response has been small and the relief committee's work has been hampered by its "unofficial" character. A resolution requesting Government to set up a conciliation committee was adopted by the Corporation in spite of a protest from Mr. H. P. Mody who speaking for the millowners objected to an attempt at conciliation until the report on the wage-cuts was completed by the Labour Office. Mr. Mody remarked that if he found any Trade Union leaders who could deliver the goods he would discuss with them. Does Mr. Mody mean that the strike should go on indefinitely till he finds a suitable Trades Union to negotiate with? The strike is no longer an issue between the millowners and the strikers.

NOTES BY THE WAYFARER.

Addressing a gathering of orthodox Hindus at Deogarh in Bihar, Gandhiji said that he would not be a party to the Temple-Entry Bill being passed by a non-Hindu majority in the Indian Legislature. If a clear Hindu majority was against the Bill, he would certainly be no party to its passage. This was evidently in answer to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's opinion that a Legislature composed of many religionists was not competent to legislate on a question of religious practice like entry into Hindu temples. Gandhiji's remarks require further elucidation. The first point is, whether the member who introduced the Bill and his supporters accept this condition. The second is, how can non-Hindu members be prevented from speaking and voting on the temple-entry Bills? If they agree voluntarily to abstain from doing either, they will naturally expect that in matters which affect their religious practices, a similar convention should be observed by others. Where the matter is clearly one affecting religion like the admission of untouchables to Hindu temples, there can be no difficulty in observing such a convention. But most of the questions that are likely to form subjects of legislation, are likely to be in the marginal region between social and religious customs. The Sarda Act is a good example. Gandhiji's idea, if given effect to, will practically make social legislation except on communal lines impossible. This is a result which one who is opposed to the communal principle in electorates can not contemplate with satisfaction. Then, again, what is to be the role of official members in such matters? Moreover, every Hindu member of the Legislature is not a temple goer. Some are frankly atheists, others hardly ever visit temples.

Is not too much being made of the orthodox Hindu demonstrations against Gandhiji in one or two places in Bihar? It seems that the object of the protestants was not to harm Gandhiji but to invite injury on themselves in the spirit of Satyagraha: Mr. C. Rajagopala Charya lifts his hands in horror and declares that the incidents at Buxar and Jahd must make Sanatanists throughout India hang down their heads in shame. I am not a Sanatanist, and would not be accepted as one by Sanatanists. But who first introduced the practice of waving black flags in the country? A glass pane in the car which carried Gandhiji was broken either by a stone or a lathi. Gandhiji seems to have thought that his volunteers might have been the aggressors. It was reported that he said he would make enquiries and would do penance if it was found that they were the offenders. Nothing has been heard since of the result of the enquiry. At Guruvayur two orthodox Hindus were beaten to unconsciousness by the crowd which gathered to welcome Gandhiji. So that violence did not start at Bihar and with the Sanatanists. Mr. Rajagopala Charya neither then or afterwards said anything about the violence of his friends against the orthodox. Gandhiji himself has been intemperate in his language. One remark of his about temples to which he wants antyajas to be admitted, rangles in the mind even of many pious Hindus. Stones and lathis are forgotten but wounds inflicted by words do not heal easily. The earlier reformers had to bear much worse insults and sufferings but they took it all as in the day's work. As in the case of the political movement, in the case of social reform, it will be ultimately realised that the old methods are the best.

Mr. Rajagopala Charya's shrill didacticism has found another vent in his observations about whether non-Congressmen should or should not be admitted to the new Swaraj party. Although he says he himself is not yet a full member of the party which is yet forming, he has taken it upon himself to declare that they should come as suppliants only. Why should they? The Congress leaders now acknowledge that their method was wrong and that the constitutional method which they had abandoned and denounced as mendicancy, is the only alternative. The abandonment of civil disobedience and the adoption of council entry, can mean nothing else. It is they and not those whose policy and methods have at least been consistent, that have need to adopt a chastened tone. The hard fact can not be concealed by bluff and bluster. Who wants to join the Swaraj Party on Mr. Rajagopala's terms or any other? The Congress has been ruined by the non-co-operation and civil disobedience movement. Any shred of prestige which still attaches to it is due to the personality of Gandhiji and the chief element in his personality which holds the mass mind is not the political but the ascetic. Asceticism is a sure magnet everywhere in India—as witness the hook swingers near Tiruvadi in the South and the Mohurum flagellants in Lahore in the North. If Gandhiji resumed his Kathiawar dress tomorrow, he will have far fewer men and women waiting to have his darshan. When Oliver Cromwell returned to London after his victories at Dunbar and Worcester some one called his attention to the huge crowds that turned out in the streets to greet him. "More people would come to see me hanged," was his grim rejoinder. Those who live by the sword will perish by the sword. Those who are raised by the crowd will some day be pushed off by it from their pedestal. There is a little poem of Browning called "The Patriot." One day he walks on rose-strewn streets and amidst applauding crowds. The same day next year he is stoned by the populace in the self-same town.

Dr. Paranjpye has given a spirited reply to Mr. Rajagopala Charya. "It may be," he says, "that Liberalism, as we represent it, is fated to disappear from Indian politics, but I would rather see it disappear in untarnished honour than die an ignoble death after surrendering its soul." Dr. Paranjpye, I thought, did not believe in a soul. Why should a man who does not believe he has a soul of his own, regret to see the soul, which can have only a metaphorical existence, of a political party surrendered? But no one is so irrational as the professing Rationalist.

Colonisation Inquiry Committee:—The report of the Committee it was said would soon be out. It appears they considered 13 countries including Tanganyika and eventually have brought the number down to three. Writes Bhuss Masoor in India Opinion. They are Borneo, New Guinea and British Guinea and the last named has lukewarm support. This leaves us with the first two named. Borneo has areas of about 81,106 square miles with a population of 257,804 persons of whom 533 are Europeans. The chief products are timber, sago, rice, coconuts, gums, coffee, fruits, nutmegs, cinnamon, pepper, gambler, gutta-percha, rubber, camphor, rattams, tapioca sweet potatoes and tobacco. Borneo is a British protectorate under the jurisdiction of the British North Borneo Co., and administered by a governor (appointed with the approval of the Secretary of State) and a Court of Directors in London appointed under a Royal Charter of 1881. It is rather premature for anyone to say more of Borneo until the report is made known. I wonder why a country next door to us, Tanganyika was passed over; in any case it would be better to wait and see. I give the above facts because they are of interest just now.

THE PROPHET OF MALABAR. (BY SWAMI DHARMA THEERTHAN.)

In the eternal march of ages, there appear on the stage of the world certain great personalities who tower very high above the ordinary mortals, whose life and teachings give a new impetus to the cultural evolution of large masses of people, who by precept and example set the ideal of greatness and virtue and demonstrate the eternal verities of the divine life for future generations. Such supermen are sooner or later acclaimed as world-teachers whose messages have a universal value and vital significance to people all over the globe. They come not to any particular place or time or for the good of any particular people, but to fulfil some mighty purpose in the scheme of the Almighty Ruler of the Universe. They are rarely understood in their own day. Their work goes on fulfilling the plan through many years and then only the realisation dawns on a wondering people that one so great lived among them. Such are the avatars purushas and the founders of the great religions and about another such who was with us until a few years ago, I shall speak here.

We judge men by their present achievements in the form of useful institutions or by their practical success in improving the conditions of their fellow beings. Secondly, we can judge them by the grandeur of their teachings, by the greatness of their ideas and ideals, or in other words, not by what they have done, but by what they are capable of doing for future generations. Thirdly, we can also understand them by their own personal lives, their nobility, purity, spiritual greatness. It is almost impossible to find great persons who possessed unsurpassed eminence in all these respects at once. There are instances of those who have risen from absolute poverty to be millionaires and princes and who were able to build up large organizations for the good of their less fortunate brethren, leaving behind monumental works of industry, intelligence and love of mankind. But such men have not been spiritual giants or originators of great cultural movements. Others there are who revolutionised the outlook on life of large masses of people by their teachings and marvellous appeal to the heart of humanity, but among them there were very few who could combine successful and constructive organizing activities with their idealism. To be an ascetic, a man of great spiritual powers, exercising superhuman influence over those who came into contact with him; a model of simplicity, purity and renunciation, and at the same time to be the leader of extensive activities and the creator of varied institutions, and also the originator of a great cultural movement of universal significance and value, is a combination of greatness more divine than human, and in this respect we have hardly another instance in history to compare with the wonderful life of Sree Narayana Gurudev. In him we have one who was born poor and continued to be poor all his life time and who had no worldly accomplishment of any sort, becoming the creator of a net-work of large institutions, religious, social, educational, industrial and cultural, and the master of properties worth many lakhs of rupees. This huge achievement is a marvel in itself. Many lakhs of people have been benefitted by one poor man's efforts. Secondly Gurudev preached a new philosophy of life which has already shaken to the foundations the old ideas of society and religion and which is steadily becoming a revolutionary force heralding a new cultural renaissance. When we come to the aspect of personal greatness words fail to describe how immensely above all human standards he reigned like a god among men, respected and loved and worshipped as no other human being was. His profound wisdom, the inspiring simplicity and purity of his life, the marvellous powers he wielded over men and nature, are the inscrutable mystery. The new philosophy, or if you like, the modern fulfilment of the ancient philosophy as represented in the practical teachings of Sree Narayana Gurudev, aims at unifying not only Hindu religious thought, but also the religious thoughts of all the nations of the world on the basis of the fundamental unity of the laws of life and truth. Sree Narayana has given to the world the common background of all religions as Sankara gave the common background of the different schools of Hindu religion. Secondly, Sree Narayana has started the actual re-organization of Hindu society on the principle of Universal brotherhood, the spiritual laws underlying which Sree Sankara could only enunciate but could not apply to the social conditions of his days. Sree Narayana's religion is so simple, and so devoid of all sophistry, his philosophy was so practical, his influence was so powerful in purifying the lives of his followers, and his own life was so pure, simple and full of the milk of divine kindness for the poor and the helpless, that many of his followers hailed him as a second Buddha. He was such a picture of dedication and self-sacrifice that some compared him to Christ. For years he lived among Mohomedans and his teachings of equality and brotherhood so much resembled those of the Prophet of Islam, that he was revered as a great teacher by Muslim devotees. As it to co-operate in this work of fusion of religions, we find in Malabar mysterious forces bringing together the great religions of the world into intimate association in the lives of the people there more than in any other place. One of the first twelve disciples of Christ came to Malabar and we find there the oldest and the most numerous Christian community in India. Malabar which had relations with Islam through the Arab traders long before the Moghals came to India, has today a very large Mohammedan population living side by side with the Hindus and the Christians. There also we find an important colony of the Jews. The existence of a large population of Hindus who are outside the fold of the privileged castes, has facilitated the fusion of Hindu, Christian and Mohammedan blood and culture to a greater degree than elsewhere. The intermingling of the Eastern and the Western races also is taking place on a larger scale than elsewhere. Among the followers of Sree Narayana we find not only Hindus, but Buddhists, Brahmins, Arya Samajists, Rationalists and others who in spite of differences of faith and opinions stand united round the name of their common sun. There is, going on in Malabar a significant movement for the establishment of peace and unity among the castes and races and creeds of the world and Sree Narayana Gurudev is the prophet of the new era that is dawning there.

Gurudev's philosophy is contained in the motto, "One Race, one Religion, one God," which means the fundamental unity of blood of the human species, the identity of the basic truths of all religions, and the common goal of all mankind.

Having asserted the truth of "One life" Gurudev next established the oneness of the Law (or Religion) which governs that life. Speaking about the practicability of establishing religious unity Gurudev once said "There are admittedly conflicting creeds in India such as Vedic Religion, Minamsa Religion, Dvaita Religion, Advaita Religion and so forth. Hinduism is the common name for all these. If such divergent creeds can be brought under one religion where is the unreasonableness in bringing under one religion all the so-called different religions which Teacher after Teacher has given to the world with slight variations to suit different times and circumstances, but with the one common aim of the liberation of all Mankind. It is astonishing that those who preach of the unity of their own religion in the midst of the bewildering multiplicity of churches and denominations and who glorify the variety in the unity, are not able to take all mankind and find the unity amidst the diversities of creed and the beautiful variety in the unity."

I shall not be surprised if you think that this is all nice philosophy but of very little practical value. We have become so much accustomed to believe in the inevitability and even inalterability of castes, races and creeds, that talks of universal brotherhood and religious fraternity seem to you but a cry in the wilderness. The life and work of Sree Narayana Gurudev gives us a practical illustration of the way in which the highest ideals could be effectively used to reconstruct society. Malabar is the land of castes and social iniquities of the worst type. About 80 years ago when Gurudev was born the condition of the masses was little better than social serfdom. Many lakhs of people lived in utter poverty, disease and ignorance, without any of the rights of free men, of any of the amenities of civilized life, like dumb driven cattle, born to work and suffer for the upper classes and even bought and sold like the chattels of their masters. As a result of Gurudev's work nearly twenty lakhs of these people have been emancipated, and raised to the position of one of the most progressive and promising communities in all India. They form the only Non-Brahmin community who can be said to be socially and religiously self-sufficient and independent, with their own temples, their own priests, their own Mutts and Sanyasis, their own spiritual teacher and their own philosophy of life. Gurudev has shown to us in a practical manner through his numerous temples, schools, Mutts and other institutions, the possibility of realising the ideal of "One Race, one Religion, one God." He has given to the world a new interpretation of life and pointed the way to a world reconstruction for universal peace and brotherhood. As a Hindu social and religious reformer he has accomplished a revolution in the three great institutions of the Hindus, the caste representing the social system, the temple representing the religious system and the Mutt of Sanyasis representing the philosophical system. He has shown how and in what manner these three have to be reformed and brought into harmony with the changing conditions and ideals of our life. These three, the Caste, the Temple and the Mutt are the three reactionary forces which are strangling Hindu religion and society. They retard all progress and prevent all change. They keep us helots to rotten institutions which have outgrown their use and become an insult to the intelligence of the whole community. Bring them into line with the progressive needs of our day and we shall have accomplished the salvation of Hindu religion and society. And this is what we claim Gurudev has done in the sphere of Hindu social reform.

Born in a small village among people under the worst social conditions, without money, or any sort of modern education, by dint of his own efforts, his devotion, his great japas, renunciation and life of love and sacrifice, he was able to raise himself to the high eminence of a worshipped being, and what is more delivered many lakhs of his followers from hopeless degradation. Unsupported by any organization or propaganda or advertisement, he was able to establish more than fifty temples all of which are growing centres of education, economic regeneration and all-round activity of people. The order of Sanyasin Missionaries he founded has now under it 13 Mutts, 13 Prayer Halls, 10 Temples, 1 English School, 4 Sanskrit Schools, 1 Weaving School, 4 Medical Dispensaries, 1 Gurukulam, and 4 Harijan Hostels and other minor institutions. Very soon he came to be known as a miracle worker who could cure diseases, cast out evil spirits, call forth rain and do other wonderful things. For a period of not less than forty years he was almost every day using his miraculous spiritual powers for the material and moral uplift of the people. He grew beyond all description in the love and reverence of the masses. Many towns and people kept his pictures and offered prayers and flowers to them every day. Many thousands of hearts looked up to him as their saviour in all troubles. No other person we know of was worshipped so much in his lifetime, as Gurudev. He was man but not human. He was not God and yet was divine. The humble village lad rose to be the divinity of many a temple in which he is worshipped to-day. Compared with the divine personalities of the world, and in all respects, judged by any standard, he is second to none. Is it in the humility of his origin and the wonderful glory of the setting, is it in the simplicity and purity of his life, is it in the depth of his learning as the wisdom of his teachings, is it in the miraculous powers he wielded over men and nature, is it in the greatness of his practical achievements for the good of the world or the magnitude of the concrete work he has done; is it in the wonderful love and esteem of his own generation; is it in the unparalleled service and sacrifice of his life, is it in the grandeur and universal value of his message? In all these respects, viewed from any standpoint, he is more divine than many of those figures who rule the hearts and beliefs of people all over the world.

"THE MORAL EQUIVALENT OF WAR."

Mr. Boyan Choukanoff, a Bulgarian, now studying in America, in the "Current History" gives an account of the "Bulgarian Labour Battalion" which he considers to be an attempt to give effect to the ideas of William James in his famous essay "The Moral Equivalent of War."

Bulgaria for more than thirteen years has made it obligatory for its able bodied citizens to pay a tax on labour to the State. Every man and woman, upon coming of age, is liable to this "tax," which is fixed at eight months for man and four months for women, although the service may be spread over longer periods. The Obligatory Labour Service Law was enacted in 1920 through the influence of Alexander Stambulisky, Premier of Bulgaria and a man of rare courage, energy and determination. For years he had advocated the ideas embodied in the law, but opportunity for the adoption of so daring and revolutionary a measure did not arise until after the World War.

Briefly the labour service was to be utilized to quote from the law itself "in all branches of economic activity and public welfare work; the construction of roads, rail-roads, canals, water-works, dams and embankments; the erection of buildings, the laying out of villages and towns; the strengthening of the banks of water courses; the straightening of rivers; the draining of marshes; the laying of telegraph and telephone cables; the preparation of various materials for building; afforestation and the care and management of forests; the cultivation of land belonging to the State, a district, a commune or any other public body; fruit and vegetable growing; the raising of silkworms, bees and cattle; fishing; work in mines and factories; the preserving of foodstuffs; the manufacture of cloth, linen and clothing in hospitals, &c."

Besides the regular service of eight and four months the law provides for temporary labour service of twenty-one days each year, when men and women, between the ages of 20 and 40 and 16 and 80 respectively, are called to work for their own community. All school children and university students are likewise expected to give a week of service in the Spring and another in the Fall to their school or city.

Youngmen and women may obtain temporary exemption if they have dependents, attend institutions of higher learning or are in bad health. But no Bulgarian citizen can change his nationality before his labour duty has been discharged; no one can leave the country even for study abroad until this labour obligation has been satisfied or postponed, or a bond deposited as a guarantee. Mohammedan women are exempt from the law on both religious and social grounds. And so are all foreign citizens residing in the country.

About 45,000 young men in Bulgaria reach their majority every year and automatically become liable for their regular labour service. But the State cannot profitably employ more than 20,000. Moreover, each year about 750,000 adults are eligible for the temporary service, in addition to a similar number of school children.

As a result of this service many towns and villages have been surveyed; streets have been widened, paved and straightened; miles of local roads have been constructed, bridges built, schools and libraries erected; water has been pumped to many villages, electric light plants opened; dikes have been made along low-banked rivers; good soil has been reclaimed by shortening the courses of winding rivers; hundreds of acres of trees have been planted and public health fostered. Moreover, a five-year plan of thoroughgoing community improvements on a nation-wide scale, worked out by a number of leading engineers, architects, physicians, professors, agricultural and other experts, has been inaugurated.

It is however the work of the regular labour boys (the troudivaks) that has definitely established the labour service as a permanent Bulgarian institution. "Work for Bulgaria," is inscribed on their hats, and although treated like soldiers—wearing khaki uniforms and taking on entering the service an oath of loyalty to king and country that they will conscientiously discharge their duties—they are governed by a civilian administration and their labour units aim to be both schools and workshops.

A bird's eye view of Bulgaria would bring out in relief the brilliant achievements of the labour battalions. Two harbours have been built on the Black sea, bringing into touch with the rest of the country an isolated corner that during Winter months had been almost completely cut off. The capricious and furious Ogosto River has been brought under control at a point where it was eating away the land and endangering the homesteads of the local villagers. In a remarkably short time a large swamp lying between the parallel rivers Isker and Veet at the place where they empty into the Danube was drained, an achievement that reclaimed 40,000 acres of exceedingly rich land.

Much has been done by the Troudivaks toward improving the railroads. When Bulgaria won her independence fifty-five years ago, she had practically no railways, and during the following forty years only 1,200 miles were constructed, an excellent beginning yet much of the country remained unserved. The building of new lines across the country, through the Rhodopes, and to many outlying points has been and is one of the major activities of the Troudivaks.

The highways that stand as the greatest achievement of the labour corps have been woven back and forth across the Balkan Mountains. For more than a generation Bulgaria confined road building to the great lines of traffic in the lowlands. Highways were more needed and were easier to build there; they served larger and fast-growing cities. But this policy left hundreds of towns that lie scattered throughout the entire Balkan range isolated and neglected. The lack of communication inevitably hastened their decline. This was all the more deplorable because it was these mountain towns that had nurtured the Bulgarian national awakening. Now the Troudivaks are bringing them a belated reward. Through the Balkan Mountains from the western end of the range to the eastern on the Black Sea, at irregular intervals as passes permit and traffic requires, the boys are cutting cross-roads thereby bringing the region into more direct contact with the rest of the country. Something similar is going on in the Rhodopes, the southern mountain range of Bulgaria, where, likewise, this army of labour recruits, operating along a farflung front, is using its powder and dynamite to bring about prosperity and enlightenment to a long-neglected no-man's land.

In 1925 this led to intervention by the League of Nations. After a study of the problems involved, the League commission concluded that only permanent settlement of the refugees could transform them from an element of constant danger to one of usefulness and peace. For this purpose the League authorized a loan for refugee settlement and the Bulgarian Government provided land "that is or may be made suitable for agricultural settlement."

Much of this land had never been planted to crops before. Forests had to be cut down and the land cleared; a railway line and roads had to be constructed, and malaria had to be wiped out. Although the refugees themselves did much of the work, whatever skilled labour was required was supplied by the Troudivaks. The latter likewise carried on the fight against malaria, begun by the Health Section of the League and local authorities and later assisted by the Rockefeller Foundation.

When a series of earthquakes in 1928 destroyed many towns and villages in the South, a detachment of several thousand labour boys was immediately dispatched to the afflicted area. They built tens of thousands of huts for the homeless, cleared away the ruins, repaired the water systems and assisted in establishing a field hospital. When the danger of more earthquakes had passed they helped in the rebuilding of homes.

Finally, the Troudivaks, in State factories and workshops make shoes and clothes for themselves, for the police force and other State employees. This activity has enabled Bulgaria to effect appreciable economies, for the Troudivaks had shown that they can make shoes and clothes as good as those of any private manufacturer—and more cheaply. They also tend large fruit and vegetable gardens and conserve the produce for use during the winter.

The Obligatory Labour Service is under a Labour Administrator who heads the Central Labour Bureau with headquarters at the Ministry of Public Works in Sofia, and who is entitled to the advice and co-operation of the General Secretary of each Ministry. The Central Labour Bureau is represented in each of the fourteen districts of the country by a district superintendent with whom every municipal Government is expected to co-operate. Whenever a community needs Troudivaks to build a dike or a road, it applies to the district superintendent, making clear the desirability of the project and undertaking to provide the boys with food and lodging.

At first Labour Service did not pay for itself because of the great sums needed for tools, transport, expert supervision, clothes and quarters. But experience and improved organization have changed all that; to-day the Troudivaks not only save millions for the State but are, in fact, a source of constantly growing revenue.

CONVERSIONS AND RECONVERSIONS TO HINDUISM DURING MUSLIM RULE.*

BY SRI RAM SARMA, M.A., F. R. HIST. S. (London.)

The author of the Dabistan-i-Masahib writing in the reign of Shah Jahan mentions several interesting instances of the conversion of Muslims to Hinduism and their acceptance in their adopted faith. He was known to the Seikh Guan Hargobind and was on terms of intimacy with several Hindu saints. The cases that he records seem to be based either on his own information or on reliable authorities usually accruing in the reign of Akbar, Jahangir or Shah Jahan.

Gosain Chatrapab who was a Nagar Brahman from Gujarat and died in 1637 A. D. taught the author of Dabistan the Hymn of the Sun and asked one of his disciples, Ganesh, to teach him the elements of Hindu religion. The author of the Dabistan was not born Hindu and naturally what Gosain Chatrapab did was equivalent to conversion. This Gosain seems to have been one of the foremost Hindu saints of his times. Jahangir and Abdur Rahim Khan-i-Khanan were among those who respected him.

The author of the Dabistan met another Hindu saint, Kaliyan Bharti, in 1643 at the town of Kiratpur in the present district of Hoshiarpur in the Punjab. He was a Sanyasi, yet he had travelled in and off Persia, lived among Muslims, returned to India and was still respected as a great Hindu saint. There is reason to believe that when he lived in Persia he had become a Muslim. It was only the licentious life of Shah Abbas Sofwi the Great (1583 to 1628 A. D.) that made him give up the religion which permitted such misdeeds. His return and consequent acceptance among the Hindus is therefore significant.

But probably the greatest of Muslim converts to Hinduism is Kabir. Born of Muslim parents or adopted by them, this Muslim weaver lived to found a Hindu sect. The faithful have tried to make him a miracle child born of a widow daughter of a Brahman of Benares whom Swami Ramanand blessed with a son not knowing that she was a widow. When her father remonstrated, we are told, Ramanand refused to modify his blessing. In due course the miracle child was born. But the Brahman was not sure he would be able to persuade the sceptics and the scoffers that the birth of a child to a widow was the result of a miracle rather than an offshoot of sin. He tried to drown the boy who however was discovered by a Muslim weaver and his wife who took him home and brought him up as a son of their own. The faithful and the less believing are all, however, agreed that Kabir was brought up as a Muslim. His Muslim contemporaries claimed him as one of themselves and were prepared to fight the Hindus on this issue. But he was accepted as his disciple by Ramanand, the great Hindu saint of Benares, whose greatest disciple he lived to be. It was however not Ramanand alone who claimed him as a Hindu. The contemporary Hindus knew him as their leader and a member of their faith. The story of the quarrel between the Hindus and the Muslims for performing his death rites according to their religious faith as recorded by Abul Fazal in the Ain-i-Akbari proves that Kabir was known to be a Hindu to his contemporaries. Of course one can understand the Muslims trying to bury one born into their faith, but the Hindus could not have claimed to cremate him had they not accepted his conversion to Hinduism. Tradition further records his persecution as a Hindu saint at the hands of Sikandar Lodhi, king of Delhi. Further a large number of his Hindu followers are found even to-day in different parts of India, particularly the United Provinces and the Punjab. In the latter province the Kabir Panthis, as his followers are called, have been admitted by the Punjab government as caste Hindus.

Thus here is an example of the Hindus converting a Muslim and raising him to the rank of their religious leader. He is reckoned among the great Hindu devotees by Nabbaji, the author of the famous Bhakti Mal, the book of Hindu saints written in the seventeenth century and commented upon the Priya Dass soon after. No greater proof is needed of the catholicity of a religion that could raise a Muslim convert to such a high position. All honour to Swami Ramanand who admitted this Muslim to the Hindu's faith. And equally liberal were the contemporary Hindus who raised him to such a high status.

The Dabistan's list however does not end here. We are told that a large number of Muslims were converted to Hinduism and admitted as Vairagis. The author speaks as if he knew of these cases himself. Two names are mentioned as that of Muslim nobles who were admitted as Vairagis—Mirza Salih and Mirza Haidar.

Another case that smells of the conversion of a non-Hindu to Hinduism is that of Keran who became a Va ragi.

The enslavement and conversion of a large number of Medaris and Jalalis is mentioned by the Dabistan this time through the efforts of the Sanyasis. Jalalis were the disciples of Sayid Jalal, a Muslim saint buried at Uch in Sind. They were Shiahis. The Medaris are Sunnis. Once it so happened that these Muslims tried to sacrifice a cow at a place of Hindu pilgrimage where Sanyasis were assembled in large numbers. The Sanyasis rescued two cows by paying exorbitant prices for them, but the Muslims brought a third and sacrificed it. A battle followed. The Sanyasis killed seven hundred of these Muslims and defeated them. Their children were enslaved but were apparently brought up in the Hindu faith.

The Sanyasis were not the only Hindu sectarians who admitted the Muslim into the Hindu faith. The Vaishnavas also admitted Muslims to the Hindu's faith and converted many of them.

When Guru Hargobind returned to Kiratpur he succeeded in converting a large number of Muslims in the neighbourhood of his place of residence so that not a Muslim was left between the hills near Kiratpur and the frontier of Tibet and Khotan. This happened before the conquest of Kiratpur by the Mughals in 1645.

When we come to Hindu authorities we are surprised to find them describing the re-conversion of countless Hindu converts to Islam. Let us start with rather a conservative authority, the Bhavishya Purana.

In the concluding verses of the Bhavishya Purana, Volume II, Book III, Part III, Chapter III, f. 36 b, we are told of Raja Ganga Singh. The first three verses of Chapter IV make him the tenth sovereign after Bhoj and place his accession 500 years after his death. We are then told that he was a contemporary of Raja Jai Chand of Qanoj and Anang Pal of Delhi. Under him Mechhas began to perform all the duties of the Aryas (verse 10), so much so that Kali was at last frightened and went to Krishna in order to remonstrate with him for this sorry state of things, the prevalence of so much religion in an age which he had been assured would be particularly dominated by absence of religion. Again in his lament we come across a very significant phrase. His sons, the Mlechhas, have adopted the Aryan religion (verse 15. f. 87a).

A little later on we find the Bhavishya recording traditions of the re-conversion of Hindu converts to Islam en masse. Chapter IV of Part IV of the third book in the second volume (f. 122 b, Part II, Volume II), describes first the conversion of a large number of people in different cities of Dudia to Islam. This we are then told, evoked a reaction (Verses 52 and 53) The Aryans felt depressed. But they soon found out a remedy. The disciples of Krishna Chaitanya took upon their shoulders the hazardous task of reconverting their lost brethren. Then follows a string of names of the preachers with the locality of their ministry. Disciples of Ramanand went to Ajodhya and converted the Mlechhas to Hinduism. Sanyogis were also admitted to Ramanand's creed. Nimbadiya with his disciples went to Kanchipur. Vishnu Swami went to Haridwar. To Muttra proceeded Madhavacharya. Ordered by Kamanuja, Sankracharya of Saiva persuasion went to Benares. Ramanuja went to Kanoj. Dhanvantri chose Allahabad as his centre of activities. Bhatoji, Jai Dev, Kabir, and Sadhana helped in this good work. The efforts of the Muslims were thus undone. Large numbers of adherents were secured by Vaishnavas, Saivas and Saktas.

A very interesting part of this description in the Bhavishya is the different types of Mantras these teachers gave their followers, the varying shape of the mark on the forehead (tilaka) that they employed, the necklace that they asked their disciples to wear. All the outward emblems of Hinduism have been exhausted in order to prove that the Mlechhas (Muslim) or Hindu converts to Islam were thus regularly and formally admitted into the Hindu fold. A rather intriguing word in this description is Mlechha Yantra which my friend, Pandit Raja Ram Sastri, would translate as the Muslim call to prayers, but which may probably be better rendered as mosques. We are told these Mlechhas Yantras were destroyed in the course of these attempts.

What exactly is the value of these facts recorded by the writer of this part of the Bhavishya? We would at once concede that all the facts mentioned here need not be historically true. We admit that the preachers lumped together here were not all contemporaries. We further recognize that several of them were not disciples of Chaitanya. What, one may very well ask, is then left. The answer is simple. When all allowances have been made we are left to face the fact that the writer of the Bhavishya knew of an old tradition when several Hindu preachers in different localities counteracted the growing power of Islam by reconverting Hindu converts to Islam back to the Hindu fold as also by admitting the Muslims to the Hindu fold. He may have confused the tradition, played havoc with its chronology and transplanted preachers and places. What is still more important this time his sympathies are with the reformers.

Unlike the first extract cited, he does not look upon the admissions of Muslims to the Hindu fold as something strange and lamentable. This is important when we remember the fact that the age of this part of the Bhavishya is uncertain. It may indeed be modern. But all this does not destroy the fact that the writer knew of earlier traditions of conversions and was content to record them.

CHRISTIANS AND PUBLIC LIFE. (THE GUARDIAN.)

Sir Herry Page-Croft is reported to have written a lengthy letter to the Archbishop of Centerbury, presumably on the subject of Indian constitutional reforms. Reuter quotes this observation from the letter:—"Many Christians, who have given their whole lives for missionary work in India have expressed the view that the agelong Hindu-Moslem hostility can only be bridged by the example and precepts of Christianity." If the statement implies that the observance of a Christian way of life would banish communal rivalry, it is a platitude that has no significance true though it may be. Neither Hinduism nor Islam enjoins precepts for mutual destruction, and they can proffer similar claims. To justify the statement attributed to Christian workers who have spent a life time in India, Christian practice should show that it has risen above the level of conflicts of all types, national, communal, social, economic and so forth. If convincing examples can be held up before others, then the secret of the power behind them will carry its own moral. But it is too sadly true, that whatever else Christianity may have done for the West, it has not taught men there to live in peace. There can therefore be no talk of the example of Christianity to set before the Hindu-Muslim communalists.

The miserable divisions in India provided one of the greatest opportunities Christianity has ever had of inculcating its message of goodwill, peace and forgiving spirit. Precisely here has been one of its most tragic failures. If the followers of different religions failed to overcome their differences, Christianity not merely because it was a third party, but because of its particular gifts should have restored to the warring bigots, the pristine quality of their faiths and placed them on the path of peace. That communal warfare rages with this peacemaker as a helpless distant spectator is the stark truth, which heightens the irony of the statement which Sir H. Page-Croft, advisers made to him. If centuries of Christianity in India and several generations of Christian workers have failed to produce the change, what grounds can there be for the hope that Hindu-Muslim rivalry will be settled by Christian example and precepts in the future?

This is not to say that the Christian religion has no service to perform in this difficult field. It is rather a challenge to accept the call of the situation in the real spirit. It is one thing to be aware of the sublimities of one's religion and be deluded by it into a spirit of complacent inaction that all will be well if that religion became universal. It is quite another to be inspired by that religion to step into a critical breach and use all one's might to heal it. Neither a pious wish that Hindus and Muslims were Christians, nor a distant solicitude can effect a change of heart. We have yet to know that Christian agencies or the Christian Church have ever envisaged this task.

The sentiments expressed by Sir H. Page-Croft on this problem arise out of the habitual eagerness of a man with a message to announce a cure and not work out the implications of his faith in the circumstances in which he is placed. It leads further to the denial of merits in others around him. Undoubtedly the Christian truths that have been preached in India and that much of them as have been lived have inspired many movements and created many models that have been adopted by non-Christians. There has been unstinted recognition of this. That cannot obscure the fact that there has been inertness in many directions bearing vital issues. On many questions involving great principles, there has been the silence of death. Strangely enough it is on these same issues, that Christianity is offered as a patent remedy whether there is any intention on the part of its sponsors to help in solutions or not. Social inequality, communal conflicts, capacity for self-government, economic ills, Indo-British relationships, and many others may be mentioned regarding which we have heard that Christian principles alone can provide an equitable settlement. But what evidence is there that attempts have been made to apply those principles?

Christian endeavour hitherto has mainly centred round the legitimate idea that there must first of all be a new kind of person as the unit of society if there is to be a new social order. If this alone be the idea it stops short of the endeavour that is called for to bring the new order itself. When confronted with national tasks, it would be idle to make claims that have yet shown no signs of fulfilment. Seen in concrete terms, we have the warning of Rethinking Missions:

"It is a tempting fallacy to argue directly from the troubles of the world to the opportunity of missions. We should be remiss in our duty if we failed to emphasise the intervening consideration—the capacity and fitness of missions." Later on the Report proceeds to state, "It must essentially be a co-operative effort in which the spirit of the mission, the inherent vigour of these ancient cultures the specialized knowledge of experts and the resources of government are brought into effective working union," (p.74). The principle of co-operation enunciated for village work, they would apply to all general programmes and the necessary practical steps to remedy the defect are outlined in the Report.

Circumstances have driven foreign missionaries and Indian Christians largely from fields where any semblance of controversies may be anticipated. It has become a settled habit. Whether it is a justifiable and wise policy or not, it has deprived them of the right to say what would be the ultimate solution of the grave troubles which others are bravely facing and cannot help doing so. We cannot talk of the healing virtues of Christianity, when there is reluctance to go within reach of the troubled areas. Either Christians, be they missionaries or Indians, are able to face these irksome duties or not. But until it can be indisputably shown that there is the capacity and the willingness to enter unreservedly into the situation, the Christian contribution must be considered totally absent and of no account. Pious hopes and wishes uttered under these circumstances, that they have the solution of all national ills, will only make Christianity a laughing stock of the country.

The New Christianity:—Germans were told to set Hitler above God by Dr. Krause, the extreme Nazi "Christian," at a meeting of the National German Church movement at Berlin. Giving as the motto for a Nordic spiritual training the sentence "I can if I will," Dr. Krause condemned the absolute and "supranational" claims of Christianity. "Christianity is always international in its conscience, he complained. "But a man's own nation comes first; this is valid for all matters of national life, even for religious claims. It is an impossible idea that one can acknowledge the Third Reich and yet obey God more than man. We must return to a native scheme of values, retaining as much of Christianity as will stand this new test." Dr. Krause was suspended from all his offices in the Evangelical Church and formally disowned by Reich Bishop Müller last autumn following a storm of indignation aroused in orthodox Church quarters by a speech in which he advocated the abolition of the Crucifix. Nevertheless, he was elected last Friday to the Synod Council.

CHRISTIANITY UNDER SWARAJ.

(THE CATHOLIC LEADER.)

The possible effect of coming constitutional changes on the position of Christians in India and on the work of the Missions has been time and again discussed in the columns of the Catholic Leader. There are some who anticipate antagonism to mission work or at least interference with it as a result of the introduction of self-government. On the other hand, there are many more who see no cause for such gloomy forebodings either in the past history of India or in the events of the last twelve years or so after the Reforms were inaugurated. We share the latter view. We are definitely of opinion that Christianity will not be penalised and that those who profess the Christian Faith will not be subjected to disabilities. The Indian Christians, though few in number, have well established their position in Indian society. Their Christian character, their educational attainments and their loyalty to the country are unquestioned. Further, thanks to the indefatigable endeavours of our missionaries, Christianity is not an exotic plant but has taken deep roots in the soil and possesses the strength and vigour of natural growth.

We have been led to make these observations by the alarm expressed by Sir Henry Page-Croft (Conservative M. P.) in the course of a long letter addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury. A brief summary of that letter has been cabled to India and published in Monday's daily papers. "The position of the Christians in India," says Sir Henry Page-Croft, "with law and order divorced from British control and with an administration from which British servants are eliminated is viewed with the gravest possible concern." It is not stated by whom this apprehension is expressed. Reuter is vague on this important point. The Indian Christians, both Catholics and Protestants, have with one mind and heart welcomed the impending constitutional changes. It is true they have asked for adequate guarantees for safeguarding their religious liberties, but that can by no means be interpreted as lack of confidence in the future political leaders of their country. The Christians have always been quite willing to fully co-operate with the members of other communities for the advancement of their country. They do not share the views of Sir Henry Page-Croft that the transfer of law and order to Ministers responsible to the electorate would adversely affect their religious rights.

We do not deny that there is an undercurrent of suspicion and prejudice against Christianity and Christians among large sections of our countrymen. They are decidedly opposed to conversion work and look upon the proselytising activities of missionaries as a disturbing element in the country. They erroneously identify Christianity with foreign domination. But much of this prejudice is bound to disappear with a better knowledge of the aims and objects of the missions and better understanding of the supra-national character of Christianity. By upholding Christian principles in the administration of the country and by demonstrating that Christianity represents a religious spirit and that it does not make of the Indian a separate body as far as political interests are concerned, the Missions may dispel the mistaken impression that Christianity is a foreign and denationalising faith and that it is in any way associated with foreign rule. "It will be easier for missions," says Mr. Arthur Mayhew, late Director of Public Instruction in the Central Provinces, "under a more Indian form of Government, to disentangle themselves from the official and political world. They will better be able to assert the essential difference between the spheres and methods of Government and those of the Christian Churches. The churches are concerned with spiritual values and their influence on the nature of man. No political change that leaves that nature as it is will seriously concern them."

India is a land of many faiths, both indigenous and foreign. For centuries religions widely differing from each other have prospered and flourished before the advent of the British into the country. Even Christianity was established long before the conquest of India by the British and enjoyed to a large extent the protection of Hindu Rajahs as well as Muslim rulers. Hinduism is essentially a religion of toleration with no official creed and no fixed standard of conduct barring a few social usages and observances based on caste. Its adherents may not be enamoured of Christianity but they recognise it to be a source of moral strength and spiritual regeneration. Whatever non-Christians may think of its doctrines, its worship and practices, they know at least that it stirs men and women to unselfish service and that missionary institutions, educational and charitable, are a priceless asset to the country. It is not likely therefore that Christians will be denied political equality with their fellow-countrymen or that their religion will be proscribed by the future rulers of the land.

We have no reason to view with grave concern the gradual withdrawal of the British from the administration of the country, as a consequence of coming constitutional changes. The question of the extension of self-government is a question of expediency not of religion. There may be difference of opinion as to whether drastic changes in the administrative machinery will be of unquestionable advantage to the country; but there is no need for us to oppose the impending reforms on grounds of religion. It is particularly inexpedient that in the India of the future, Christianity should be associated with political controversy or that it should rely on the goodwill and assistance of any European Government. Its future lies on its own truth and excellence and on the service it renders to the country. We think it, therefore, absolutely unnecessary for politicians to raise the bogey of religion in danger as an argument against constitutional reforms.

BRITISH JUSTICE IN BRITAIN AND INDIA.

Reference to the working out of traditions of British justice in India was made by the Chief Justice Sir Shadilal in reply to tributes paid by the Bench and Bar of the Lahore High Court on the occasion of his retirement and handing over charge to his successor.

The essence of political liberty as recognised by British courts, observed Sir Shadilal, was that justice should be administered with complete impartiality and those who were innocent should receive and enjoy freedom.

Sir Shadilal mentioned a recent case in which a communist who had been convicted of a breach of the law claimed damages against the head of the London police on the ground that a bundle of papers which the police had lawfully seized had been detained longer than was justified. The case was tried before the High Court and the complaint was awarded for this ordinary mistake thirty sterling damages. Sir Shadilal continued:

"Here was a man who had been sentenced and who was opposed to the whole system of the Government of his country, but who none the less had a perfect right to resort to ordinary courts of the land against the High Official, whose subordinate had made what in my view was only a mistake without malicious intent, and yet without question the law of England, which is administered impartially for every body, awards him compensation in exactly the same way as though he was a favoured member of the society.

"Would it be improper to ask what would be the thought of a Judge in India who, imbued with the traditions of British justice, acted in a similar manner? Would he not thereby subject himself to disfavour and even resentment which would be manifested in no uncertain manner? These and other disadvantages have sometimes to be borne 'sub silentio' by a person who is true to the oath which he solemnly takes on accepting the office of His Majesty's Judge."

Sir Shadilal quoted from the memorandum prepared about two years ago by the Judges of the Supreme Court of the Judicature in England in which it was pointed out that for two centuries it had been considered essential that the judges' security and independence should be maintained inviolate. It was long ago said that there can be no true liberty in a country where the judges were not entirely independent to Government and the soundness of the remark had never been questioned. Continuing Sir Shadilal observed that no reasonable person could take exception to this authoritative pronouncement. It was however, said, added Sir Shadilal, "that these doctrines of the English constitution cannot find full scope in this country where peculiar circumstances existed to impair the independence of the judiciary. On principle I am unable to see any valid ground for making such a distinction and I trust that no judge of this court will ever depart to the slightest degree from the solemn promise which he makes before entering upon the execution of the duties of his office even if he was subjected to personal disadvantages."

Sir Shadilal concluded by saying that the confidence of Indians of all schools of thought in the even-handed justice as administered by the High Courts was the greatest bulwark of British rule in this country and that any person who did any act tending to shake that confidence caused the greatest possible harm to that rule.

DUTIES OF THE PROSECUTION.

Delivering judgment in an appeal in the Allahabad High Court against conviction on a murder charge Mr. Justice Thom sitting with Mr. Justice Kitch set aside five death sentences and one transportation sentence and acquitted the six appellants. Mr. Justice Thom made the following general observations in his judgment:

We are well aware that it may be said, and sometimes is said, that the court ought to shut its eyes to such irregularities on the part of the prosecuting authorities. After all, it is argued, if there is little doubt that accused challaned by police are guilty, the prosecuting authorities are entitled to do their best to obtain a conviction. We unhesitatingly reject any such suggestion; 'that the end justifies the means' is a doubtful proposition to any sphere. Emphatically it can find no countenance in a court of justice. As a result of centuries of experience a code of principles has been evolved which British courts observe in the investigating of criminal charges, in deciding civil disputes and generally in the dispensing of justice. By rigid and punctilious observance of those principles the administration of British justice has gained reputation for purity and fairness unsurpassed in any part of the world. It is the right of every man, be he guilty or innocent, to insist that he be tried according to those principles. Those principles are for the protection of the accused, not only against arbitrariness on the part of the court itself but against the activities of a possibly unscrupulous prosecuting authority. His Majesty's judges under the constitution of India are charged with the duty of administering the law according to the principles of British justice and not according to any rules or methods which may be adopted by the prosecuting authorities, which it is sometimes sought to justify by reference to the conditions which may exist in this country or in a particular district. No such argument can justify the slightest departure from principles which under the constitution as by law established, the courts are bound to apply. In the absence of legislative sanction this court will refuse to countenance suggestions of deviations therefrom which come from those who are unacquainted with the principles of jurisprudence and who are neither learned in the law nor experienced in its practice."

JAPAN'S TRADE AND WORLD PEACE.

Mr. Gardner Harding writes in 'Current History'.—Japan is to most business men the greatest danger in the present situation. In the middle of 1933 the report that Japan had increased exports by 50 per cent when other nations were still counting diminishing returns, even in comparison with 1932, sent a thrill of apprehension throughout the world. Essentially, Japan's concentration on exports is somewhat like that in the United States in 1915 when it was said that 75 per cent of our export trade, except in raw commodities, was in the hands of from twelve to fifteen large firms. Eight family companies led by the big three, Mitsui, Mitsubishi and Sumitomo, are said to command more than 52 per cent of Japan's financial capital. Manufacturing, shipping, banking and government aid are more nearly an integrated whole than in any other country. When in 1933 Japan challenged Great Britain's position in textiles and engaged in a trade war with India, the most dramatic commercial conflict of the year, the step was taken in the full conviction that Japan was ready for and could hold this substantial trade conquest in the same sense that Japanese armies could hold Manchuria. Steadily, she is making inroads in Latin America and, indeed, is threatening one field after another of our own home market with cheap manufactured goods.

But Japan, unlike Great Britain, must buy enormously from foreigners for her basic needs. Forty per cent of her imports come from and 40 per cent of her sales abroad are to the United States. Our cotton, iron and steel, oil, wheat and lumber are her necessities. Currency depreciation has produced a comparative boom in Japan's exports. While other nations between 1929 and 1933 were suffering trade losses that reduced their exports to 40 per cent of their former value, Japan's trade, in yen, remained within 86 per cent of its former peak in 1929. But the figures in gold tell a different story. They cancel the entire increase in trade between 1932 and 1933 and show, in spite of the fears Japan has been causing, that her real loss in export trade calculated on a gold basis has been fully as great as the average for the rest of world, or about 63 per cent. In other words Japan cannot afford to be out of line with the rest of the world in the depreciation of her currency. The statistics for 1933 showed that the flood of cheap products to the United States amounted to over £100,000,000, less than the products she had imported from the United States. The aggressive trade policy of Japan is, therefore, much less one of the world's present dangers than that of Great Britain. It is Japan's international policy of adventure and mastery, her vast ambitions in Asia, that make her relatively unaccountable on the side of economic peace or war. In trade she will advance steadily, but under great handicaps.

NOTES

Moral Gain but Material Loss :—Interviewed regarding the decision of Mahatma Gandhi to complete most of his All-India Harijan tour on foot Mahatma Hansraj, President of the Harijan Sewak Sangh, Punjab, said: "Mahatma Gandhi's resolve to travel on foot is, as far as his own personality is concerned, a mark of high and pure life. It shows how self-reliant he is and how he can suffer for the cause which he has at heart. Possibly the reason of this step is that one who works among the poor should live like a poor man and avoid any display of temporal power which may in the opinion of the masses separate him from them. While appreciating the high motives leading to this resolve, I feel that collections that are being made for effective work among the Harijans will suffer and if the Harijan work gains morally it will to some extent suffer materially. As far as the Punjab is concerned I would request Mahatmaji not to insist on travelling on foot as the climate of the Punjab is very taxing in the month of July when he is expected here." Mahatma Hansraj, it appears, attaches more importance to the material loss than to the moral gain of Gandhiji's proposal to walk instead of rush about in motor cars during the rest of his present tour. The object of the tour, Gandhiji has more than once said, is to convert caste Hindus to the Harijan cause, particularly Temple Entry. Collection of funds is or should be a subsidiary consideration. To a man who honestly believes that a temple will be polluted by the admission of untouchables it will not matter in the least whether Gandhiji collects two thousand rupees or two crores by forced marches on foot or whirlwind journeys on motorcars. For ourselves, we think that the collection of a large fund is neither essential nor even beneficial to a movement of social reform. It is, of course, different with modern politics, and that is why it is so peculiarly liable to corruption.

Inner Story of the Peace Conference :—Mr. William Harbutt Dawson's "Germany under the Treaty," throws lurid light on the inner working of the Peace Conference at Versailles. It records many incidents which show that corruption and intrigue are carried to greater lengths in the most civilized countries of the West than in the East which is represented as their native home. Here are two about the French press. Mr. Dawson quotes from "The Peace in the Making" by Mr. Wilson Harris as follows :—"A plenipotentiary of one not inconsiderable Power was declared at a crisis in the Conference to have taxed M. Clemenceau privately with his personal opposition to the expressed will of France on the issue of the moment. 'What do you mean by the expressed will of France?' asked the President of the Conference (Clemenceau himself.) 'Look at your Press,' answered his critic. 'Every paper, except the Debats and L'Humanité, is supporting our claims.' Clemenceau looked straight at his interlocutor and then down at the bureau at which he was sitting. 'Do you want me to open that drawer,' he said, 'and show you the list of the sums you have been paying to the Paris papers?' His visitor decided on reflection that he did not." But the story does not end here. Mr. Dawson says that Clemenceau's own journal was systematically bribed with Russian money in order to secure French support of the Russian claim to establish itself in Constantinople. Large sums, he says, were paid to various newspapers in Paris for this purpose, no less a man than M. Poincare acting as intermediary in this unsavoury business. In support of this statement, Mr. Dawson quotes from a despatch of the Russian Ambassador in Paris, Isvolsky, to a Russian Privy Councillor. The British Government had assented to the Russian demand for Constantinople in 1915. Notwithstanding that fact, the two Entente powers tried to secure Turkey's neutrality in the war by a promise to respect and defend the integrity of its territory both in Europe and Asia! The French Foreign Minister assured the Russian Ambassador that this would not come in the way of their giving effect to the Tsar's desire.

In Defence of Default :—Speaking at Manchester last week Sir John Simon justified the omission to provide for the payment of the American Debt in the British surplus budget. He maintained that an argument based on a budget surplus was entirely fallacious for two reasons, as far as the American debt was concerned. Firstly, because that which lay at the very back of the difficulty was the injury done to world trade and world recovery as a whole if they contemplated transfer of enormous quantities which they received in goods but which they were asked to pay back in money. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that in relation to the national wealth, British taxation was at least twice as heavy as corresponding taxation in the United States. If and so far as these are valid reasons, there is no reason why they should be limited to the British debt to the United States. We can think of at least one case in which they would be far more appropriate. It may be that British taxation proportionately to the national wealth is higher than that of the States, but there are countries in which it is higher, even than the British, bearing in mind the fact that incidence of taxation to income becomes progressively heavier as the income becomes lower. Then, again, Mr. J. A. Spender pointed out in a recent article in Current History that the standard of life in Britain has not declined—he said that some people got in doles more than they had earned as wages—because the money raised from the rich went to the help of the poor in Britain itself and was not sent out of the country. This part of his article was reproduced in the Reformer.

Sir John Anderson:—The Amrita Basar Patrika, writing in stern condemnation of the Darjeeling outrage, pays a fervent tribute to Sir John Anderson's work for Bengal. It says: "If there is any Governor who in recent times has with single-minded devotion, try to bring about the economic regeneration of the province placed under his charge, it is Sir John Anderson. Sir John Anderson has been in our midst for barely two years, but even during this short period he has initiated measures which go far towards the solution of the vital economic problems of Bengal. As instances, we may mention the establishment of the land mortgage banks to tackle the problem of rural indebtedness, the initiation of measures to find employment of the workless bhadralok youths of Bengal, the attempt to revive the industries of the province through the State Aid to Industries Act and the scheme of a comprehensive economic survey to be accompanied by intensive efforts to promote the rural development of the province for which we find ample promise in the appointment of the Rural Development Commissioner. These are achievements of which any man can be proud." Coming from a journal of the standing and prestige of the Amrita Basar Patrika, this is a most remarkable testimony to the popularity of Sir John Anderson in his province.

Temperance and the White Paper:—Mr. J. F. Edwards, editor of the Dnyanodaya, published in a recent issue of that journal extracts from a letter sent by him to the Secretary of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association in London, protesting against the limitations placed by the White Paper Constitution on the programme of Temperance workers in India. Mr. Edwards rightly urges that the assurance that there will be no diminution of the "powers at present enjoyed" given by the Under Secretary is more a cause for apprehension on the part of the reformers than a concession in their favour. Mr. Edwards has spared no pains in trying to convince British politicians of India's constitutionally expressed desire for Prohibition. Others have shown that the picketing of liquor shops was an even greater demonstration of the strength of that demand. If after ably conducted propaganda the Government feel that the needs of Indian Temperance can be met by an assurance that they would keep matters as they are today under the new constitution, it can only mean that the British leaders have not considered the issue a vital one. The reason for this is probably that Mr. Grubb, the Secretary in London, has not been exactly decided on whether the White Paper Scheme is good enough or not for the cause of Indian temperance.

For the Youth of Asia:—The New History Society, 132 East 65th Street, New York, will officially announce next July the offer of three prizes of the value of dollars three hundred, two hundred, and one hundred respectively to the youth of Asia, male and female, under thirty years of age, for the three best essays of not more than 2000 words on the subject: "How can Youth Contribute to the Realisation of Universal Religion." This will be the fourth competition organized by the New History Society. Among those who are acting on the Award Committee are such distinguished names as Dr. John Dewey, Rabbi Stephen Wise, Viscount Cecil, Professor Gilbert Murray, M. Salvador de Madariga, Spanish Ambassador to France and Professor W. E. Rappard of Institut Universitaire de Hautes Etudes Internationales of Paris.

The Bombay Mill Strike:—The Strike of textile workers in Bombay continues. The Municipal Corporation passed a resolution, asking Government to appoint a conciliation Committee, against the opposition of the Chairman of the Millowners' Association. Government have done nothing so far. The low standard of living and the much-abused caste and joint family systems, are enabling the workers to hold out against being starved into submission. They aver that they would rather die than submit. But it is not such a simple matter. A stage will be reached when the pressure of wife and children will oblige the man to pocket their pride and go to work on the terms of employers. But this will hardly improve either the efficiency or the stability of the industry which will continue to be on the verge of dislocation.

REACTION AMONG THE PARSIS.

For some time past leading members of the Parsi community have shown signs of nervousness about its present condition and future prospects. They brought out a British expert to find out what ailed the community. Quite recently they seem to have been alarmed by the occurrence of some marriages between girls of the community with men of other communities. Evidence of this alarm was furnished by an article which we published in the Reformer of March 31, from a thoughtful Parsi contributor. Sir Shapurji Billimoria states in a letter to the Trustees of the Parsi Panchayat (Times of India, May 12) that the establishment of a women's college will discourage "the present craze for civil marriages, which in a great measure, if not entirely, is due to co-education in cosmopolitan or inter-communal institutions." The eminent Accountant goes on to say that he understood that some Nuns from Europe were prepared to come out to India solely with the object of undertaking the proper education of girls of all nationalities, if they were provided with the bare necessities of life. He suggests that wealthy Parsi women should start a fund to import these Nuns and put them in charge of the education of Parsi girls. Sir Shapurji does not seem to know that the very same complaint of educated Indian Christian girls marrying outside the community has been made in Upper India where there is no co-education. One of the leaders of that community some years ago suggested that women's schools and colleges should be fenced with barbed wire to prevent heathen young men associating with the daughters of true believers. We do not know if this suggestion has been carried out in any school but intermarriages between Christians and non-Christians would seem to be on the increase from the fact that another Indian Christian leader has thought it necessary quite recently to throw doubt, on the flimsiest grounds, on the validity of intermarriages under the Christian Marriage Act. Parsis are proud of their wealth and progress and are shocked that any girl of their community should care to marry a man of any other community which they regard as being inferior in civilisation to theirs. But comfort is not civilisation. Educated women require more than comfort. They soon tire of being stood all the time on a pedestal. Without vision and without ideals they spiritually starve. Men do not suffer to the same extent and in the same way. All communities are more or less victims of this soul starvation at present; but a small community, in large part confined to one city, which, moreover, does not proselytize, feels its effects most visibly. A very sympathetic foreign observer who admired the Parsis, wrote: "After watching the professional beggars and self-tormentors of Benares, one comes upon the eminently sane Parsee with a sense of relief. But the endless repetition of this perfect sanity which one finds in the Parsee community, with so little to break the spiritual commonplace, becomes itself at last rather monotonous; and one longs for a ragged sannyasi again, who has dared to turn his back upon bread and butter and, going out under the stars with staff and bowl, to risk his all in the great adventure of life." Sir Shapurji Billimoria has not taken into account the possibility that Christian Nuns from Europe who are prepared to educate the daughters of other communities if they are provided with the bare necessities of life, may unconsciously influence their pupils in directions which may create more serious problems. A dear old Parsi friend used to say that Parsis would return to the purdah system which, he held, they should not have given up. This was not beyond the bounds of possibility thirty years ago but today when women's claim to share equally with men the rights and obligations of life, is everywhere acknowledged, there is not the least chance of Parsi or any other women betaking themselves to the sheltered life of a purdahshahi.

Parsi leaders should rely more on themselves and less on foreign experts and nuns to solve their social problems. The European expert may tell us how best to build ships or forge armaments. But no one with even a casual knowledge of the state of post-war society in Europe, will seek light from that quarter in planning for sane and stable social conditions. Thoughtful men in the West are anxious to know if India can offer solutions to some of their problems. We understand and can sympathise with the passionate desire of the Parsi community to exist as a distinct community. It is with this object that the ancient Parsis sought asylum in India. The centuries that have passed since then would be blotted out if they are now absorbed by any of the communities amidst which they live. But in order to survive as a distinct entity it must do one of two things, preferably both, as Indian Christians do. Parsis should have a greatly increased birthrate and they should make proselytes. It was reported in the papers the other day that a Parsi young man became a Christian in order to marry a Bengali Christian girl. If the Parsis admitted converts, the bride would probably have embraced the faith of her husband. Increase of the birth rate means, of course, increase of marriages, and wealthy Parsis can help to increase marriages by removing some of the economic obstacles which now restrict them, as Mussolini and Hitler are doing for their population. A comparison between the Parsis of Bombay and Parsis who live in the districts and the States, shows that the latter largely retain the pioneer qualities of their ancestors, of which the Bombay Parsi betrays only fleeting traces. Obviously, encouraging members of the community to make their homes in the districts, will prove to be greatly helpful in restoring the original vigour of this ancient stock. Building numerous houses for poor Parsis in various parts of Bombay city, attracts people from the districts into the hothouse atmosphere of this overcrowded city. A large scheme of colonisation, preferably in the Deccan uplands, will be far more beneficial than a public school in Poona or blocks of tenements in this island. Sir Shapurjee is opposed to the stopping of the doles which are paid out of the numerous charitable funds to poor members of the community. Such a step suddenly taken will, of course, cause considerably hardship. On the other hand, there is much force in the protest of the late Lady Tata that "these foolish and ridiculous Parsee charities" have introduced in the community the same unfortunate results as the doles in Britain. There is a movement to co-ordinate Parsi charities. The desirability of discouraging the exodus of Parsis from rural to urban areas is well worth attention by its promoters. In the country, the enterprise of the Parsi will be valuable not only to himself but also to the rest of the population. That will prevent isolation which in the case of small and middle-class largely community spells inevitable death.

POLITICS IN PATNA.

The All India Congress Committee is holding its session at Patna. The one question about which all sections of the Congress are unanimous is the abandonment or indefinite suspension of Civil Disobedience. There is sharp difference of opinion on the question whether the neo-Swarajists should function as a wing of the Congress or as an altogether independent body. The Swarajists or most of them want to be recognised as a party within the Congress while Congressmen who are not Swarajists are predominantly in favour of leaving the Swarajists to fend for themselves. There is a third section which is determined on having Congress converted to the doctrine of a socialist State and setting about forthwith to work to that end within and without the Legislatures. Dr. Ansari, whose nephew is the Delhi leader of their group which has its principal centre in Bombay, has declared that he has considerable sympathy with its object but that the present time is inopportune as the great majority of the present voters will be estranged by the mention of socialism as an electoral issue. He advises his socialist friends to wait till the franchise is extended (presumably under the White Paper Scheme) when he thinks they will have better chances of success! This temporising on a vital issue by the leader of the Swaraj Party is hardly a sign of strength. The electorate will interpret it as a surrender to the socialists. The Indian Government is a socialist State already. Land is nationalised, railways have been and are being nationalised, telegraph and telephone are government controlled. Even Indian social life is to a considerable extent socialistic. Further advance in the same direction can only lead to Communism. Not that we are afraid of it. We suppose why the party does not frankly call itself communist instead of socialist, is that the former is likely to frighten people more than socialism, which may mean everything or nothing.

JAPAN THROUGH A BISHOP'S EYES.

The assertion that Japan had awakened to her creative potentialities and for the first time the powers of the West could not call a halt, has been made by the Bishop of Kyushu (the Rt. Rev. Arthur Lea).

Speaking at the 135th anniversary meeting of the Church Missionary Society at Central Hall, Westminster, he said:

"We are accustomed to think of Japan in connection with mass production. But that refers not only to industrial matters. In education, in the creation of public opinion, in the strengthening of loyalty and patriotism, it is all mass production.

"Sixty years ago when the nations of the West compelled Japan to open up her doors, Japan was passive. During the last 50 years Japan has been assimilating. She had taken over all the theoretical and applied knowledge of the world.

"When Japan was passive people of the West were saying what a quaint people how gentle, how interesting they are. During the period of assimilation it was 'What a wonderful people. How great they are as imitators; how clever.

"And now we have the third period of Japanese development—Japan creative—and that is the cause of all trouble. Japan has awakened to her creative potentialities and for the first time in the history of Japan the powers of the West are unable to call a halt.

"The polite exchanges of the past few days have been very successful in saving the faces of all concerned. But Japan is to-day dominant in the Far East as the United States is in the Americas and England from Gibraltar to Hong Kong. Japan maintains that creative powers mean expansion. It is either expansion and the realisation of her creative energies or chaos and ruin for Japan.

"At the beginning of the League of Nations, Japan made a reasonable and Christian request for racial equality and for the negation of racial discrimination. The great Powers, including England, while agreeing in principle insisted that it was impracticable. We teach that in our religion, but as for politics, well that's another matter!" said the Bishop. Japan withdrew the proposals gracefully and with that withdrawal her faith in the Christian idealism of Western Nations died.

"Sweeping condemnations of Japan might be unjust," concluded the Bishop. "Every charge made against Japan could be made just as effectively against all the nations of Europe."

Bali Opposes Missionaries:—The attempts on the part of the Christian missionaries to introduce the Gospel in Bali, have, in recent years, created a good deal of stir in the Netherlands as well as in the Dutch East Indies. It should be noted here that under the provisions of the East Indian Government Act Article 177, 1922, no Christian minister, priest or missionary may engage in work in any part of the East Indies without the special permission of the Governor-General. Amry Vandenbosch gives a graphic account of the main currents of controversy in the columns of the International Review of Missions.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

THE LATE MR. M. A. CANDETH. (By Mrs. J. J. Pitt.)

Quite recently writing congratulations to Prof M. A. Candeth on his appointment to a high educational post, I am most grievously shocked to see the news of his death, scarcely in the prime of life after a short illness. Since he left Cambridge in pre-War days, I had only seen him twice. But my memory of those days when he was an undergraduate at "King's" is rendered so vivid by reason of his remarkable youthful personality, that I feel I must record something of them. Candeth was a boy of 16 when he entered the University, and was introduced to us as knowing a lot about theosophical, mystical and such matters, and could talk well. I will never forget the time when we invited a small gathering of friends to meet him. He looked to us more than his age, then 17, I think, with his beautiful childlike face and large sparkling eyes, and then he began to talk: I can only liken his conversation to the unbroken limpid melodious flowing of water in a brook. The English was perfect and of the best literary style denoting erudition and culture of a high order. I noted our friends' faces of utter astonishment and, so lost in amazement and fascination were we, that we hardly took in all that he was saying, at that time. We were to find that there was scarcely an intellectual subject upon which he could not discourse in the same way. The secret was that he read enormously and had an almost miraculous memory and the intuition to select the best from all he assimilated, and give it out so it was far from being a mere repetition of passages he had read. And he possessed that rare gift of real wit, as instanced in his likening of the English climate to persons "trying to live beyond their means." A member of the University told us that Candeth was one of the most brilliant "men" "up" that year. Brilliant was just the word for him. Among others whose notice he attracted was especially Oscar Browning—the celebrity of the Cambridge world of those days—and in "O. B's" house at Bexhill Candeth spent many vacations. Although he never tired of describing the beauties of his Malabar home, (in no way overdrawn as I saw for myself in a subsequent visit there) he loved Cambridge, which he called his second home, and not only for the unique comeliness of the "Backs," but also for just those things that appeal to those for whom England is Home, the ancient beautiful structures, each with its separate history reaching far back into the past, and almost each one founded by a King or one of Royal birth. The peerless beauty of the Chapel of his College were themes he would discant upon with an appreciation very rare in one of another race.

In "K. P" and Benett Street even now I can picture him hurrying along with his almost inseparable companions, B. K. Wagle, D. M. Bose, and the present Vice-Chancellor of Bombay University, tattered gowns flying and battered "mortarboards" as was the fashion for undergraduates of those days. Essentially the scholar as Candeth was, he was nevertheless the merriest soul imaginable, and kept the tall old house where his rooms were, alive. Here he was watched over by a devoted landlady who in his frequent attacks of illness, with her usual hard day's work before her, would often, as I have seen her, sit up by his bedside all night. He used to call her his other mother. But when well, no more social tea-parties and gatherings could be found in term-time than in his rooms, and the three companions were up to pranks too. Did not they come round quite late one night to our house and when I opened the door of the room into which they had been ushered I found two of them with solemn faces who told me in low voice that poor Candeth was ill again and they did not know what to do with him. At first, speechless with distress, no sooner did I jump up saying "I will come at once and see him," when suddenly from behind the long window curtains springs out the laughing Candeth himself.

Tears fill our eyes as we think of those days, and of how many connected with them have passed "over" and of all that has intervened since, and now he has gone with, what one cannot help feeling, the future that was his due still before him. But God knows best, and there are no "might have beens" with him.

HINDU FUNERAL REFORM. (By C. TEJPAL.)

That if there were no Untouchability there would have been no question of segregation in the Hindu fold, and that if there are no untouchables in the Hindu fold there would be no untouchability, is rather doubtful. However one may sympathise with the so-called untouchables, and not sympathise with untouchability, Hindus in general cannot honestly abolish untouchability since it has its stand on the conduct of Hindu funerals.

The Ashavalayan Grahya Sutra, a book on Hindu Shariats, lays down that a dead body can be carried on the hearse drawn by bullocks. This is the most reverential and sanitary method for the conduct of funerals. But since the time Hindus have been carrying their dead on their shoulders the artificial differences of castes have emerged accompanied by many other social evils together with untouchability with all its paraphernalia. Consequently, it is all waste of national energy in idle talk and beating about the bush to find the cause or root of untouchability from Shastras or Pandits.

An American Padre was much struck with the employment of human labour in India where animal labour or machanic power would be employed in other countries. He saw that the loads that can be carried on a vehicle, were carried on men's shoulders and in Bombay and Madras he saw the coolies working as draught animals. The reason of this may have appeared to him to be comparative cheapness of human labour; but for a different reason a student of Indian sociology may find a characteristic difference between European funerals and similar processions of other communities.

The main object of the above reason is not to be easily understood by non-Hindus, but the character of Hindu life and death can be gathered from the fact that a Hindu alive is not so much polluted by the touch of others as a dead one is. Consequently a dead brahmin requires to be taken to the cemetery only by the brahmins and so on for all other castes and sub-castes of Hindus including the depressed classes. This character is the cause of untouchability and segregation in Hindu folds. Of course there may be exceptions, but taking the time-honoured and common practice of the masses, the root of the evil may well be gathered from the conduct of Hindu funerals. There is a difference of technique between Hindu and Moslem funerals. The construction of the Moslem bier and its covering being on a more sanitary principle than that of the Hindus, Moslems join their funerals freely and in full dress, keeping their social solidarity. But the bier and conduct of Hindu funerals are not only crude and vulgar but devoid of social and religious spirit. And the method objectionable from the sanitary point of view based on the pernicious doctrine of untouchability, is in itself sufficient to segregate Hindus. Moreover, Hindus carry their bier in cold nights and mornings, in sun or rain, with very little dress to protect them and theirs from the weather.

Hindus know that the hearse is the most convenient and proper vehicle and its use would enhance the honour due to the dead. They know that to use it is no sin nor crime. But the inherent character of the corpse-bearer standing in the individual form of the Hindu, will not accept the innovation all at once and in good grace, till it is a popular vehicle for the conduct of Hindu funerals.

A Hindu having no facility of modern crematoria given him by Municipal bodies, no true Sanatanist can ever have faith in the honesty of purpose of abolishing untouchability, and this particular drawback on the part of Municipal bodies is causing much annoyance and vexation.

It is obvious enough that Hindus who indirectly but heavily have to pay in the form of sumptuous funeral feasts for the uphill task of their funeral services, to be exacted from their castes, would not grudge the comparatively small bill of the civil undertaker and people would, surely and more willingly than now, attend funerals to pay their last tribute of respect to their deceased friends or relatives.

Lord Buddha, the Great Indian Reformer, lived and died a pious man, and his teachings of brotherhood and Ahimsa prevailed for a period in India, but Buddhism was finally defeated and driven out of Indian life by the conduct of Hindu funerals. Had Buddha as the great man of his time given as much attention as Lord Zoroaster did (see Zand Vendidad) towards the dead body and its bearers or, like King James I of England, advocated the humanitarian method of the conduct of funerals enjoined by Hindu Shariat in the Grahya Sutra, Hinduism would not have been what it is today, but India a solid and healthy nation.

The caste system and untouchability are relatives to each other but alien to Christianity. Yet some of the Indian Christians in South have caste because of their method of funeral conduct, which is the same as that of Hindus. When one of the disciples of Lord Jesus had asked him that, "Lord, suffer me to go and bury my father," Jesus had said unto him "let the dead bury their dead and follow me;" and the disciple had followed him. The Christian governments, at least in this the only example, have been literally following the advice of Jesus Christ to his follower, of letting the dead in India bury their dead. But whether "their dead" would prefer to ride on wheels in an age of science, so that the "dead" may be raised to the level of humanity is a question, perhaps for the anthropological society of India to discuss, but not for Indians or the government who feel restrained to interfere with such imaginary religious methods where there is no religion whatsoever but the duty of civil life.

It is said that every man in England is a king of his castle, but in India every Hindu is a slave of his caste, vis a corpse bearer, and as he has no advantage of the service of the civil undertakers, the Sadhu-Maharaj wish to serve him in the next world only. The King or Raja-Maharaj as a rule does not and cannot carry a bier and if he does, he is no more a King but a Cooly. A Cooly is a denomination earned by Indians in South Africa as a suffix, over and above the segregation laws. But it must be out of sheer politeness that Indians are not dubbed as a nation of corpse-bearers by the self-governing dominions.

Philippine Independence Bill:—The Philippine Legislature voted the acceptance of the Independence Bill passed by the United States Congress on March 24. The Bill grants independence to the Philippines within ten to twelve years.

INDIA'S FUTURE CONSTITUTION AND THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

(By Rev. J. F. EDWARDS.)

Mr. Fredrick Grubb, the able and alert General Secretary of the Anglo Indian Temperance Association in London, and other influential friends thought it advisable, as Mr. Grubb writes in a recent letter to me, to obtain from the India Office a more definite assurance that under the new Constitution the Central Government would not have the power to interfere with the discretion of the Provincial Governments in regard to the regulation or prohibition of liquor—even indirectly as a matter of finance. It was pointed out that this is a question of great importance, especially in places like Bangalore and Poona where there are Cantonments, or in cities like Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, where there is a substantial European population. Further enquiry was therefore addressed by Mr. Grubb to the Under Secretary of State (Reforms Department), India Office, asking:

Whether, under the White Paper proposals, the Provincial Governments would have power to prohibit or restrict the sale of imported liquors within their areas, irrespective of any action taken by the Federal Government in regard to the importation thereof and despite the fact that such prohibitory or restrictive legislation in the provinces might adversely affect the Central Revenues. The Under Secretary of State replied that under the proposals in their present form the Provincial Governments would have the powers indicated in the question, subject however to the over-riding authority of the Federal Government as laid down in paragraph 125 of the White Paper (page 71). 'This paragraph provides,' says Mr Grubb, 'for effect being given within a province to every act of the Federal legislature applicable to that province, and it establishes the authority of the Federal Government in giving directions to a Provincial Government for that purpose. We read that "the authority of the Federal Government will also extend to the giving of directions to a Provincial Government as to the manner in which the latter's executive power and authority shall be exercised in relation to any matter which affects the administration of Federal subjects." It may be difficult, adds Mr Grubb, 'for the ordinary reader to understand all the implications of these provisions, but they undoubtedly mean that in the last resort the Central Government would have power to prevent or suspend the enactment of prohibition if the exercise of this veto should be deemed necessary in the interests of India as a whole—although probably the intervention of the Federal Government in such a manner would only happen in exceptional circumstances.'

As this whole question is one of such wide and public interest, affecting so vitally the future of India, I share with my readers the relevant portions of a communication I have sent to London on this subject as follows:—

I have noted that the Madras Guardian contains some portions of what you wrote to me, though in your communication to me you develop several other points of interest. I note that among these are some items which show that interpretations have been put on my Memorandum of last June to the Joint Parliamentary Committee which I never intended and which I cannot but think have been read into it. And though some of these are very important and touch the heart of the subject, yet I am not so anxious about my Memorandum being misunderstood as I am that the essentials of this burning problem shall be properly appreciated. I will therefore not let myself be sidetracked into attempts at defending my point of view but will try and concentrate very briefly on essentials.

You ask do I not consider that the White Paper proposals (despite imperfections) go a long way towards giving the people of India 'effective control' so that 'they will soon make an end of the drink traffic.' I myself should have thought so, but 'the interpretation officially given to the provisions of the White Paper in this connection' by the Under Secretary of State for India Reforms Department on October 30, 1933, and his further reply a few weeks ago now reported, have greatly disturbed me. How grave the danger to India's freedom to carry out her wish regarding the extinction of the liquor traffic is all too clear from your lucid summary 'that in the last resort the Central Government would have the power to prevent or suspend the enactment of prohibition if the exercise of this veto should be deemed necessary.' Having watched the official methods on this subject for a quarter of a century at close range, I am quite unable to share your generous optimism that 'the exercise of this veto' will 'only happen in exceptional circumstances' and my reason will appear below. Your present conclusion, to which you feel you can preface the word 'undoubtedly,' regarding 'the exercise of this veto,' was quite clear to us here from the Under Secretary's reply of October 30 last year when he stated in that reply to you: 'The proposals in the White Paper in no way reduce the powers at present enjoyed by the Provincial Legislature.' Will you please remember that the present dismal situation of the drink traffic in India, carried on in open defiance of the wishes of the people constitutionally expressed on September 2, 1925, is a situation that has grown up under 'the powers at present enjoyed?' When you remember this, you will be as amazed as I am that this is the 'official' best that can be said for the constructive Temperance Reform aspect of the White Paper.

Let me recapitulate a few essentials:—

(1) Though it is a lie of uninformed critics to say that Britain introduced liquor into India, yet many of us Englishmen and Scotsmen in India feel we must cover our faces in shame at the measure of our responsibility in recent decades for deepening India's dependence on liquor revenue, continued in most recent years in teeth of the constitutionally expressed desire of India to the contrary: the sad facts are given in my two Memoranda of November 1928 and June 1933. The one sure way of bringing forth fruit worthy of our repentance just now when we are handing India over to the largest practicable scheme of self-government is for the Constitution makers in the Joint Parliamentary Committee and in Parliament to beat out such a Constitution as shall break the evil continuity of India's administrative dependence on liquor revenue whatever the cost either to Britain or India.

(2) The Constitution makers who are now hard at work should breathe into the new Constitution a wholly new attitude regarding the drink and excise problem. In order to be concrete, by a new attitude I mean such an attitude as shall mean a distinct break with the attitude that could (a) lead India's Central Government so to interpret the 1919 Act as to make foreign liquor administration and revenue the preserve of the Central Government; (b) lead that same Central Government to ignore the constitutional resolution of the popular legislature, the Legislative Assembly, on September 2, 1925, asking for local option and the gradual extinction of the liquor traffic; (c) lead the Central Government's Finance Member (Sir Basil Blackett) to discourage and threaten the Bombay Government in its praiseworthy attempts at drastic Temperance Reform; and (d) leave even the Governor General himself incompetent to allow a Prohibition Bill last summer because of Section 67 (2) of the Government of India Act; for as the Madras Guardian said, 'Whatever the merits or defects of a Prohibition policy might be, it is clear that the Government of India Act does not allow room for the national Legislature to express its views on the matter.'

(3) In light of the foregoing considerations it is quite impossible to say, as your article in The Hindu said a few months ago, that everything will depend upon the sort of people who are returned to the Councils and that 'the people of India alone will be to blame' if their wishes are not achieved regarding drink reform. What will happen if 'the powers at present enjoyed' are not immensely increased, is that popularly elected excise ministers will realize that they can not possibly administer their departments without the liquor revenue which India has pronounced as 'tainted,' and rather than starve the nation they will administer the 'tainted' revenue, thus widening the abyss between Government and people, and endangering the new Constitution from its very inception.

(4) What is needed therefore is that the people shall know, by virtue of the kind of Constitution to be installed, that they have real freedom to express their disapproval of drinkshops in their midst, knowing that if these are closed and the drink revenue lost, a method has been provided by the Constitution now being forged whereby a way will be found of ridding the Indian administration of dependence on liquor finance. I still believe that the twenty years' period indicated in my Memorandum of last June is adequate even for so momentous a task, unless indeed our British statesmanship is to be regarded as bankrupt which I refuse to believe. This is not the first stupendous moral problem wrapped up with finance that the British Government has had to solve in India. It will rebound for ever to the credit of Britain's relation to India that an arrangement has been made possible, at very heavy financial sacrifice, whereby after December 31st next year (1935) no opium exports will leave India save for scientific and medicinal purposes. That achievement was made possible within the short period of one decade by reason of a most complete change of front on the part of the Indian Government between 1924 and 1926 on the opium question. If the Government of India, instructed by the new Constitution now on the Parliamentary anvil, will show a similarly open mind on this other vital moral issue of the drink question and a similar willingness to yield to a popular demand based on reason and humanity, I believe the time-limit of two decades will be sufficient to work out the far reaching financial implications without disturbing the delicate financial equilibrium of India.

Home For Women Students:—The Home for Women Students recognised by the University of Bombay will reopen from 1st June 1934 at Laxmi Nivas, Alexandra Road, New Gamdevi, under the supervision of a Committee, some prominent members of which are Mrs. Sonabai Jayakar, President, Mrs. Sunderabai Sirur, Mrs. Shantabai Patkar, Mrs. Tarabai Manekchand, Mrs. Jayashri Rajji, Dr. Kashibai Nowrange, and Prof. Sulabha Panandikar (last two Secretaries). The three storied building now occupied is airy, spacious and situated in a respectable locality with accommodation for forty students. Diet strictly vegetarian. Intending applicants will please communicate with the Hon. Secretary, Home for Women Students, Laxmi Nivas, Alexandra Road, New Gamdevi, Bombay.

(BY GEORGE W. BRIGGS)

In the religious life of medieval India we find an interesting popular synthesis of Islamic and Hindu elements. This is especially noteworthy in the attitude of the ordinary man of both faiths toward saints of either Muslim or of Hindu origin.

Khwaja Khizr (M), for example, a saint of Islam is worshipped by Hindus who use, in addition to his primary name, both Raja Kidar (H) and Pir Bhadr (H). He is a water godling, patron saint of boatmen and protector of travellers. His emblem is the fish, which is a sort of totem of the Shiahs Muslims and was the crest of the late royal family of Oudh. In some places fertility rites are associated with him in certain festivals. He is worshipped in connection with the digging of wells. Strangely, many cycles of legends involving Alexander, Elisha, Noah, Tammuz, Adonis and Moses have gathered around Khwaja Khizr. Crooke says: "His cult is in the main an attempt by means of magic to pass away the sins or evils which menace his worshippers. This is effected by launching in a river little boats, each provided with a light and offerings."

Another example of this kind is that of Sakhi Sarwar Sultan (M), whose tomb is at Nigaha in the Dera Ghazi Khan District of the Panjab. His shrine is the resort of the afflicted and of barren women of both faiths.

Then there is the saint Ghazi Miyan (M) (Sayyid Salar Masa'ud), of Bahraich in the United Provinces, for whom an annual fair is held which is attended by multitudes of Hindus and Muslims.

Perhaps the most famous saint of the lower classes in northern India is Guga (H); now a snake godling, known as Guga Pir or Zahra Pir (M). Although originally Hindu, he became a Musalman in order that he might enter the bowels of the earth to reach the ruler of the serpent world. He is intimately associated with the famous Yogi Gorskh Nath. The annual festival which is held for him during the rainy season is known as the Chhariya Mela. This fair is named after the Chhari, or flagstaff, which is carried in his name. Among the things necessary for this worship is the "flag" which consists of a bamboo twenty or thirty feet in length, surmounted by a circle of peacock feathers and decorated with fans and flags and cocoanuts done up in cloth. Men, called Zahra Pir's "horses," carry the flags. Sometimes these "horses" are Yogis, often Musalman Yogis.

There is an interesting group of five saints, the Panch or Pach Pir, which is worshiped in northern India almost as a unit. While the five who make up the group vary with locality, the company is always a mixed one, partly of Hindu, partly of Muslim, saints.

The shrines of these saints are visited indiscriminately by multitudes of both faiths, seeking for blessings of many kinds.

Baba Farid-ud-Din Shakarganj (M), possessor of the magic and, renowned for his great powers, was associated with ascetics of the Hindu community, particularly with the Yogis.

This relationship introduces us to another phase of the popular synthesis, that in which Yogis widely known bear both Hindu and Muslim names. For example, Gopi Chand (H), the famous prince of eastern Bengal, who became a Yogi of renown and who is celebrated in legends from Bengal through the Panjab to Sind, lived much in the north and west of India. In Sind he is known as Datar Jamil Shah (M).

On the other hand, Muslims under the influence of great ascetics entered the ranks of the Yogis, and continued to be both Hindu ascetics and Musalmans. The Jafir Pirs are counted as a division of the Kanphata Yogis as are others known as Pir Jogis. Hindu Yogis do not eat with these ascetics.

A note of rivalry may be found in the zeal with which both Hindus and Muslims have insisted upon possessing the bodies of the same dead saints for disposal by burial or cremation. The Daryapanth is a division of the Kanphata Yogis with many members in Sind and with establishments at Makhad, Kohat and Quetta, beyond the Indus. Their sacred seat is at Uderolal in Sind, at the tomb of an infant who transformed himself into an armed bowman and emerged from the Indus to rebuke the Muslim Md. Yusuf of Tatta. He is known as Uderolal (H), Dulanlal (H), Amarial (H), Zinda Pir (M) and Darya Shah (M). At his shrine in Uderolal a lamp is kept burning perpetually and at the new moon he is worshiped at the river, or near water, with rice, sugar-candy, spices, fruit and lighted lamps. About 50,000 attend the annual religious feast at this place. He left the world by disappearing into the ground. There was a dispute between Hindus and Muslims as to the disposal of his body by cremation or burial. He reappeared and commanded them to use both methods. Consequently, there are both a tomb and a temple at the place.

A well-known disciple of Bhartrhari was Ratanath of Peshawar. This yogi belongs to a group who do not wear the usual insignia of their sect. He is held in high esteem by Musalmans. Ratanath is famous for having created a boy out of dirt from off his body. This boy was afterwards known as Kayanath (H) and as Qaimtut Din (M). When Kayanath died, both Musalmans and Hindus claimed his body; but it disappeared, only the clothes remaining. Hindus built a samadhi for him and Muslims a tomb.

These reports remind one of the legend describing the dispute over the body of Kabir.

The most notable all the aspects of this popular synthesis is to be found in the careers of Kabir and Nanak. The latter was greatly indebted to the former. In the main Nanak's religious convictions were the same as those of Kabir. His views may be briefly summarized after the account of Doctor Farquhar. Nanak had associated with numerous teachers both Hindus and Muslim, was acquainted with Persian, Hindi and Panjabi and was familiar with the writing of the Sufis. He wandered all over north India proclaiming his doctrines. For him Islam and Hinduism were two paths, there being but one God. The influence of Islam may be seen in this belief in one eternal, spiritual God to be worshiped from the heart and not with images; in his position that men of all castes and races could know and love God; in that the life of the householder rather than that of the ascetic is praised; and in the great emphasis laid upon the moral side of religion. On the other hand, elements of mysticism appear; the doctrines of karma and samsara and the conception of maya are held; the guru remains important; and it is insisted that release brings union with God, or rather absorption, in which individuality is lost. Nanak retained the whole Hindu pantheon.

Although Nanak founded the religion of the Sikhs, a movement persecuted by Aurangzeb and later absorbed into Hinduism, still his predecessor, Kabir, is the better representative of the popular synthesis of the two religions. His influence is more widely diffused and more potent. "His best utterances are probably the loftiest work in the Hindi language; and hundreds of his couplets have laid hold of the common heart of Hindustan." He is the widest known and the most influential of all the medieval saints of the north, and his sententious religious and devotional verses are still the common property of all the villages of northern India.

*From The Orison Quarterly. The writer indicates names of Hindu origin by (H) and those of Muslim origin by (M).

Kabir became both a Bhakta through Ramananda and a Pir through a Sufi; and, although he was severe on both in his utterances and was much persecuted, he was claimed by both communities.

Farquhar's words may be transcribed: In the life of Kabir the two religions mingled. The strongest elements of each laid hold of him and formed his thought, the Sufi conviction that all ordinary religions are but forms dictating his general attitude to the two faiths...The groundwork of his system of beliefs is Hindu; for he accepts transmigration and Karma, and thus stands within the circle of Indian rather than Islamic thought. A further catalogue of Hindu ideas might be compiled—Brahman, maya, lila, release, detachment, cessation from works, "He is I."—but most of these coincide or almost coincide with Sufi conceptions; so that a number of them may be regarded as common ground. On the other hand, he denounces idolatry as foolish, false and wrong, declares divine incarnation impossible and laughs at the forms of asceticism as silly practices. Here Islam rules. Kabir belonged to two religious communities, and so it came about when he died at Magha that his body was claimed by both Muslims and Hindus. According to the Bhakta Mala, religionists of both groups desired to dispose of the body according to their own distinctive rites. At the end of a dispute over the body, when they lifted the cloth which covered it, they found only a heap of fragrant flowers, khushbudar phul. These were divided between the two parties. Musalmans buried theirs at Maghar; the Hindus took their portion to Benares, where they burned them. Hence we have a tomb of Kabir at Maghar and a shrine at Kabir Chaura, in Benares.

The popular synthesis in religion in Northern India has been illustrated by the worship of saints of diverse religious origin by the masses of both communities; by the application of names characteristic of two faiths to the same saint regardless of his origin; by wandering ascetics taking on names identified with both cultures; by Muslims in Hindu ascetic orders; and by men teaching a composite faith emphasizing the cardinal points in the two religions from which it is derived, men claimed by both communities even unto death and burial.

Justice:—The Sanyidani informs us, writes the Indian Messenger, that there is a small village in Vikram-pur known as Malogaon. The inhabitants of this village are all Mahommadans with five or six Hindu families in their midst. On the night of 18th April a few Mussalman ruffians entered the house of a Hindu and forcibly carried away a girl of fourteen. Her cries brought some Mussalman neighbours to her rescue. The wicked men let her alone and fled away. Next morning a village Panchayet composed of Mussalman leaders and Hindus was held. The Hindus left the whole question to the Mussalman leaders who decided that the culprits should be punished with a fine of Rs. 10/- each, should be beaten with shoes fifty times and should call the oppressed girl their mother by touching her feet. All these punishments were carried out to the letter then and there.

INDIAN EMIGRATION TO MALAYA.

The decision of the Government of India after consultation with the Government of Madras and the Standing Emigration Committee of the two houses of the Indian legislature and with their consent to reopen the non-recruited assisted emigration to Malaya is contained in a communique issued by the Government of India in the Education, Health and Lands Departments. The communique states:—

As to the result of depression in rubber industry the emigration of unskilled labourers from South India to Malaya was stopped in August 1930. The stoppage of emigration and the measure taken to repatriate those labourers who could not find work on suitable terms had the effect of preventing unemployment and steadying wages. In December 1932 the Malayan Government represented to the Government of India that not only had a practical equilibrium been reached between the supply and demand for labour in Malaya but that an acute shortage was likely to occur if there were sharp rise in price of rubber and the consequent revival of the industry.

In November 1933 the Malayan Government sent to India a deputation consisting of the controller of labour in Malaya, chairman of the planter association and the emigration commissioner for Malaya in Madras. This deputation interviewed the Standing Emigration Committee of the two houses of the Indian legislature and explained that owing to the very large repatriation that had taken place since 1930 it was apprehended that the existing supply of labour in Malaya may be unequal to the demand owing to a revival in rubber industry which was expected as the result of improving prices and that an urgent decision on the request of Malayan Government for a renewal of emigration was called for.

Inquiries as to the need for fresh emigration to Malaya in order to supplement the supply of labour have been initiated on the receipt of the request of the Malayan Government for a renewal of the immigration into Malaya and inquiries were also made from the Government of Madras as to whether there was any desire amongst the people of the presidency to emigrate to that country. These inquiries revealed both the existence of the demand for labour in Malaya and the desire for emigration from Madras presidency to those territories. After consultation with the Government of Madras and the Standing Emigration Committee of the two houses of Indian legislature and with their consent the Government of India have accordingly decided that non-recruited assisted emigration to Malaya should be re-opened.

In order, however, to ensure that this does not lead to an over-supply of labour with a consequent depressing effect upon the level of wages in Malaya and possible unemployment they have also decided that emigration shall be subject to the following:— (1) Fresh emigration shall be restricted to 20,000 in first year, (2) emigrant shall be repatriated free any time within two years of his arrival in Malaya on reasonable grounds, for example ill-health, unsuitability of work, treatment and inability to find work at the standard rates of wages. Even after the expiration of two years repatriation would be allowed if conditions justify this.

It has also been arranged that the emigration commissioner for Malaya in Madras shall supply the local Government monthly reports about the conditions of employment and that the statements of information supplied to intending emigrants be corrected as frequently as circumstances may require. By this means it is hoped that only those persons will emigrate who consider the conditions of employment in Malaya to be adequate.

THE BOMBAY VIGILANCE ASSOCIATION.

The Committee of the Bombay Vigilance Association remark in their eleventh annual report of the Association for the year 1932 :—

This year has been a comparatively quiet one in the sense that there were no disturbances in the City like those last year and the Association was able to steadily continue its activities. The difficulties such as insufficient Police force, congestion in the Courts, delay in disposing of the cases instituted under the Amended Prostitution Act, mentioned in our previous reports, were unfortunately not removed during the year under report. If these difficulties had been obviated, the Amended Prostitution Act would have been worked more effectively.

There were other difficulties also. Some of the provisions of the Act, especially those concerning the landlords, have become ineffective as it is found difficult to prove to the satisfaction of the Courts that the landlords or their agents knowingly let out the premises for the purposes of conducting brothels.

The importance of the Act, however, cannot be minimised. In spite of all these difficulties much useful work was done by the Association and the improvement recorded in the previous year was continued during the year under review. Our worker paid special attention to the traffickers and procurers who have been doing this business for years under some pretence in the localities outside the brothel area and some of them were brought to book.

The Report of the Commission of Inquiry into traffic in women and children in the East appointed by the Council of the League of Nations was published during the year. In regard to India the Commission says, "As far as the information gathered by the Commission goes, British India is not a country from which women and children are taken abroad for immoral purposes nor do women go from this country abroad on their own initiative for such purposes. There seems to be a movement of traffic into British India from Iraq, Persia, China, Japan and Europe, although not to a very great extent from any of these countries. From the Portuguese possessions in India—chiefly from Goa—a number of prostitutes were said to come to the Bombay Presidency." The Commission has found that regulation of brothels increases and facilitates prostitution. They further say, "The most effective remedy against the evil, therefore, in the Commission's opinion, is the abolition of licensed or recognised brothels."

This is a view which our Association has all along emphasised and we trust that those who are still doubtful of our policy will be convinced from the findings of the Commission that the line of work adopted by this Association is the correct one.

Rao Bahadur S. K. Bole has introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council a Bill to prevent the dedication of women to service in temples. We are in complete sympathy with the principle of the Bill and if it is passed into an Act, it will effectively stop one of the sources of recruitment of prostitutes. These women are found in large numbers, not only in Bombay City, but in district towns and in a number of villages in the Presidency.

During the year under review the Municipal Corporation asked its Medical Relief and Public Health Committee to report on the question whether Government should be moved to take necessary measures for the removal of prostitutes from Foras Road, Sukhlaji Street and the area round about. On the request from this Committee to send its views on the matter, the Association wrote to them as follows :—

fame which are a standing menace to the health and morality of the people and constitute a blot on the civic life of the people. It is not, however, clear whether the object of the proposal pending before the Committee is merely to clear the area of the nuisance or whether it is intended that the women concerned should be moved from this area to another locality or localities considered suitable for the purpose. If, as it appears to our Council, the intention is to move these women or suffer them to move to less objectionable areas, our Council would point out that the Bombay Prostitution Act, as amended, gives the authorities power to take measures for the abolition of brothels. The Corporation have expressed themselves in favour of this policy and if they now entertain a proposal which, if accepted, would lead to the transfer of the existing plague spot from one centre to another, it would be a departure from the accepted policy of abolition and would strengthen the hands of those who advocate a policy of segregation and regulation without fully realising the implications and disadvantages of such a policy. It might also indirectly commit the Corporation to such a policy.

"The Bombay Vigilance Association stands for the suppression of traffic in women and girls by which third parties make profit. It has, therefore, consistently advocated the abolition of all brothels although having regard to the practical difficulties in the way of closing down all such houses of ill-fame, it has acquiesced in their closing down by stages. The demand is practically made that instead of closing down the houses in the tolerated areas and turning the inmates adrift all over the City, Government should aim at segregation and regulation. Sometimes segregation is advocated merely with a view to avoiding the nuisance in any particular locality.

"The Association is positively against the maintenance of a tolerated vice area within or outside the limits of the City, as it considers that a tolerated vice area is :—

- (a) a flaunting advertisement of vice;
- (b) a constant menace to the morality of young persons;
- (c) a danger alike to foreigners and residents in the City;
- (d) A festering sore of venereal disease; and
- (e) A regular market where women and girls are bought and sold and subjected to vile and cruel treatment.

"Recent investigations made in several countries in Europe have shown that countries which were once regulationists have recently introduced legislation to abolish the system, not only because it has to be condemned on grounds of public order but also because it neither regulates vice nor lowers the incidence of venereal disease. To suggest that a particular vice area in Bombay should be cleared of brothels and the evil transferred to or allowed to be transferred to another locality appears to the Council of the Association to be an absolutely retrograde step and altogether repugnant to the policy now pursued by the other countries of the world.

"One of the strongest objections to the existence of a tolerated vice area is that it gives a semblance of approval by the State and the public to the perpetuation of the slave market in the cities and of the traffic in women and girls. It is inconceivable that the moral conscience of a civilised community can ever possibly look unconcerned on a regular, brutal and brutalising traffic in thousands of unfortunate women.

"The Prevention of Prostitution Act, as amended, declares brothel-keeping to be illegal. It follows, therefore, that it would be a breach of the provisions of this Act, nay, a virtual abrogation of that Act, if the civic authorities and Government participate in a movement to move prostitutes and transfer a certain number of brothels from one locality to another. The Council of the Association is confident that the Municipal Corporation of Bombay will never agree to any such proposal."

A deputation consisting of Mr. R. P. Masani, Mr. A. J. Gibbs and Mr. P. J. Shroff was also sent to discuss the matter further with the Committee. We are glad that the Medical Relief and Public Health Committee accepted the views of the Association.

The Shelter has been in existence since 1926 and forms an integral part of the work done by the Association. In this, women found in trouble, victimized, helpless, stranded or suffering from V.D., are housed, cared for and assisted to rehabilitate themselves in the community after they are cured.

The number of girls in the Shelter on 31st January 1933, as mentioned in the last year's Report, was 12 girls and one child. During the year 46 girls and one child were admitted into the Shelter and 51 girls and two children left it, leaving 7 girls at the end of the year.

Of the girls who were in the Shelter during the year under review 28 were born at places outside the Bombay Presidency, 27 were born in the Bombay Presidency and 3 in Bombay City. Of these, 26 girls were unmarried, 23 married and 9 widows. They were admitted into the Shelter for various reasons and the majority of them were found in such dangerous circumstances that, but for the timely help given by the Association, their life would have been ruined.

The majority of the girls admitted into the Shelter were suffering from V. D. Girls suffering from this disease were also sent to us by other Rescue Homes which have no arrangement for their treatment. Two such cases, one from the Hindu Women's Rescue Home and the other from the St. Catherine's Rescue Home, were sent to our Shelter for treatment. One of them was cured of V. D. after receiving treatment for five months and was sent back. The other is still under treatment. There were many other girls who were suffering from either physical or mental diseases. There is hardly a girl admitted into the Shelter who is healthy and without any disease. The first thing done, therefore, when a girl is admitted to the Shelter is to get her medically examined. If she is found suffering from any disease, continuous medical treatment is given to her till she is declared to be completely cured. These cases, whether suffering from V. D. or other disease, were generally sent to the J. J. Hospital. Serious cases were kept in the Hospital for indoor treatment and others were regularly sent there for outdoor treatment. Though care is always taken to send the girls to Hospital as soon as we find that they are not well, in some cases, owing to sudden illness, it becomes impossible to send or remove them to Hospital. In such rare but very urgent cases we require the help and advice of some medical man.

Marriages of four inmates were arranged during the year and inquiry at the end of the year showed that they were happy. All the four were rescue cases.

Girls were sent to work after careful inquiry of the family as it is found by experience that some places are not safe for such girls, some do not pay the salary regularly and some ill-treat them. More than half the number of girls sent to their relatives were sent out of Bombay. Many of the old inmates who stay in Bombay pay visits to the Shelter occasionally and report their condition.

The girls stay in the Shelter for a short time. It is not possible, therefore, to give them satisfactory training in any handicraft, some of them are continually ill, many of them suffering from contagious diseases which prevent us from giving them much work. The rest are given cooking and house work. Some of the illiterate girls, however, were taught to read and write and instruction in sewing and embroidery work was also given to some.

DEDICATION OF WOMEN TO IDOLS OR TEMPLES.

The Bombay Council Select Committee on the bill to prevent the dedication of women to service in Hindu temples in the Presidency have issued their report which is signed by Messrs. R. D. Bell, G. Davis, P. G. Solanki, R. M. Maxwell, S. K. Bole, R. V. Vandrekar, B. S. Kamat, R. R. Kale (subject to a minute of dissent) and P. R. Chikodi. The signature of Mr. V. N. Jog will be notified when received. The report states :—

"We, the members of the Select Committee appointed to consider the bill to prevent the dedication of women in service in Hindu temples in the Bombay Presidency, report as follows :—

"We have carefully considered the provisions of the Bill and have made certain changes as explained in the following paragraphs :—

"We understand that the ceremony by which a woman is dedicated to a life of prostitution sometimes takes the form of dedication to a deity, idol, or object of worship, as well as to a temple or other religious institution. Therefore to carry out the purpose of the Bill, which is to prevent the dedication of young women to a life of prostitution in the ostensible service of religion, we have altered the definition of the word "devadasi" to include unmarried women dedicated to Hindu deities, idols, objects of worship, temples or other religious institutions. We also understand that women so dedicated are not necessarily Hindus and that they are not invariably required to perform services. We have, therefore, considered it desirable to omit from the definition of the word "devadasi" the word "Hindu," which qualified the words "unmarried woman," and the words "to service." Similar changes have been made in the preamble of the Bill.

"The definition of the word "temple" as included in the original Bill was sufficiently wide to include places of worship other than those of the Hindus. We have redrafted the definition so as to restrict it to places of religious worship dedicated to or used by the Hindu community. We have also added a definition of the word "woman."

"In Clause 3 of the Bill, we have omitted the words "within the precincts of a temple or outside" as being unnecessary, and have added the words "any custom or rule of Hindu Law notwithstanding." We have substituted the word "unlawful" for the word "illegal," as the provision in Clause 5 makes the dedication of devadasis punishable as an offence.

"In Clause 5 of the Bill, we have provided that the woman to be dedicated should not be punishable under this clause as the Bill is directed against these who commit an offence against the woman.

"We have omitted Clause 6 of the original Bill as it is unnecessary by reason of the provisions of Section 27 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904.

"We have entirely redrafted Clause 7 of the original Bill which was copied from the Madras Act V of 1929 and which is not particularly appropriate to conditions in the Bombay Presidency and we have numbered the redrafted clause as Clause 6.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 1933]

"We have made it clear in this clause that notwithstanding the provisions of Act XI of 1852, Bombay Acts 11 and VII of 1863 and the rules made thereunder or the terms of any grant made or sanad issued by Government, the Collector shall release any land assigned as emoluments for the purpose of any service by a devadasi as such from liability to the performance of such service, but as the purpose of the Bill is to prevent the dedication of women as devadasis and not to punish those women already dedicated, we have provided that if a woman who is a devadasi at the time when this Act comes into force, wishes to continue to hold land as a devadasi the order releasing the land from service and directing rent in lieu thereof to be paid shall be postponed during her lifetime. As the enquiry held by the Collector under the provisions of this clause will be a simple enquiry, we think it sufficient to provide that details of procedure should be prescribed by rules.

"We have, where the drafting is defective, made the necessary alterations."

Minute of dissent by Rao Bahadur R. R. Kale:—

"As observed by me in my speech on the first reading of the Bill, Clause 7 of the original Bill was copied from the Madras Act V of 1929. I agree that it is not appropriate to conditions in the Bombay Presidency and therefore it should be replaced by another provision as redrafted and numbered as Clause 6. But since the release of land, involving alteration of rights and obligations, is to be governed by rules to be made hereafter, I think it fair that the Rules to be framed should be subject to the condition of previous publication and laying before the Legislative Councils. A clause to the effect is necessary to be added to Clause 7 of the Bill as amended by the Select Committee."

THE AMENDED BILL

The Bill as amended reads:—

A Bill to protect devadasis and to prevent the dedication of women to Hindu deities, idols, objects of worship, temples and religious institutions in the Bombay Presidency.

Whereas the practice of dedicating women as devadasis to Hindu deities, idols, objects of worship, temples or other religious institutions exists in the Bombay Presidency;

And whereas such practice, however ancient and pure its origin, now leads such women to a life of prostitution;

And whereas it is now desirable and expedient to end such practice, wherever it exists in the Bombay Presidency;

And whereas the previous sanction of the Governor-General required by Section 80 A (3) and of the Governor required by Section 80 C of the Government of India Act have been obtained for the passing of this Act; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Bombay Devadasis Protection Act, 1934. (2) It extends to the whole of the Bombay Presidency.

2. "In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context:—(a) "devadasi" means any unmarried woman who is dedicated to any Hindu deity, idol, object of worship, temple or other religious institution; (b) "temple" means a place by whatever designation known, dedicated to, or used by, the Hindu community, or any section thereof, as a place of religious worship; and (c) "woman" means a female human being of any age.

3. The performance of any ceremony intended to dedicate or having the effect of dedicating a woman as a devadasi, whether such woman has or has not consented to the performance of such ceremony, is hereby declared unlawful and to be of no effect, any custom or rule of Hindu Law to the contrary notwithstanding.

4. No marriage contracted by a woman shall be invalid and no issue of such marriage shall be illegitimate by reason of such woman being a devadasi, any custom or rule of Hindu Law to the contrary notwithstanding.

5. Whoever, other than the women to be dedicated, performs, permits, takes part in or abets the performance of any ceremony referred to in Section 3, shall, on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine or with both.

6. (1) Notwithstanding any adjudication or settlement made under the Bombay Rent-free Estates Act, 1852 (No. 1) Act, 1868, Land-revenue (No. 1) Act, 1863, and the Exemptions from Land-revenue (No. 2) Act, 1863, or rules made thereunder, or the terms of any grant made or sanad issued by Government, when lands are assigned as emoluments for the performance by a devadasi of any services as such, the Collector shall, after holding such inquiry as may be prescribed, by order in writing, direct that the land shall be released from liability for performance of such services and that there shall be paid by the holder of such land in lieu of such services such rent as the Collector shall determine in the prescribed manner:—

Provided that if a woman who is a devadasi at the time when this Act comes into force, is the holder of such land or performs services as a devadasi for which such land is assigned and appears at such inquiry or gives notice in the prescribed manner and objects to the lease of the land and the payment of rent under the provisions of this section the Collector shall pass orders directing that the land shall not be released and rent shall not be payable under this section during the lifetime of such devadasi.

(2) Rent directed to be paid under sub-section (1) shall, when the performance of such services is for the benefit of a Hindu deity, idol, object of worship, temple or other religious institution, be payable by the holder to or on account of such deity, idol, object of worship, temple or other religious institution and in other cases to Government.

Explanation.—Land shall have the same meaning as defined in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879.

7. Government may make rules generally for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act and in particular for the manner in which the Collector shall hold an inquiry and determine the rent under Section 6 and the manner in which notice of objection shall be given under the said section.

Nair Marriage Dissolved:—The District Munsif of Palghat, Mr. T. M. Nedungadi pronounced orders dissolving the marriage of Mr. A. Vasu Nair, musician of Pudukkottai village, in Palghat with Sri. Nanikutli Amma, his wife. Petitioner was married to the respondent some eight years ago and when Act 21 of 38—the Madras Marumakkathayam Law—came into force in August last petitioner took advantage of Clause 7 of the Act and prayed for a dissolution of the marriage, giving 6 months' notice as required by law, on the ground of incompatibility of temperament. This is the first case instituted in these parts under the new Marumakkathayam Law.

THE PSALM OF THE CALCUTTA CORPORATION.

The following is the English translation of the proposed address to Mahatma Gandhi by the Calcutta Corporation in connexion with his forthcoming visit to the city :

"Noble Sir,

You have set foot again in this our land of Bengal, crowned with the glory of your fame that has spread to the uttermost limits of the horizon. Oh, Wanderer without fetters ! On this holy day will the citizens of the mighty city of Calcutta have the good fortune of securing initiation into the Mantra that surely removes all bonds. Therefore, has this assembly of citizens come together to lay their homage at your altar.

The ideal of self-sacrifice, without any precedent that you have set us in this world, as the leader of India's fight for freedom, will live for ever in the heart of the people of Bengal.

You have brought back from self-forgetfulness, this fair land of India, and made her realise now, that the only true conquest is the conquest of the spirit, that self-restraint is the foundation of self-development, and that realisation is to be attained only through self-abnegation. This message of victory will remain engrained in the hearts of Indians for ever, like inscriptions on imperishable stone.

You have trampled under your feet all meanness, and the hatred and narrowness begotten of communal feelings. Oh, Preacher of Equality, upholder of truth, you have poured a fresh stream of vitality into the evanescent flow of Indian life, by uniting in a common bond, the divided Hindus and Musalmans, through the call for unity on your Sankha that speaks of peace and goodwill.

You love the poor like your children; therefore, to know poverty, you have made yourself a beggar and a wanderer. You are the friend of those who are oppressed by society. You are determined to raise them up, even though you are weary with fatigue, persecution and agony of the soul.

Oh Saint, who has renounced all things ! Oh, Beggar with only a loin cloth ! Oh, Friend of the World ! Oh, Great One ! The prayer of our heart is, may the path of your progress to the realisation of that almost impossible goal, for reaching which you have retired into yourself after utter renunciation, be rid of all uncertainty and impediments.

Oh, seeker after immortal life through death, Oh, Seer, who has set out on a difficult quest, bless us, by accepting our tribute of devotion. Bande Mataram."

Temple Entry Bill:—The General Secretary of the Social Service League, Bombay, has addressed a letter to the Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department, on the subject of the Hindu Temple Entry Disabilities Removal Bill. The League fully sympathises with the object of the bill and says a measure of this kind was necessary in view of the great change that has taken place recently in the attitude of the Hindu community towards the section consisting of the so-called 'Untouchables' castes. The law has recognized certain Hindu customs and practices and the notions underlying those customs and practices. These mostly belong to a bygone age and many of them are being constantly challenged on the grounds of justice and equity. It is held by the enlightened section of the Hindu community, the latter proceeds, that the part of the Hindu religion which has little to do with the eternal verities, and especially with the principles of ethics generally acceptable to all religions, is not an essential part of Hinduism and thus is subject to change from time to time in accordance with the progress of thought and the change of circumstances.

NOTES

Stones and Glass Houses:—In his annual address to the Millowners' Association of Bombay, the Chairman, Mr. H. P. Mody bitterly complained of the vilification to which he has been subjected owing to his connection, in his official capacity, with the so-called Mody-Lees Pact which has been endorsed by Government and embodied in a statute. He will have the sympathy of every fair-minded person. The outburst against him frequently transgressed the limits of good taste and bordered on vulgar vituperation. The Pact is open to criticism both on the ground of constitutional propriety and economic policy. The faction-fight among British politicians has thrown some light on the origin and purpose of the Lancashire delegation. The unprecedented onslaught on Mr. Mody was obviously inspired by rival interests. To some extent it was due to his own method of controversy. Even in the present address, he gave proof of the advocate's tendency to attack and discredit his opponent rather than to plead his cause on its merits. The mill workers who have gone on strike, have done so, according to him, not because they have grievances but because they are set up by men who want to destroy property and disturb the public peace. We have had occasion to meet some of these men recently and they did not seem to be more intent on these objects than Mr. Mody himself. Their views about "Capitalism," may not be the same as Mr. Mody's, but that is their own affair. Then, again, he referred to some Society or Association "which concerns itself with the regeneration of Hindu Widows" and which passed a resolution condemning the Mody-Lees Pact. We had not come across this piece of news but, doubtless, Mr. Mody's information is right. But the Association for the regeneration of Hindu Widows may retort that an Association for the Regeneration of Cotton Manufacturers had no business to negotiate for support (as they claim to have done) for the White Paper which has few supporters in this country. The old saying about glass houses, is a very useful one to remember.

The Congress Caucus:—While it is possible to appreciate the loyalty to the Congress which has led the leaders of the short-lived Swaraj party to acquiesce in the decision of the All India Congress Committee at Patna, to set up a Committee of its own to deal with electioneering questions, it is difficult to understand the loud satisfaction professed by them at the sentence of extinction, which it really is, on their Party. When it was formed at Delhi a few weeks ago, Dr. Ansari, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai and Dr. B. C. Roy went to Patna to obtain the "blessings" of Gandhiji for their enterprise. They accepted what they got as "blessings" and were to all appearance prepared to get along with their plans without further parley. The All India Congress Committee, however, has upset their apple-cart. It decided that the Swaraj Party as an independent Party should not exist or exist in a state of suspended animation, that the Congress ban on Council entry should be lifted, and that a Committee of the Congress should be entrusted not only with the electioneering work but with power of control of the members elected in the Legislatures to the extent of recalling them whenever it liked. This is what a caucus usually does and the dangers of caucus-ridden politics are wellknown. The door is thus bolted against non-Congressmen who had thoughts of seeking election as Swarajists. This is not a bad thing but this was not precisely what the Swaraj Party started to do. There may be more behind these proceedings than the public has been permitted to know and it may be that it is really the end which the Swarajist leaders hoped to gain by starting as a separate party in Delhi.

The Communal Award:—The so-called Communal Award has become the Asses' Bridge of Indian Politics. The Award was made by the Prime Minister at the invitation of the Indian Delegates to the Second Round Table Conference, including Gandhiji, who were unable to come to an agreement among themselves. Gandhiji says that he made his acceptance of it conditional on all communities accepting it. Gandhiji by his Fast got the Prime Minister to modify the Award on the lines of the Poona Pact drawn up by himself so far as the provisions relating to the representation of the depressed classes was concerned. However that may be, the Award has met with opposition from Hindus and Sikhs while Muslims accept it under a show of protest, and the Depressed Classes and the Harijan Seva Sangh people are committed to its acceptance as, if the Award goes, the Poona Pact goes with it. Owing to this irreconcilable difference, some gentlemen who, on Sir Chimanlal Setalvad's invitation, met to consider the possibility of convening an All Parties Conference to formulate criticisms of the White Paper proposals, decided to leave out the Communal Award from its scope. For this they were severely criticised. At Patna, however, the same thing was done. The newly appointed Congress Parliamentary Board is faced at the outset with the difficult problem of reconciling diametrically opposite views held by its leading members.

Government Ban on Congress:—What will the Government do? They have now all that they wanted. Civil Disobedience has been called off. Its reservation as a theoretically sound weapon should not concern Government. Nor should Gandhiji's personal exemption from the suspension of Civil Disobedience be made a reason for continuing the ban on Congress activities. In fact, unless the ban is raised and Congress free to function, the verdict of the country not on the Government's policy but as to what the country's policy should be in future, can not be clearly obtained. This is a greater disadvantage to Government than to the Congress. So long as the Party which has been officially acknowledged as the principal political organization in the country, is forcibly prevented from moving hand or foot in any direction, it is idle to pretend that the results of the next election would reflect the country's feeling.

The New Madras Governor:—Lord Erskine has been appointed Governor of Madras in succession to Sir George Stanley who is now acting as Governor-General when his term expires some months hence. The Governor designate is of the same age as Lord Brabourne and the late Lord Curzon when he was appointed to the Viceroyalty. Some newspaper correspondents, for want of anything better to say, have commented rather deprecatingly on the youth of Lord Erskine. Lord Curzon was a youth in the same sense but he was, perhaps, the ablest of the men who held the position of Governor-General since the Mutiny. Bombay is not finding Lord Brabourne's youth a serious handicap. There is no reason why Lord Erskine should prove inadequate for Madras on account of his youth. After all, at 39 men are not suckling infants. If the newly appointed Governors do not let themselves be intimidated by the elderly gentlemen of the Indian Civil Service who are their legally constituted custodians, they may prove as good Governors as any of their elderly predecessors. There is an incident reported of Lord Curzon which, whether true or not, is appropriate in this connection. At an important Educational Conference at which Lord Curzon presided, a veteran somewhat pompously referred to his experience as being opposed to some suggestion of his Excellency's. "Mr. So and So," interrupted the Viceroy, "I am here to correct your experience and not to conform to it."

Marriage and Conversion:—The want of a simple Civil Marriage law in this country is reducing religious profession to a ridiculous farce. The story comes from Calcutta of a Persian who became a convert to Christianity in order to marry an Anglo-Indian woman. After the birth of a child, he went to Teheran from where he wrote to her that he had married a girl of his own nationality and that, therefore, she need not join him in Persia as she was about to do. The poor woman committed suicide. Such an occurrence might have taken place even if the parties had been civilly married. But there would have been no need for a change of faith, and religion would have had no part in this squalid affair. At Nathiagalli on the North Western Frontier the young son of a Danish Medical Missionary aged 8, and a Danish nurse, were brutally murdered by a convert because, it was said, he would not allow the man for good reasons no doubt, to marry a Christian girl. The motive of conversion in this as in the Calcutta case was marriage not religion. A Civil Marriage Act would protect religion from such gross abuse.

Lord Willingdon's Holiday:—A friend calls our attention to the provision in the warrant of appointment of the acting Viceroy that Sir George Stanley is to hold the office till Lord Willingdon returns or until his successor is appointed. Probably it is a formality. We do not know if such a provision existed in previous warrants of a similar character. In view, however, of the rumoured differences between Lord Willingdon and the British Cabinet, our friend is disposed to attach some significance to this clause. It must be a very serious difference which can oblige his lordship to relinquish his high office before his time. As likely as not, Lord Willingdon may return with an extension in his pocket.

Another Bloodless Revolution:—The Balkans are advancing. In the beginning of this century a gang of army conspirators hunted the King and Queen of Serbia round the rooms of their palace, shot them down like dogs and threw the dead bodies out of the window. This time they have done better. They took possession of the King of Bulgaria, ordered the Police to dismiss the Ministers and appoint others, and took control of the administration without firing a single shot or stabbing a single woman. This is one of the two non-violent revolutions of our time, the other being the Siamese revolution staged two years ago.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, MAY 26, 1934.

INDIAN SOCIALISM.

While much attention has been paid in the Press to the discussions and decision of the All India Congress Committee meeting at Patna about the Swaraj Party and council entry, the proceedings of the Conference of Socialists which was held there at about the same time have passed almost unnoticed. This is unfortunate because the Socialists represent an idea whereas the Swarajists stand only for a tactic. Not only that, but the Socialists are many of them young men full of enthusiasm for their cause. The Swarajists have no faith in entering Councils. The Swarajist leader, Dr. Ansari, has expressed sympathy with the Socialists' cause but has not supported it as the present constituencies are likely to look askance at their programme. It is clear that the Socialists are the coming party in the Congress and it is, therefore, necessary to examine their demands carefully. At the Conference held at Patna a resolution was adopted embodying their demands. We follow the report in the Indian Nation of Patna which has been revived after a period of suspension. The Socialists desire, first, the transfer of all power to the producing masses. They desire, secondly, the development of the economic life of the country to be planned and controlled by the State. Their third demand is, socialization of the key and principal industries, for example, steel, cotton, jute, railways, shipping, mines, banks and public utilities, with a view to progressive socialisation of all instruments of production, distribution and exchange. State monopoly of foreign trade stand fourth on the Indian Socialist programme. The fifth item, organisation of co-operatives for production, distribution and credit in the unsocialized section of economic life, is not so clearly defined as the preceding items. Elimination of Princes, landlords and all other classes of exploiters, ranks sixth on the list. Seventh in order is redistribution of land to the peasants. The eighth demand is that the State should encourage and promote co-operation and collective farming with a view to ultimate collectivism of all agriculture in the country. Liquidation of debts owing by peasants and workers, stands ninth on the list. The tenth declares "to every one according to his needs with the basis ultimately of distribution and economic good." The eleventh and last lays down that there shall be adult franchise which shall be on a functional basis. The Sun (Bombay) gave a list which contained gradual equalisation of all incomes, as one of the demands. This is not found in the Nation's fuller report. Then, again, there is no mention of the abolition of private property.

That the Socialists do not expect all their points to be realised at once, is evident from the frequent and recurring use of such words as 'progressive' and 'ultimate' with reference to their attainment. They evidently accept the Fabian maxim of gradualism. Their demand for 'liquidation' of the debts of peasants and workers, and the provision for a section of economic life remaining unsocialised, show that Indian socialists are not prepared to go the whole distance with the only existing Socialist State which is obviously the model on which they have planned a good part of their edifice. This is what we should have expected from the independent and intelligent leaders of the Party. Where they have gone rather astray, is that they have not related to Indian conditions the plan which they wish to introduce for the benefit of the Indian people. For instance, they speak of the redistribution of land to peasants. This is very much like carrying coals to Newcastle. India is a land of peasants and redistribution of land among them has no meaning unless it is intended to take the lands of peasants in one area and distribute it to peasants in another area, in exchange for their own. Some such custom prevailed in the ancient village communities of India and other countries, and was known as "shifting severalties." As collective farming is the ultimate end, it is not clear what is intended to be the role of the peasants who are to be freed from their debts, would be the largest land-owning class in the country and to whose hands political power is to be transferred. As to the last, our socialist friends have assumed without adequate warrant that the peasants and workers are anxious and competent to exercise political power in any real sense. If they are not, why impose on them a burden which can only prove an aggravation of their already too heavy burdens? Would it not be wiser to revert in some form suitable to modern conditions to the national Indian system in which, in the words of Karl Marx, "the structure of the economic elements of the society remains unaffected by the storms in the political weather?" (Capital, p. 379 English Translation, Allen and Union). While on this point we may ask, what is meant by adult suffrage on a functional basis? There are two items whose bearing on each other has evidently escaped the scrutiny of the Socialist leaders. Elimination of Princes, landlords and all other classes of exploiters; and liquidation of debts owing by peasants (largely to these very people). How are they to be eliminated, from whom is the money to pay workers' debts, which has been estimated for the peasants alone to run up to 900 crores, to be obtained? The Patna Conference resolution is perfunctory and evidently needs careful revision. It entirely omits to refer to the far-reaching consequences which its drastic proposals are bound to have on social and family life. There is an even more important omission. It completely ignores the patent fact that Indian society is to a large extent socialist already. Property rights of the largest section of the population are severely restricted by the duty of maintaining its own poor, infirm and destitute, which devolves in Western countries on the State. The State which is the depository of all authority in the Socialist scheme, has a very minor place in the Indian system. This system has, of course, broken down but in devising measures for the future, we should rather turn for guidance to the steady flame of our own ancient lights than to the will o' the wisp which appear and disappear in distant countries. Karl Marx himself has described the Indian village system with sympathetic understanding and if he were planning for India he would certainly have counselled building on the old foundations.

[May 26]

NOTES BY THE WAYFARER.

The Editor has shown me Dr. Paranjpye's letter. I did not mean my remark about the use of the word 'soul' by a Rationalist (with a capital) to be taken so seriously as he has taken it. Nevertheless, I may point out that while the other words which he mentions have ceased completely to have any trace of their original meaning, the word 'soul' is still chiefly used to mean the human soul as distinguished from the human body. Dr. Paranjpye might have conveyed his meaning equally well by using any of the terms he now uses by way of explanation. That he unconsciously preferred the word 'soul' is, to my mind, proof that such a thing, whether it actually exists or not, is a psychological necessity even to Rationalists. Man can not do without a soul in speech—a good reason why he has or should have one in fact.

Leaving metaphysics aside, has the Indian Liberal party really anything corresponding to a soul? The British Liberal party from which the Indian party borrowed its name and derived much of its inspiration, has all but ceased to exist. Mr. Lloyd George, the only survivor of the Old Guard, has a few faithful followers. Two of them are his son and daughter who, it was recently reported, were likely to join the Labour Party. In the Continent of Europe, Liberalism is a byword for incompetence, inefficiency and even corruption. After the adoption of Non-co-operation as its distinctive method by the Gandhian Congress, the Liberals found "Co-operation" to be handy as their watchword. But they did not stick to it. When the Simon Commission was appointed, they too became Non-co-operators. That was the crucial test and they emerged out of it as a party without a fixed principle. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry, the Liberal leader most known outside India, has thought it well to say at this juncture that he is not wedded to the Liberal Party. Mr. Chintamani is one of the new Liberals who has not been a Government official at one time or another. Dewan Bahadur Ramchandra Rao is another. The public have come to think of the Liberals as a party of placemen, a party which has no purpose of its own or policy or programme but that of holding office. This is not quite fair to the party but it is the fact.

Another great drawback of Indian Liberals is that they lack completely the support of women, nowadays so important to a political movement. The great Liberal orator, and one of the founders of the Liberal Party, Surendranath Banerjee, was in fact strongly opposed to the enfranchisement of women, as, in his opinion, they were all 'extremists'—a comprehensive term used at the time to denote the followers of Tilak and Lajpat Rai as well as the physical force revolutionaries. The disastrous effect of the mistake of leaving women out of calculation is noticeable in the secret sympathy—sometimes open too—of the women of Liberal leaders' own families with non-Liberals. Quite recently Liberal Leaders seem to have realised their error. Their Conferences nowadays have a feminine element in the persons of a few utterly bored ladies who have been persuaded to attend from a sense of duty to their fathers and husbands and fathers-in-law. School girls often wearing conspicuous Khaddar also sing "Bande Mataram" at the beginning and end of a session. Lack of enthusiasm is the most noticeable feature of Liberal gatherings next to the paucity of attendance which in itself is no great disadvantage if there is enthusiasm to make up for it. The Liberal Party as such, has no future in India any more than in England.

Is there no point of view other than the Congress one, which needs emphasis in Indian politics? Most certainly there is. The Congress is visibly disintegrating, and the Patna decision to run a parliamentary programme side by side with a non-parliamentary one, is the most striking proof of it. If two must ride a horse one must sit behind. Will the no-changers or the Council-wallahs be that one? The Socialists are biding their time and it will not surprise any one who keeps an observant eye on current events if at the October Congress, should one be held, another Committee to carry on a Socialist propaganda is adopted. Gandhiji quite plainly said that he is allowing the Council entry as otherwise the services of the Swaraj leaders would be lost to the Congress. The same argument will apply to Socialists. The great days of the Congress are gone. From being a unifying force it has become a centre of discord. Not only Mussalmans, but non-Brahmins in Madras and Maharashtra and the depressed classes have become estranged from it. The alienation of the depressed classes was due to Gandhiji's inexplicable intransigence at the second Round Table Conference. His herculean endeavours to retrieve this mistake have estranged caste Hindus without appreciably diminishing the antagonism of the depressed classes. The feeling between the two groups was never so unpromising as it is now.

There is need, and an urgent one, for a new political outlook which will heal differences, allay apprehensions and work steadily for union. Union should be the keyword of the new Party, union within and without. The goal of the Congress is Independence. The goal of Liberals is Dominion Status. Independence is a fine word but it often means the substitution of one kind of dependence for another. It is not so much that Japan or another foreign nation will step into the place of Britain if India becomes independent. But worse than that would be Independence like that of Egypt, Iraq or Manchuko. Further, the idea of working out the salvation both of India and Britain from within, is a greater one than that of Independence. This may seem grotesque both to Indians and Englishmen. But the stone which the builders had set at nought has many a time become head of the corner. Dominion Status as applied to a country and a people who by race, religion and language are widely divided from the "Mother Country," is an etymological absurdity and a political impossibility. South Africa is finding it out though there is the tie of religion and also that of White racialdom between the Dutch and the British. Ireland is revolting against it as opposed to her national integrity. The population of India is more than eight times that of Britain. In Indian history the British connection is an episode, perhaps an interlude. The present relation between Britain and India is humiliating to India and degrading to Britain. They must be totally changed. The new relation can not be Dominion Status. It should be either independence or a more organic union. It should be a greatly developed version of the relation between Hungary and Austria in the late Dual monarchy. This may seem hardly propitious at the present time when the Austro-Hungarian Empire to all appearance has crumbled to the dust. But the reasons for the collapse of that Empire did not arise out of any inherent defect in its conception which elicited the high praise of the historians Lord Acton.

BULGARIA'S REVOLUTION.

Mr. Louis Adamic concluded an article in the May issue of Current History with the following paragraph:—"Since the great powers were palpably deserting the Balkan rulers, it was urgent for them to get together, for they know that if one is overthrown or assassinated, the others will go, too. Hence the hastily concluded treaties of friendship among the various Balkan States.....The Balkans and Eastern Europe will bear watching, for though they are still kept tightly under the lid by the present dictators, an accumulated pressure may eventually blow the lid high into the air." About a month ago news was received of an unsuccessful attempt to blow up the Roumanian royal family by an organisation composed mainly of army officers. This was followed by a revolution in Bulgaria reported last week-end by Reuter. The Bulgarian revolution has many singular features to distinguish it from other revolutions, whether in the Balkan States or elsewhere. In the first place it was directed not against the King who still reigns over the country, but against the Bulgarian Cabinet. The Bulgarian Nationalists apparently had tired of the party factions in the country and with the support of the military they sprung a surprise revolution on King Boris and his ministers who were dismissed by telephone. Still more surprising was the mode of appointing new ministers. They were awakened, says Reuter, by police officers who, without saying why, led them to the police station. Some believed they were under arrest but on arriving at the police station "they were informed by the Chief of Police that they were to be ministers in the King's new Government." From the after-effects of the revolution it apparently seems to have caused even less excitement in Bulgaria than a general election and certainly it has worked more speedily. In the event of dissatisfaction against the new Government, it will be difficult for the next batch of revolutionists to decide whom to remove. It cannot be King Boris who is to be only a figurehead in the new State; it cannot be the ministers who have been caught unawares and pushed into power; it would be probably the Chief of Police who appointed them.

The Bulgarian revolution should have far-reaching results. It is dangerous, however, to prophesy where the Balkans are concerned. Mr. Benes, the wellknown Czechoslovakian leader, remarked when Hitler first came into power that the days of the domination of the Great Powers in Eastern European affairs were over and that Pan-Germanism and Pan-Slavism could be ruled out of practical politics. Both statements have now been disproved. A year of Hitler's regime shows that Pan-Germanism is a living issue. The struggle between France and Italy for supremacy in the Balkans has proved that some of the Great Powers still seek to control European politics. And the Bulgarian revolution, in putting in office men who aim at an agreement with Yugo-Slavia, is indicative of the strength of the Pan-Slav ideal. Bulgaria was supposed to be an irreconcilable enemy of Yugo-Slavia on the Macedonian issue. The Italian proposal for treaty revision contained, among other advantages to Bulgaria, a provision for transferring Macedonia to Bulgarian control. That Bulgaria, should now seek a closer alliance with Yugo-Slavia means that she is content to regard Macedonia as Yugo-slavian territory. She has given proof of good faith by launching a repressive policy against the leaders of Macedonian revolts against Yugo-Slavia who have in the past persisted in troubling the Government of that country from the mountains on the frontier. An alliance with Bulgaria is very advantageous to Yugo-Slavia as it raises her influence to predominance in Eastern Europe where Roumania has hitherto been supreme.

Bulgaria is a mainly agricultural country. In 1920 the Agrarian Party headed by Stambulski came into power and a virtual dictatorship was established in which the left-wing parties were in control. The government was overthrown in 1923 and the Agrarian Party never recovered from the blow. The conservative elements in the State secured control and rigorously suppressed the Communists and Socialists. In the years 1926-27 democratic government with proportional representation was established and this led to a multiplication of parties. Communism was revived in a Workers' Party. The country, however, was governed by coalitions. As in most Balkan States the struggle lay really between the Communists and Fascists and the revolution that has succeeded today is Fascist in sympathy. The national organisation has followed up its advent to power with a ruthless persecution of communist and socialist leaders. Parliament has been dissolved. Bulgaria is the last of the States which opposed the Allies in the Great War, to resort to a military oligarchy.

Mr. Adamic in his article has described the rule of terrorism prevalent in the Balkan States. A small minority, he declares, who are dependent on the influence of Government officials and stand to gain by the continuance of Western European influence, favour the present state of things. The majority look forward to any revolution which will bring the political and economic centres within these States. Mr. Adamic describes the Governments of Eastern Europe as despotisms drawing their strength from the military. It is not unlikely that King Boris himself prefers the present government to the party system that existed before it. Whether he does so or not, it cannot be doubted that it is more in keeping with the governmental systems of the countries surrounding Bulgaria.

MARY OF NAZARETH.

Mrs. Mary Borden, her attention having been drawn to the review of her book, "Mary of Nazareth," in a recent issue of the Reformer, writes:—

"I have been in India and I think I know a little of what people in the East feel about the reverence due to parents. I am sure that the Jews at the time of Christ had the same feeling, indeed their literature is full of it. This fact made Jesus' attitude towards his Mother and the attitude of his family toward him all the more extraordinary.

"But my understanding of the family drama is somewhat different from yours. It was inevitable that his family should have disapproved of him, for he was a revolutionary thinker and teacher and they were devout, orthodox Jews. Since they did not sympathize with him or believe in his mission, it was also inevitable, if he was to continue his work, that he should cut loose from them. His words about his family seemed to me to indicate he was very much wounded by their lack of understanding, but I personally feel that he had something so tremendous to do that he had to free himself from all family ties to accomplish it. It is impossible to criticise the conduct of a great leader or teacher as one would criticise it were he an ordinary private individual. His private life had to suffer. One can almost say that he had none from the moment he began to preach.

"All this by way of explanation, but perhaps the simplest explanation of all is that this story is the story of almost any Mother whose son is persecuted by his world."

ITALY AND INDIA.

Prof. Dr. Mahendra Nath Sircar and Dr. Tarak Nath Das delivered in the first week of April, lectures at the Italian Institute for the Middle and Far East, founded in Rome by the will of Mussolini, with the aim to promote the ideal approach between Europe and Asia.

Dr. Tarak Nath Das developed a very attractive subject "The Pacific Problem Seen by Eastern Eyes." Dr. Mahendra Nath Sircar, who is the Professor of Philosophy in the Calcutta Presidency College, delivered an address on "Indian culture and philosophy."

Both the Indian lecturers were highly appreciated. The other lecturers were: Prof. de Filippi on the Italian travellers and explorers in the East, Senator Maioni on Japan; Prof. Vacca on China; Accademico Peetazzoni on Japanese religions and their reflections in civil and political life; M. Oswald Siren, one of the most accredited students of Chinese art and the Director of Stockholm Museum on China's artistic ideal.

His Excellency G. Tucci, member of the Royal Italian Academy, wrote a highly appreciative article in "Il Messaggero" of the 7th April on Dr. Sircar's lectures, of which the following are a few translated excerpts:

"The Italian Institute for the Middle and Far East, founded in Rome by the will of Mussolini with the aim to promote the ideal approach between Europe and Asia which the present times point out as an absolute necessity of our future, has developed during these first months of life, an activity which answers to the immediate aims for which it has been created.

"This activity has manifested itself above all, but not exclusively, in the cultural field, as one would have anticipated, because it is necessary first to promote amongst us a better and deep knowledge of the Oriental thought and of its concrete manifestations in the artistic, literary and speculative field. Otherwise, it will never be possible to reach the intimate understanding which alone can prepare the way to the so much wanted and yet not so easily reached collaboration.

"On account of this the Institute has issued with the generous collaboration of various Institutions, a certain number of scholarships to Oriental students. These scholarships in future shall have to, not only increase, but establish themselves on grounds of reciprocity so that also the young Italians who devote to the East the best years of their life and their enthusiasm, might come in immediate contact with the people whose culture or artistic, literary, political and economical manifestations they study, and draw from a direct experience, that knowledge which no theoretical teaching will ever be able to give them.

"Following this initial programme, the Institute has also invited some personalities of Asia and Europe to give lectures and lessons on the subject which they most cultivate and to enlighten under different points of view the numerous aspects of the Eastern civilization. It is a work of approach, of understanding and of real and direct culture; because, contrary to what happens in other countries, one cannot say that amongst us a sure, precise and clear knowledge of the essential problems of the Eastern world and of the aspects of its life in this crucial moment of history, when Asia and Europe come all of a sudden on the same trajectory, has yet been acquired.

"Prof. Mahendra Nath Sircar, author of many valuable books on Indian philosophy, invited by the Institute for the Middle and Far East, has come from Calcutta to develop in five lectures a most interesting subject: "The mystic and speculative development of India through some fundamental stages." He has followed a different method from the one universally accepted. He did not start from the old to arrive to the modern time but, studying some of the most representative figures of contemporary India, as Ramkrishna, Vivekananda and Aurobindo Ghosh, and illustrating the fundamental attitude of their spirit and their mystic visions or their speculative constructions, has shown how the old Indian soul lives in them once more unexhausted and full of vigour: that Indian soul which already establishes in the sublime philosophy of the Upanishad, and triumphs with all the violence of its mystic impetuosity in the insuperable pages of the Bhagavad Gita and spreads itself in the Tantra.

"A whole spiritual and deep current which has never denied itself and lives, often unconscious and unknown, even in India of the 20th century, even in the distress of its political passion and in the confusion that the contact with Europe has generated and spread in her. It is a fundamental and essential tendency which accompanies India in the millenary development of its history and represents the intimate and fundamental structure; that tendency for which the world of nature is not studied, classified and reduced to laws in order to have the control and the management of it—this is the Western way—but it is considered as a passing and vanishing emanation of a deeper truth in whose definite possession the Indian wants to forget the anguish of his life and of his suffering.

"Not science then, but mysticism, and not even abstract philosophy, because India has never parted knowledge from life, and in the glorious vision of the Tantra has rather pointed the way to transform a logical fact into direct and lived experience.

"The lessons of Sircar have had a remarkable merit, that leaving aside any doctrinal classification and any heavy systematical structure, have brought one directly to the essential forms of the Indian thought, to those fundamental institutions, without which not only one could not think of the religion of India or of her mysticism, but not even of her historical life. And this is especially useful to-day: an organic synthesis of the oriental thought and of its tendencies which inspire and delineate the most different systems and pervade all the doctrinal constructions, giving us of a sudden, in a complete way, the exact vision of the psyche of a race and make our relationships, clear and easier."

During his stay in Rome, Dr. Sircar had a very busy time. He was entertained by men of light and lead and had to attend a number of dinners and parties and give talks.

From Rome, Dr. Sircar went to Geneva, reaching there on the 11th April last. He was to go to England via Paris. He will also visit Oxford. From there he will proceed to Germany. He has received invitations to deliver lectures at four universities in Germany.

From Germany he will come back to Rome and start for home by the middle of June.

HINDUISM IN THE PHILIPPINES

(By CHIRENDRA NATH ROY.)

Very few people of India are aware of the significant fact that Hinduism has a great history in the Philippines. Indian anthropologists and antiquarians have rarely, if ever, considered this rising archipelago in their study of what is known as Farther India. Even the researches of the Greater India Society have thrown little light upon the history of Indo-Filipino relationships. Unfortunately, it has not been an easy task for those in the Philippines who are doing researches on this line. This is especially because the Spaniards who ruled over the people for more than three hundred years, sought to wipe out all vestiges of native culture so that the people would not think of their history beyond the beginning of Spanish sovereignty. Another important difficulty is that those who are doing researches here on Indo-Filipino relationships can hardly be regarded as possessed of a satisfactory knowledge of the principal Indian languages which are supposed to be abundantly mixed up with the various Philippine dialects.

Professor H. Otley Beyer, an American in the University of the Philippines, has made and is still making a collection of the ancient relics of the Hindu civilization in the Philippines. There are some other private individuals who have also their own collections. But the full meaning of them, I presume, is yet to be deciphered by some who are sufficiently versed in the Indian languages. If some South-Indian university,—Madras or Mysore—could engage a scholar with the necessary qualifications to study in co-operation with some local anthropologists the data that are and that may be available, it may bring to light more interesting and important facts on India's relation with the ancient Philippines.

Professor Dixon, the distinguished anthropologist of the Harvard University, spoke, in an address before the students of the University of the Philippines, about the ancient civilization of the Filipinos. He referred to the various striking evidences which Professor Beyer has been able to gather after years of careful and systematic investigation into the possible sources of the land,—ethnological and traditional. It will be quite an interesting and valuable study when Professor Beyer's three modest volumes, now in preparation, will be out to show the racial and cultural backgrounds of the ancient Philippines. This insular region, although cut off by the vast expanse of water and remote from all the possibilities which brought the ancient East and West into close contact, was able to attain a high state of social evolution at a time when the continent of Europe excepting Greece and Rome was not far advanced from jungle life.

To many parts of the civilized world this may be a real surprise inasmuch as the Filipinos as a people were hardly known until recently when their struggle for political independence has served to attract the attention of outsiders. It has been said that the Philippines was discovered by Captain Ferdinand Magellan in 1521. Such discovery means, of course, that the country came to be first known to the West at that time. There is no truth, however, in calling it a discovery when the land has established intimate relationship with different parts of Asia nearly as long ago as, if not earlier than, the supposed birth of Christ. Indeed, the Philippines formed an integral part of Farther India in times long gone by. In the Philippines it was about the middle of the fifteenth century when Islam appeared in the south and was driving northward,—an event which was forestalled by the coming of militant missionary Spain." When in the sixteenth century Spain got her foothold fairly secure in the islands she was able to perfect what Islam initiated,—complete isolation of the Islands from the culture influence of India.

It is indeed an interesting study how the civilization of India came to the Philippines while there was no military conquest, no method of compulsion by the stronger power over the weaker. In ancient times there was in South India a powerful ruling dynasty called the Pallavas. They were in the zenith of their power from the middle of the sixth century to about 740 A.D. Their kingdom extended over a great part of the Deccan. But the Chalukyas and later the Cholas inflicted a heavy defeat upon them and caused the gradual disappearance of their power as a sovereign people. These Pallavas were expert seamen and merchants carrying on an extensive trade with Malay Islands and Indo-China. Professor Beyer seems to be quite certain that the Pallavas founded colonies as early as the first century B. C. in Indo-China and Malaysia, or in other words, Cambodia, Malay Peninsula, Sumatra, Java, and Borneo. Professor Dixon of the Harvard University said, however, that the Hindu settlements in this part of the Orient might have been at a much earlier date. The Hindu population in these colonies was greatly increased when sometime in the fifth century the Pallavas in South India were hard pressed by the coming of a large number of northern people. When Buddhism began to spread far and wide at the instance of the great Indian Emperor Asoka, it invaded the Hindu colonies and by the seventh century "Hindu Malaysia became Buddhist." The advent of Buddhism into the colonies meant some initial resistance from the faithful Hindus. In Indo-China the Kingdom of Champa was founded by Kaundinya who "came from the Palava capital of Kanchi" in South India. In the twelfth century King Jayavarman VIII founded an empire in Indo-China by uniting together the different Kingdoms of Kambodj, Kambapura and Vyadhapura. This empire served as a centre of further extension of Hindu civilization towards the neighbouring islands through trade and other peaceful intercourse. There was, however, no motive of political domination, no land hunger. In Sumatra the Buddhists built a permanent city as their capital with many other cities around it. Thus here again was formed another Buddhist state called the Empire of Sri-Vishaya, the emperor himself claiming descent from the Sri-Vishaya (or Sri-Vijaya) royal house. The capital of Sri-Vishaya was made another centre of Hindu influence which was spreading rapidly over the surrounding island regions of Malaysia. It was about the eighth century that from Gujrat in India there began a great influx of caste-Hindus in East Java where they founded a Hindu state in rivalry with the Buddhist state in Sumatra. These two rival states "made their influence felt throughout the island of Borneo and covered at least the greater part of the southern Philippines, and at times their influence was extended as far north as the island of Formosa."

Thus we find that Indo-China, Sumatra and East Java formed the three centres of Hindu influence over the neighbouring islands before the time of the Mohammedan invasion. Hinduism came to the southern Philippines from Indo-China long before Sumatran Buddhism had gained access there. This Hindu influence reached also the northwest coast of Borneo. The city of Bruni on the coast "was the most important centre in northern Malaysia for the extension of Brahmin influence in other islands and regions."

Soon after the twelfth century several high officials, or datos, as they were called at the court of Bruni, somehow incurred the displeasure of the Raja of Borneo and left the island with their families and servants. They sailed along the coast of Palawan and finally reached the island of Panay. They were called the Visayans because they came from the land of Sri-Vishaya. They encountered little difficulties in settling along with the native people. Some of the datos sailed further north until they arrived near Batangas where they finally settled. The descendants of these datos migrated in different directions, one group settling around Laguna de Bay and another in the Bicol Peninsula. On the other hand, the Visayans in Panay were growing again rapidly in population and thus spread over the whole island. The Visayans at present include all those people in the southern Philippines whose dialects bear close resemblance to that of the Panayans. There are also some people in Borneo numbering about three hundred thousand who are still known as Visayans. They still hold to their faith and maintain a tradition closely related to Hinduism. Professor Beyer says, "It seems quite evident from a study of various facts that the Visayans in Borneo and those in the Philippines are not only of common origin but are also closely allied to the peoples of South Sumatra. This term is almost certainly a direct survival of the spread of colonies from the pre-Buddhist Sri-Vishaya state into Western Borneo and from there into the central Philippines and probably also into Southern Formosa." It should be borne in mind that Sri-Vishaya was a royal house to which the different royal families in Indo-China, Sumatra and Borneo traced their descent. Their states were, therefore, associated with the name of Sri-Vishaya and the people were called the Sri-Vishayans. The people of the Philippines are at present divided into three groups which are represented by the three stars in their national flag. One of these three groups is constituted by the Visayans, the other two by the Tagalogs and the Ilocanos. At any rate, it is now evident that Hindu blood came from southern India through a long course to these islands and became mixed with the blood of the native people.

This close ethnic relation of the Filipino with the people of southern India is further adduced by the archaeological study of the lands. The original script of the people has been traced to the South Indian character. The various forms of writing, such as Tagalog, Ilocano, Vishayan, Pampangan, Pangasinan, etc., show their distinct relation with such forms of South Indian scripts as Tamil, Telegu, Malayalam and Kanarese. In northern Philippines these scripts ceased to be in use after the coming of the Spaniards. In the south, Islam introduced by Makdum or Sharif Awliya of Arabia prevented their further use and the Arabic alphabet came in vogue. But some pagan mountain people, as they are called now, are said to retain still their old scripts. It should be remembered that the Sanskrit language being primarily the language of the Indo-Aryans is entirely different from the languages of Southern India used by the Dravidian people. That both the Sanskrit and Dravidian elements are found in the different dialects of the Filipinos, goes to show that the influence of the Hindus of the Aryan type who had founded an empire in east Java and that of the Hindus of the Dravidian type who also had their empires in Indo-China and Sumatra, had been present in the Islands. It is, therefore, admitted that the ancient culture of the Filipino people originated in India. Dr. Saleeby who has made a very scientific study of the various dialects of the southern Philippines and seem to know something of the Sanskrit language, goes further and points out "that Sanskrit terms were used by Malayans in general and by Filipinos in particular long before the invasion of Java and Sumatra by the Hindus of the third or fourth century A.D." Indeed Dr. Saleeby is inclined to hold a different theory from that of other students of Indo-Filipino relationships. He is convinced that the Filipinos were originally immigrants from India.

Besides these facts of language relationships there have been many other facts lately unearthed. It has been found that in the island of Masbate the ancient quicklime method of the Hindus was used by the gold miners to excavate the rock. The relics found in the island of Mindoro seem to prove that it "seems to have been the very centre of Hindu civilizing influences." Mr. Russell says that "every settled town had a temple and most temples had collections of books." They were written in the native characters on palm leaves and bamboo and stored with the native priests. But unfortunately the Spanish people destroyed that precious heritage of the people. It has been said that "one Spanish priest in southern Luzon boasted of having destroyed more than three hundred scrolls written in the native character."

About the interesting folklore Professor Kroeber thinks that they are "quite demonstrably of Hindu origin and all are cast in Hindu mould. Inasmuch as many of our own fables are also known to be of Indian origin or patterned on Hindu examples, it is not surprising that these tales from the Philippines have a strangely familiar ring in our ears. It is no wonder, since both we and the Filipinos have derived them from the same source" (Peoples of the Philippines, p. 197). Images of bronze, copper and even of gold representing the god Shiva, one of the Hindu Trinity, have been discovered by archaeological exploration. There is one statue, supposed to be some Hindu god, which has been preserved at the Ateneo de Manila, a very ancient Catholic college. One Dutch archaeologist thinks that it is the statue of Ganesha. In Chao Ju-Kua's description it is found that "in the thick woods of Ma-yi, the ancient name for the island of Mindoro, are scattered copper statues of Buddha, but no one can tell the origin of these statues." The Islands received an abundant supply of brass, bronze, copper, tin armour and various types of weapons from India. "The characteristic sarong, turban, bronze bells and armlets and a variety of smaller ornaments appear to be Indian. The skin-tight trousers of the Sulu Moros are suggestive of Indian quttees" (Beyer, The Philippines before Magellan, Asia, Nov., 1921). The old names of coins used in the Islands are of Indian origin. Indeed, the Indian influence is most obvious "in all the most highly developed ancient handicrafts in the Philippines." From the evidences so far collected Professor Beyer sums up his conclusion thus: "The Indian culture made itself felt most strongly in the political, social and religious life of the populations among which it spread. Its material influence was relatively less important except perhaps in metal-working, and in the art of war, though modes of dress and of personal ornamentation were also greatly affected. At the time of the Spanish discovery not only were the more civilized Filipinos using the Indian syllabaries for writing, but their native mythology, folklore and written literature all had a distinct Indian cast. The same was true of their codes of laws and their names for all sorts of political positions and procedures. The more cultured Philippine languages contain many Sanskrit words, and the native art a noticeable sprinkling of Indian design. A strong Brahmanistic religious element was also certainly introduced, although it seems to have affected chiefly a limited class, as the mass of the people still clung to their more ancient pagan worship. With the exception of recent European culture the Indian influences are on the whole the most profound that have affected Philippine civilization."

WHY BALI OBJECTS TO CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Dr. Amry Vandenbosch writes in the columns of The International Review of Missions:

The controversy has stirred Indonesians as well as the Dutch, and has led to two unusual incidents. The first of these was the act of the Balinese chiefs in sending a memorial to the Governor-General, urging the exclusion of Christian missionary activity from their island. The second was the passage by the Volksraad (the East Indian central legislative body) of a resolution likewise petitioning the Governor-General not to admit Christian missionaries to Bali.

Little is known of the early history of Bali. Probably Hindu colonies from Java settled on the island, and with the aid of military support from home made themselves masters of its inhabitants. The now Hinduized Balinese remained for a long time subject to the powerful Hindu empire of Madjapahit, whose seat was in central Java. When in the fifteenth century Java became Islamicized a large number of Javanese, unwilling to accept the new religion, fled to Bali. This had several consequences: it strengthened the Hindu influence in Bali, as it left Bali an isolated Hindu community, for the other islands of the Malay archipelago either remained animist or became Moslem; and it made Bali politically independent of Java.

Although the Dutch first came into contact with Bali as early as 1597, they did not attempt an occupation until two centuries and a half later. Throughout this long period they did, however, maintain loose political relations with the Balinese chiefs.

Missionaries and missionary leaders have long viewed Bali as a strategic field for work. In 1829 the English missionary-sinologue, Dr. Medhurst, visited the island, and in his report recommended that missionary work be begun on Bali. Dr. W. R. Baron van Hoevell in 1846 issued a brochure in which he ardently pleaded for the establishment of mission posts on Bali. Dr. van Hoevell was convinced that unless Christianity were speedily brought to the Balinese they would become Moslems. Missionary work was begun several times but discontinued after a shorter or longer period. An English missionary, Ennis by name, established himself on Bali in 1838, but apparently remained only a short time. From 1864 to 1881, the Utrecht Missionary Union, in co-operation with the Netherlands Bible Society, carried on work in Bali. The undertaking ended tragically; the missionary, J. de Vroom, was murdered by the sole Christian convert. In 1891 Roman Catholic authorities obtained permission to begin work in Bali but no use was ever made of the permission. Over three decades later, they sought to begin missionary work in Bali by the opening of a Dutch-Indonesian school. Bitter opposition immediately developed against this plan. Mr. Tjakorda Gede Soekawati, the Balinese representative in the Volksraad, introduced a resolution requesting the Government 'to refrain from giving either direct or indirect support to propaganda of a religious nature.'.....Recent events in Bali have given the question an entirely new turn. Christianity has found its way into Bali even though the missionaries have been kept out. In North Bali Christian influence proceeds from a number of Amboinese families who have come there to live. Christianity has found its way also into South Bali.

As a result of these events a reaction began to set in, which became intensified when it became known that Dutch missionary societies were considering the advisability of opening work in Bali.

Naturally not all of those who desire the exclusion of missions from Bali base their opposition on the same grounds. Some merely take what may be called an opportunist point of view. Bali, according to this view, cannot now stand the strain of adjusting itself to an additional stream of influence.

A second group oppose the admission of Christian missions to Bali on the ground that missions would injure Balinese society, cause unrest, weaken the effectiveness of Dutch administration and cause a great deal of political disaffection on the part of the Balinese upper castes.

There is lastly a group which is opposed to all Christian missionary activity. Among superficial tourists, this takes the form of an amusing simplicity. They find the dances fascinating and the cremations of unusual interest. 'Would it not be a pity if anything of this charming civilization were destroyed by Puritanic busy-bodies? After all, one religion is as good as another—each people has developed the religion that best suits its needs.'

Others, with a deep feeling of sympathy for Balinese life and culture and with more than a smattering of knowledge of anthropology, ethnology, would like to see Bali preserved as an anthropological museum.

A small group, however, views missions as distinctly a destructive force, among oriental peoples. They contend that missions can only rob an intelligent, civilized and deeply religious people, such as the Balinese of their most treasured possessions: their religion and culture.

There is little in this attack on Christian missions that is new. The attempt is here again made of linking missions with imperialism and of identifying the work of missions with the transmission of Western civilization. The civilizations of backward peoples are over-idealized.

The basic difficulty is, of course, that these critics hold a relativist view of religion and dismiss all other views as absurd. They consider all religion a purely human culture-product; 'man is constantly creating God after his own image.'

Friends of the missionary movement were not slow in pointing out that Bali had been laid open to nearly every other alien influence—What good reason can there be for singling out Christian missions for exclusion? The answer of Soekawati (the Balinese representative in the Volksraad) and others is that whereas the other influences attack the Balinese Hindu culture only incidentally and indirectly, missions would attack the cultural bases directly.

Assyrians for Brazil—At the end of March, the Committee of League of Nations Council, appointed for the purpose of making arrangement for the settlement of the Assyrians who wished to leave Iraq, met to study an interim report from the Commission it had sent to Brazil to study the possibilities of settlement in that country. This Commission investigated the land of the Parana Plantations Company near Londrina in the State of Parana. The Committee will inform the Council of the League at its May meeting of the results of this investigation and the views of the Brazilian Government.

[May 26]

A RATIONALIST'S REPLY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I see that in your issue of May 12, "Wayfarer" has a cheap gibe about my talking of the "Soul" of the Liberal Party when as a rationalist I do not believe in a soul. My meaning is, of course, clear. I do not want the Liberal Party to give up those fundamental principles for which it has so long stood; and the soul is simply a short term to express these principles as opposed to temporary expediences which have tempted some Liberals to advocate a coalition with, or rather a submergence in, the proposed Swaraj Party. Of course, I do not believe in a human soul as divorced from the body, a soul for the benefit of which sacrifices are performed or prayers offered, a soul for instance which Yama extracted from the body of Satyavan and was carrying away in a little net, followed by Savitri. I can assure "Wayfarer" that I am not a purist in the use of language and am quite ready to use any word which expresses my meaning even though it may have been derived from foreign sources or is etymologically connected with mythology, astrology, or exploded ideas in science. I have admiration for Shivaji's "martial" deeds, am "jovial" in good company, can talk of the "disastrous" earthquake and regard "venereal" diseases as a major "curse" of modern times. I am even writing this letter on a "Wednesday" and hope to see it published on some "Saturday" in the month of "May" in a journal published in the town of "Bombay" though I do not acknowledge the influence of Mars, Jove, stars or Venus, do not believe in "curses," and do not worship Wodin, Saturn, Maia or Mumbadevi. I have a high admiration for my friend the Editor of this journal, and though I am far from believing him to be the king of actors I shall still continue to call him "Natarajan." If I happen to meet "Wayfarer" personally and bid him "adieu" or "goodbye" I shall be sorry if this is taken to mean literally that I wish him to go to God immediately or want God to be with him as I do not desire him to receive the dressing-down he is sure to get at such an interview on account of his silly gibe.

Lucknow,
May 16, 1934. }

Yours etc.,
R. P. PARANJPE.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND THE CHURCHES.

It becomes more and more evident that a prime factor in recovery and economic readjustment is the strength of organized labour. A permanent redistribution of income in the interest of increased purchasing power means higher wage scales. The government may establish and maintain the right of labour to bargain in its own way but the utilization of the right is entirely in labour's hands. Hence, the support of labour's efforts to organize is coming to be recognized as a moral issue. The mere affirmation of the right without moral support for the effort falls short of effectuality, writes Information Service.

In view of the fact it is pertinent to cite pronouncements by church bodies which go beyond the benevolent neutrality expressed in the mere declaration of labour rights. The following are particularly worthy of note:

1. An ordered and constructive democracy in industry is as necessary as political democracy, and collective bargaining and the sharing of shop control and management are inevitable steps in its attainment. (Resolutions adopted by the Federal Council of Churches at Cleveland, Ohio, May, 1919.)

2. Participation of labour through representatives of their own choosing and an equitable distribution of wealth and income should be incorporated in any form of national planning and control. (Joint Statement on Unemployment, issued by the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council, the Department of Social Action of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Social Justice Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis.)

3. The immediate application in every industry of the principle of collective bargaining is not only essential to the protection of the modern industrial worker, but it is the first step toward that co-operative control of both the process and the proceeds of industry which will be the ultimate expression of Christianity in industrial relationships. (Statement adopted by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1912.)

4. Individual workmen cannot hope to bargain on equal terms with a corporation; so collective bargaining becomes necessary in order that industry may become stabilized. (A Christian Industrial Programme, Social Service Commission of the Northern Baptist Convention, adopted at Philadelphia, 1921.)

5. Be it resolved: That we respectfully request the management of the Methodist Book Concern in Chicago and Cincinnati to do every fair thing in their power to persuade the eligible employees of their plants to join the International Typographical Union, and when a majority of such eligible employees, by a secret ballot, so decide, the management of the Methodist Book Concern shall enter into a signed working agreement with the International Typographical Union. (Social Service Commission report adopted by the Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1928.)

6. To recognize the principle [of collective bargaining] without supporting some method that will make it effective is but to mock the hopes and struggles of the workers with barren words and to deserve their indignation and contempt. (Statement adopted by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1916.)

7. We hold it as a truth verified in experience that labour must organize effectively not only to protect its own rights but what is equally or even more important, to better understand its own duties and responsibilities and so guard against and prevent conditions which end in ruinous strikes. (Resolutions of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, 1925.)

A significant change in the Social Ideals of the Churches, revised by the last meeting of the Federal Council is contained in Article 8, which reads:

"The right of employees and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining and social action; protection of both in the exercise of this right; the obligation of both to work for the public good; encouragement of co-operatives and other organizations among farmers and other groups."

Here it is asserted not merely that employees and employers alike have "rights" in this matter but that organization by functional groups in the economic system should be encouraged.

There is good reason to believe that the more spectacular phases of the present economic situation may yield in interest and importance, precisely as happened in the early post-war period, to the old and simple issue of collective bargaining among employers and workers, in city and country, and that the real issue will have to be fought out on these lines.

The following excerpts are taken from The Yardstick, issued by the National Catholic Welfare Conference, April 16:

"The anti-New Dealers have gained courage and are talking high, wide and handsome. Business is picking up steadily. Profits are growing. And since they do not want reform but only recovery and they think recovery is travelling towards us fast, they are fighting reform. Of course without reform recovery is a known snare and a delusion.

"The amazing publicity that the newspapers have given the charges of Dr. Wirt has served him and his inflationist Committee for the Nation as a means of attacking nearly the whole programme except inflation. The stock market regulation bill is fired at from a hundred centres even though it is known that the run-away stock market of the Coolidge era and of 1929 helped bring on these black years. The law compelling corporations to tell the truth about the new securities is branded a barrier to recovery.

"It is the old story. When the devil was sick last year, the devil a monk would be. He thinks now that he is convalescing and that it will not be long until he is completely well. And so he is girding himself for another dance on the same primrose path that led us to our four years and more of hell and which, if tried again, will end in the same identical destination.

"The New Deal has to be improved much. It is far from good enough. We have to take this occasion to do things that will make this country and this world far less unjust and far abler to prevent the catastrophe of another collapse. But the drive is on to break it down utterly. The engines of propaganda have been wheeled into place.

"But if we have learned anything at all it is that more money has to go to wage and salary workers and to farmers and less to property; that the relation between production and distribution has to be guided; and that neither of these two things can be safely turned over to the sole control of the representatives of property and credit-power. Corporation executives and bankers have not learned this yet. And so it looks, now that business is picking up, as if we are in for a fight."

SELECTIONS FROM THE PESHWA'S DAFTAR.

Another volume of the "Selections from the Peshwa's Daftar" which is the 37th of the series edited by Rao Saheb G. S. Sardesai (Price, Rs. 3) has been published by the Government Central Press writes the Director of Information. It is entitled, "The Karnatak Expeditions of Madhavrao I (1761-1772)." It brings together a large number (over 200) of very useful papers which mainly relate to Peshwa Madhavrao I's undertakings in the region usually called the Karnatak, the greater portion of which was subdued by the Marathas under the lead of the Peshwa's father, Balajirao. The unforeseen disaster of Panipat at the beginning of the year 1762 not only undid much of the success which the two previous Peshwas had achieved but indirectly helped the rise of Haidar. All who managed to suppress the Hindu Ruler of Mysore and seized the opportunity to consolidate his strength so as to become a rival both of the Marathas and the British.

The sudden rise of Haidar upset the previous calculations of the Marathas who had not found time to establish a firm hold on their Southern conquests. Murarrao Ghorpade, who was the only prominent Maratha Jagirdar in the territory concerned, had to bear the full brunt of Haidar's first crushing onslaughts. A few important new letters included in this Selection speak eloquently of the heroic stand made by Murarrao.

In order to follow carefully the contents of these papers, the student will do well to remember the following main expeditions of the Peshwa into the South:—

(1) October 1763-June 1765.—The conquest of the region between the Krishna and the Tungabhadra.

(2) October 1766-June 1767.—Maratha penetration into the districts south of the Tungabhadra.

(3) October 1769-1770.—The same expedition continued to the south of the Tungabhadra and led to some stiff fighting.

(4) Up to June 1772.—The Peshwa was prevented by ill-health from being personally present in this last expedition, which consequently was carried to completion by his able generals Trimbakrao Pethe and Gopalrao Patwardhan. Besides the papers which describe the various actions pertaining to these main campaigns, there are other episodes which have been incidentally described in them and of which little has so far been known in history. For instance, the Peshwa had to undertake a year's vigorous warfare to overcome Bapuji Naik Joshi, a near relation of the Peshwa family who had figured prominently in the two preceding regimes but who now deserted the Peshwa's cause. Many other minor affairs are vividly dealt with, which the student would be well advised to note in order to grasp the real aim of the Peshwa's policy.

The details found in these papers go to confirm the accounts about deeds of valour and diplomacy of the Peshwa by the great research scholar Khare as the result of his study of Patwardhan records. The Peshwa assumed the burden of Government at the age of 16 and contending against heavy odds proved himself, in the short space of eleven years, not only a capable general but a just and strong ruler. Most of the letters in the Selection are addressed by Haripant Phadke to Nana Fadnis who was at Poona.

"HARNAM, LET US BE FRIENDS."

"I am an Australian girl, just turned 16 last March, not very tall, fairly plump, and with grey, blue eyes and nut-brown hair." Thus describing herself, a girl from the southern continent has written to Bibi Harnam Kaur, the sixteen-year-old girl of Mogatehsil, Ferosepore district, who put up a heroic fight against a dacoit band in her village last month, resulting in the death of three of the dacoits, says an Associated Press message.

The pluck displayed by the Sikh girl has won the heart of her young Australian friend, who thinks that the life of her Indian sister must be "so thrilling and interesting." Her own life has been the usual Australian girl's life, "to go to school, leave, and then start work in a shop or else house work." "But you?" she asks "What could you tell? Your life would probably be so thrilling and interesting to me." And across thousands of miles and over differences of race, language, creed and colour the Australian girl holds out her hand to her Indian friend: "Harnam, though there may be worlds and worlds of difference between us let us be friends."

Bibi Harnam Kaur is at present an in-patient in the Mayo Hospital, where she is recovering from the bullet wounds and other injuries sustained in her encounter with the dacoits. She is progressing very well, and is likely to be discharged shortly. Another Associated Press message announces that two squares of land and Rs. 1,000 in cash, to be given at her marriage, is the reward awarded by the Punjab Government to Bibi Harnam Kaur, the brave girl of village Chaudhariwala, Tehsil Moga, who put a heroic fight against a band of dacoits last month, resulting in the death of three dacoits.

Similar rewards have also been granted to her three brothers and a monthly pension of Rs. 10 to her mother, who lost her husband as a result of injuries sustained in the fight.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION IN THE SOVIET UNION.

The Council of People's Commissaries of the Soviet Union issued an Order on 13th March 1934 requiring the Governments of the autonomous Republics and the district executive committees to investigate, during September and October 1934, the enforcement of compulsory primary education for children between the ages of eight and eleven, which was introduced in the towns in 1933, and to take all possible measures to render compulsory primary education universal. The 17th Congress of the Communist Party further decided to introduce compulsory technical training in country schools.

The State Planning Commission and the Commissariats of Education and Finance of the Russian Federation are preparing a plan for the introduction of compulsory training in the seven-year schools in all the autonomous Republics, provinces and districts, to ensure that all children leaving primary schools in the towns and industrial villages shall be admitted to the seven-year secondary schools during the school year 1935-1936, and that those leaving primary schools in the country shall be admitted to secondary schools during the school year 1937-1938.

Parents whose children attend the three highest classes of secondary schools in the country during the school year 1938-1934 are required to leave their children at school until they have completed the seven-year course.

The Commissariats of Education and Justice will issue a joint Order relating to compulsory technical training for children in the classes referred to above.

The Commissariat of Education of the Russian Federation will determine the minimum of scientific knowledge to be required of teachers and principals of schools, and the conditions to which school premises and equipment must conform. The local organs of the Commissariat of Education will not authorise the opening of new secondary schools unless these rules are observed.

THE TRAGIC SIDE OF EMPIRE.

Mr. P. E. Mialla, Judicial Officer, Quetta Cantonment, returned a verdict of suicide while of unsound mind on the inquest of second Lieutenant T. G. Barrington of the 1st Battalion, West Yorkshire Regiment, writes the Tribune. It may be mentioned that Lieutenant Barrington was found dead in his room on the morning of the 8th April 1934. The Judicial Officer in his report says that the deceased was stated to have joined the 1st Battalion West Yorkshire Regiment about September last while the regiment was in Egypt. From Egypt he came to Quetta on Good Friday, the 30th March, 1934. It appeared that for a few days prior to his death the deceased suddenly became disinterested in everything and expressed that he was fed up with Quetta and loathed the place. From letters to his fiancée, his father and his mother, found in the deceased's room, and which are alleged to be in his handwriting, it appeared that the deceased was distressed at having to be away from his home. He also seemed to have taken a particular dislike to Quetta for in almost all his letters, he mentioned how he hated this place. The following passage from a letter dated the 8th April 1934, addressed to his fiancée, indicated that the deceased was in a forlorn state of mind:—

"This may be the last letter that you will ever get from me. Life is unendurable and each day is one hideous nightmare from which I never wake up. I am trapped. There seems no way out and my brain is on fire and almost snapping-demented. I have a revolver that I must get rid of, else something terrible will happen. Perhaps I had better go."

It was evident that the deceased thought of taking his life but since he was depressed probably, in sheer desperation, considered that the easiest way to overcome his troubles was to put an end to himself. The Judicial Officer was thus convinced that second Lieutenant T. G. Barrington of the 1st Battalion West Yorkshire Regiment committed suicide while of unsound mind by shooting himself through the head with his own revolver.

SWAMI ADYANANDA IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Being invited by the Transvaal Hindu Seva Samaj, Swami Adyananda of R. K. Mission arrived in Johannesburg on 1st February 1934. Many prominent Indians and some Europeans were present at the Railway Stations at Pretoria and Johannesburg. In the evening about sixteen associations in the Transvaal, including the Indian National Congress, extended a hearty welcome to the Swami. The Swami, in reply, spoke on "India's Message to the world. The first public lecture was delivered in the Selbourne Hall, Johannesburg, on the 18th February, when the Swami spoke to an audience of nearly a thousand people, many of whom were Europeans. After the discourse, the Swami answered the questions that were asked by some of those present. The local Vedanta Service Society soon afterwards celebrated the birthday anniversary of Sri Ramakrishna, and the Swami spoke on "Sri Ramakrishna the Prophet of Modern India." Out of the other engagements that followed may be mentioned the speeches at the Indo-European Council on "An Eastern View of Western Civilisation," at the Government Indian School on "The Ideals of Education in India," at the International Club on "India and Her Civilisation" and at the Pretoria Theosophical Lodge on "What is Yoga?" Invitations have been received from Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, Durban, Kimberley and many other important cities. Weekly lectures on "Hindu Philosophy and religion" have been arranged at the University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg for some time to come. The Swami is also holding classes on the Gita, thrice a week for the benefit of the Indians.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Progressive Afghanistan:—The rapid progress in Afghanistan has been marked by the opening of 140 private schools in the Kushag and the Hiras Provinces. The number of students who are receiving education at these institutions is 2,400 and measures are in hand to double the figure. The telephone line has been extended from Khanabad to Gardhai and it will be further extended to the village of Pulkhumbi when it will be lined with the trunk exchange line between Mazari Shariff and Kabul. The fine Arts School and the Bamian Hotel, work on which was suspended during the winter months, has been resumed. Work on the Bano Pass, has also been restarted.

Romain Rolland's Romance:—M. Romain Rolland, the French author, who has lived for several years at Villeneuve, on Lake Leman (Geneva), is to marry his Secretary, Mme. Koudacheff, who is a widow. Mr. Rolland is sixty-eight. Mme. Koudacheff was born at St. Petersburg (Leningrad.) She has been M. Rolland's secretary for many years.

Revolving Solarium at Jamnagar:—The late Maharaja Jam Saheb Shri Ranjitsinghji was highly impressed by the therapeutic utility of the solarium at Aix-les-Bains of Dr. Jean Saidman and made arrangements to establish in India a centre of scientific physiotherapy. The revolving solarium of Jamnagar will be completed very shortly. It is built on the same principles as the solarium at Aix-les-Bains and Cannes. It will be, it is claimed, the most scientific institution in India for physiotherapy. The solarium is a building of 800,000 lbs. in weight which pivots 10 cabins for treatment, where the sun's rays are filtered in a manner so as to isolate the therapeutic rays and stop the dangerous heat rays of the sun. 10 giant lenses of 64 by 60 inches are each able to concentrate 240,000 candle light on every patient and help to cure extrapulmonary tuberculosis, rheumatism, anaemia and many other diseases. Under the solarium is a tower which contains 12 laboratories of the Institute of Polyradiotherapy for the treatment of diseases of children, malaria and certain types of cancers. The solarium is the invention of Dr. Jean Saidman, Director of Institute of Actionogy in Paris, who has come specially to India for a month to start the solarium and is now in Jamnagar. The building of the solarium, the biggest medical apparatus in the world, has been successfully completed by the Societe Industrielle Re-construction of Paris for the Nawanagar State.—Indian Engineering.

The "Rope Trick"—A man who has actually seen the Indian "Rope Trick" performed, has at last been found. He is Dr. Alexander Cannon, Psychiatrist, who described his experience in Indo-China at a London meeting of the British College of Psychic Science. Dr. Cannon said he was accompanied by a member of the French Consulate in Indo-China. "This is what we saw or thought we saw," the Doctor explained. "The scene in an eastern market place. In the centre thereof stands an ascetic, his eyes half open. He stands waving his arms, gesticulating and uttering yogic incantations and meanwhile swaying gently to the rhythm. In front of him is a coil of red-coloured rope, lying on the ground. Over this, he stretches out his hands periodically. On his right-hand side stands a youth, who has a most noticeable far-away expression in his eyes. An adept carefully preserves the semi-circle at a suitable distance of twelve feet radius. At last, the ascetic swoops and lifts up the end of the red rope and holds it at his arm's length. The end of the rope appears to rise higher and higher as if drawn heavenwards by an invisible force. This process continues until the other end of the rope is just free of the ground. The boy then climbs the rope, remaining at the other end in mid-air. He comes down to the ground and then again climbs the rope and the yogi appears to follow him up the rope with a knife clenched in his teeth. He gets hold of the boy, cuts him to pieces and appears to drop the different parts of the body to the ground where they lie quivering in the dust. The magician then descends the rope, puts the pieces of the body together and sends the youth up the rope again right to the top when he appears to vanish into thin air."

Next Naval Conference:—Britain, the United States of America and Japan are engaged in conversations with a view to ascertaining the possibility of preliminarily discussing naval questions prior to the Naval Conference to be held in Washington in 1935. It is understood that the first overtures came from Britain and Japan. Japanese officials suggested that a preliminary discussion on international questions relating to the Pacific would go a long way in clearing the atmosphere for the Naval Conference. A Japanese Navy Office spokesman declared, says a Tokio cable, that the Washington Naval Treaty would be a rational one and that the London Treaty was signed as a provisional agreement. He pointed out that since the conclusion of the Washington Treaty under the special conditions existing after the world War, big changes had occurred in the international situation. Japan's sense of national security required the conclusion of an equitable national naval treaty to replace the existing ones.—Reuter.

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

NOTES

The Catholic Landslide:—Three thousand families, numbering ten thousand Indian Catholics, have gone over to the Lutheran fold as a protest against the failure of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to induce the high caste Catholics to accept their low caste co-religionists as their social equals. One of their spokesmen said at a public meeting of the dissenters that they had decided to go over to the new Church on certain conditions which were accepted by the latter, and, if these were not adhered to, there will be another exodus to an unspecified destination. It is quite evident that the part of religion in these mass movements is inappreciable. The acknowledgment of the services of the Self-Respect Movement by the dissenters is significant. Father Heras in an interview in the Times of India refers in a rather superior way to the erroneous methods of his predecessors in South India. It will not require much research for him to see that conditions are not very different in Western Indian Catholicism.

"Christianising" Mission Schools:—The implications of the new policy of Christianisation of Mission Schools and Colleges, is beginning to dawn on the Indian public. There have been wholesale dismissal of non-Christian teachers in South Indian institutions. The South Indian Teacher in a very temperate article calls attention to the consequences of the new policy if it is persisted in. It warns Mission bodies that a large withdrawal of non-Christian pupils is bound to follow and that "they will be killing the goose that lay the golden eggs," if they make their institutions subservient to the employment of Christians. The Hindu has devoted a leading article to the subject. "It is for the educational Department," it writes, "to institute an enquiry into the matter in order to see how far the allegations made are founded in fact-and examine how far the policy behind the step said to have been taken by certain Mission bodies is consistent with the principles of State aid." The Lindsay Commission had specifically remarked on the large proportion of non-Christian teachers in Mission schools and Colleges and the Lothian Committee supported by the Viceroy of India recently made an appeal for funds for carrying out the recommendations of that Commission.

A Curious Appointment:—Government has been very unfair to Mr. Faiz Tyebji. He is a much respected citizen, a scholar and an authority on Mahomedan Law on which he has written a work recognised as a standard one. When several years ago the Government of Madras, not finding a suitable Muslim lawyer locally, applied to the Bombay Government the latter recommended Mr. Tyebji as a lawyer in every way worthy to sit on the Bench of the Madras High Court. When he return on the resumption of office by the permanent incumbent, Bombay could find him only a comparatively subordinate judicial position to engage his talents. Since his retirement his services were more than once requisitioned to fill acting vacancies on the Bombay Bench and now, when he is, we believe, past the age at which Judges are regarded in this country as ineligible to dispense justice from the High Court Bench, he is dragged from his well-earned repose and the studies congenial to him, to fill a vacancy as an acting temporary Judge. Government dodging its own rules is hardly a good example to local bodies. Muslim opinion, so far from being gratified, resents such appointments as calculated to create the impression that its claim to be represented in the higher ranks of the Judiciary has to be met in this unusual way. If no suitable candidate is available among the men in active professional practice or in the Judicial branch of the Public Service, one can be secured from another province. Muslims are not as provincial as Hindus.

South African Slimness:—General Smuts speaking at the Empire Day celebrations at Cape Town is reported to have declared that "secession from the Empire was as dead as a dodo so far as South Africa was concerned." The General is not only a soldier and a statesman but also a lawyer, scientist and philosopher.

It will be irreverent, therefore, to say that he was speaking with his tongue in his cheek. The truth, however, is that secession from the Empire is no longer a question for debate because the recent measures adopted by the Union Parliament constitute practical secession. Clause 2 of the principal Bill enacts that "the Parliament of the Union shall be the sovereign legislative power in and over the Union" and that no Act of the British Parliament shall have force in the Union. The King of Britain is allowed to be the King of South Africa but as such he will act solely on the advice of Union Ministers. The right of neutrality in the event of a war between Britain and another country is recognised as also the right of secession. A leading member of the Nationalist Party told an audience that they had ceased to be British subjects. He added that the Seals Bill was the first step towards making South Africa a Republic and that was something new in the British Constitution. The Prime Minister was virtually the President and, he observed, there was no difference between the position of Mr. De Valera in Ireland and that of General Hertzog in South Africa. The only difference is that while the Irish leader carries on a straight fight the African leader has achieved his object insidiously.

The Codex Sinaiticus:—We have received a booklet on "The Mount Sinai Manuscript of the Bible" published by the Trustees of the British Museum. The publication seeks largely to defend the Russian Government's claims to the manuscript Bible as opposed to the recent counter-claims advanced by the monks of the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. An interesting section is devoted to discussing the differences in texts between the Sinaiticus and other Bible manuscripts. Non-Christian readers have regarded his treatment of the problem of the woman taken in adultery as the noblest and most distinctive element in the Christian Gospel. There is nothing to equal it in other religions. The crucifixion, to which Christians generally attach the greatest significance, was after all not Jesus' act nor even sought by him. To make the figure of the crucified Christ the centre of Christianity seems, to the non-Christian at any rate, to build the entire religion on a fortuitous circumstance. Non-Christians will learn with deep regret that in the Codex Sinaiticus, "John vii. 53-viii. 11 (consisting mainly of the episode of the woman taken in adultery) is omitted, as also by the Codex Vaticanus and most of the earliest authorities." Miss Eva Gore-Booth also noted the doubtful authenticity of the episode in her book on John's Gospel but she "passed" it on the ground that the passages relating to it seem appropriate. That may merely be due to the skill of the genius who first conceived the story.

Barter.—When the purchase of the Codex Sinaiticus by the British Museum was first announced an English friend wrote to us citing it as proof of the religious-mindedness of British people that the offer was made in times of depression. The Trustees of the British Museum, however, seem to have grave doubts of the appeal of religion to the public for they call for funds on economic grounds as well. The booklet referred to above concludes: "It may be added that the Russian Government is expending the amount of the price in the purchase of goods from Great Britain; and hence subscribers can feel that in sending their contributions they are not merely to acquire a valuable manuscript for the national library but to provide employment for British workmen." The importance attached to this commercial side of the transaction is emphasised by the following words in the national appeal: "The Vendors have given an undertaking that the money paid will be spent in this country. In other words the £100,000 will be a credit to be used in Great Britain." In the circumstances the gibe about the demand of the Mount Sinai monks for the return of the manuscript, at a stage of their negotiations with the Tzar's Government in 1859, being part of the ordinary conduct of a bargain in Oriental countries, is strangely inappropriate. No Oriental Government would have had the business instinct to win, as the British have done, the best of both worlds. It is significant that in appeals to the British public stress is laid on the economic advantages, possibly in explanation of trading with Russia. Dean Inge had obviously the same object in view when he explained in mail week that Russia had shed the "noxious doctrines of Karl Marx" and become Fascist. When other nations seek to establish trade relations with countries like Russia they just make trade pacts. British leaders first make the moral position sure.

A Jealous Governor:—The Governor of Malta, Sir David Campbell, at a banquet held on Empire Day is reported by Reuter to have scathingly attacked the pro-Italian elements in the Island as rendering lip service to the Empire but behind it belittling everything British and praising everything connected with a neighbouring friendly State, namely, Italy. His Excellency was sure that this was repugnant to Signor Mussolini and his Government. The leader of the Nationalists and ex-Premier, Sir Ugo Mifsud, who had been invited to listen to this outburst, made a dignified protest adding "I drink the health of the Empire, but I was told there would be no political speeches." The practice of drinking is responsible for most after dinner indiscretions. It is a Western and British practice which we do not admire. Eat when you are hungry and drink when you are thirsty, and then only plain water, is a wholesome rule which, if followed, would do more to prevent wars than several Disarmament Conferences. Sir Ugo Mifsud would probably take the Governor's hint and drop paying lip service to the British Empire hereafter. When many Englishmen are not only praising but have actually adopted Signor Mussolini as their model, it is hard on the Maltese leader to have his digestion spoiled by the querulous remarks of a garrulous Governor.

American View of Present Day Japan:—Professor F. R. Eldridge of New York University contributes an interesting article in Current History, in which he discusses Japan's position in the world to-day. Mr. Eldridge arrives at the conclusion that the Japanese have, for the present at any rate, no intention of going to war with any nation. He considers, however, that her future attitude depends largely on the treatment she receives at the hands of Western Powers. He remarks that Japan is faced with a rapidly increasing population and a dearth of food-stuffs as well as raw materials for her industries. The Japanese nation has not been endowed with natural resources. She has to depend largely on obtaining food and raw materials from other countries and selling them the product of her factories. As a strictly commercial nation, her survival depends entirely on trade. Mr. Eldridge points out that Japan is surrounded by countries with a much lower purchasing power and living standard than her own. Commenting on her position in relation to Western Europe and the United States, he remarks "Her factory workers are willing to work harder and for less moneys than that of other countries and this gives her comparative advantage in certain types of manufacture. If the world will not recognise the position and insists upon placing obstacles in the pathway of her own attempt to survive, then, and then only, will Japan fight." Mr. Eldridge, however, has not taken into account the most recent factors in the Japanese situation. So long as it was merely a question of Japanese competition with other Asiatic countries, Europe and America could well adopt the policy of live and let live, towards Japan. The fact that Japanese goods are now competing in European markets, has changed the situation. At the commencement of this year, a cable from Manchester announced that Japanese cloth was being sold much below the local textile products, and Japan was threatening to capture the trade in England. The danger visualised by the European powers, is, perhaps, tremendously magnified to-day. It cannot be denied, however, that the incident is regarded as menacing the very existence of European industries. It has been followed by demands for a standard wage in Japan approximating to the wages of European workers in similar industries and has been largely instrumental in rousing opposition to Japanese national ideals and ambitions in Europe.

Special Constituencies:—A correspondent wants to know whether a special Constituency, such as the Millowners' Association, the Chamber of Commerce or the Indian Merchants' Chamber, can return as its representative to the Legislative Council a person whose principal occupation is not commercial but who may have a connection with—hold shares in—some business or industry. It would seem that some members of the last-named body wanted to nominate the late Mr. Vithalbai Patel as a candidate for election to the Legislature but that the idea failed to find support and was dropped. In the absence of specific qualifications for membership, a special constituency, we suppose, will technically have the right of electing a lawyer or a doctor or a priest as its representative provided he has been admitted to its membership. But it will certainly look anomalous and will reinforce the many strong reasons for the abolition of special constituencies altogether.

The Rope Trick:—We reprinted last week Professor Cannon's account of the rope trick which he witnessed in Indo-China. A prolonged correspondence has been going on in the Times of India on the subject. Several eye-witnesses came forward to contradict correspondents who described the trick as a fraud. One correspondent, an Englishman, quoting chapter and verse showed that the trick was referred to in Shankaracharya's writing as illustrating his doctrine of illusion, Maya. Then the scientists came on the scene. One said that it was the result of mass hypnotism as it did not impress itself on a photographic plate. He had tried to get a snap but in the picture the boy was sitting calmly on the ground beside the showman while he appeared to the crowd, including the photographer, to be lost in the sky. A later correspondent, however, stated that he is in possession of a photograph in which the boy is seen climbing the rope. Another correspondent wrote that the trick might be possible in the tropics where men's brains are soft but not in Europe where men are hard-headed. These hard-headed men really believed that the last War would end War! Nine-tenths of their economic devices and political manouverings are but "rope tricks" and the greatest "rope trick" of all is that the White Paper confers self-government on India.

Sequel to Conversion:—The conversion of the American missionary, Mr. E. Stokes to Hinduism with the name Satyanand, had an interesting sequel in the District Court when Pandit Saranpath, a resident of Kotgarh who performed the conversion ceremony, filed a complaint under Section 509 of the Indian Penal Code against certain Hindus of Kotgarh for alleged boycotting him at a meeting held on October 23 last year.

Delhi Jails:—"Except for a few isolated cases in which incorrigible or terrorist convicts were bent on defying authority by refusing to work or going on hunger-strike, the conduct of the prisoners, generally, was good. The conduct of the warder staff has only been fair and several punishments were inflicted, including one conviction, two dismissals and 11 suspensions. The superior staff worked very satisfactorily in face of the trouble and anxiety caused by the obstructive tactics adopted by several of the accused in the Delhi Conspiracy Case. The number of deaths increased from 6 in 1932 to 83, cerebro-spinal fever claiming 7 victims," writes the Delhi Jail Administration Report.

BOMBAY, JUNE 2, 1934.

REVIVAL OF ANIMAL SACRIFICES.

The revival of animal sacrifices in several places by Hindus is an omen of evil augury. In Kumbhakonam, one of the orthodox Brahman centres in South India, under the auspices of the Shankaracharya and numerous Shastris, twenty-three goats were killed for offering in a Yagna, according to ancient Vedic ritual. In Ratnagiri another Brahman centre in Western India, many animals were killed to propitiate the Deity. In Ellore in the Telugu country, some thousands of animals of all kinds were killed to propitiate Poliramma, the goddess who is supposed to influence the small-pox epidemic. Goats, pigs and fowls are killed and their heads piled up in a mound before the image. Between five thousand and six thousand animals would it was said be sacrificed on the day fixed in the public street; latter in the night buffaloes would be sacrificed. An attempt to get the holocaust averted in the law courts failed, the magistrate holding that there was no likelihood of a breach of the public peace, the ground on which his intervention was sought. An appeal to the High Court resulted in an endorsement of the magistrate's decision. We wish that Mr. Prakasam who sought the intervention of the court, had taken up the higher ground of public policy. It is an irony of circumstance that when the caste Hindus were planning this orgy of animal sacrifice in Ellore, the Harijans of the same place were reported to have resolved to give up animal sacrifices and were taking out daily propaganda processions to promote this object. In the United States several million pigs were slaughtered some months ago and in Ireland some thousands of calves were killed in order to keep up prices. These things do not stir men's minds in the West where the belief that animals were created for the use of man has the sanction of religion. The Vedic Hindus held the same belief. Like the Jews of old they believed in animal sacrifices to propitiate the favour or to appease the anger of the gods. The protests of prophets like Isaiah failed to wean the Jews from the sacrificial religion which continued at the time of Jesus and was finally ended only by the destruction of the Temple and the dispersal of the Jews by the Romans. The teachings of the Upanishads similarly were unsuccessful in weaning the Hindus from the sacrificial Vedic religion and it was Gautama Buddha who by his gracious personality turned people's minds from animal sacrifices to sacrifice of their evil tendencies as the true way of salvation. When Buddhism lost its hold on the Indian people, a Hindu revival followed and the early revivalists were bent on reviving animal sacrifices. It was the great Sankaracharya who fought and overthrew these reactionaries, gave a reverent burial to the sacrificial part of the Vedas and established the Vedanta or the philosophic treatises as the basis of post-Buddhist Hinduism. He was so imbued with Buddhist humanism that he was stigmatised as a veiled Buddha by his theological opponents. Ahimsa, non-killing, became since then organic in Hinduism. With a few exceptions such as the Kalighat at Calcutta, the great majority of Hindu shrines discarded animal sacrifices. Quite recently the Maharani of Travancore abolished such sacrifices in the temples under State control. The Vedic sacrifices were performed with substitutes made of flour where they had not fallen into disuse. The Arya Samajists who went back to the old ritualist Vedas, interpreted the texts in the light of the later doctrine of non-killing. Hindus as a community believe that animal sacrifices are opposed to the principal tenet of their religion and regard the few places where they are still practiced as survivals which must disappear with the spread of education.

The revival of or, to be correct, the stress laid on these sacrifices at the present time is ominous because there is good reason to believe that the religious motive is complicated by others. There is among a section of educated—not as yet very articulate—Hindus a feeling that the depressed condition of the Hindus is largely the result of their renunciation in religion, social habits and in dietary of the will to live by killing animals in order to live. A learned and scholarly exposition of this new tendency is furnished by the excerpt from a paper on the condition of Hindus of the Punjab by Prof. Gulshan Rai which we reprint today. In it the author attributes the subjugation of India by foreign conquerors as having been originally due to the influence of Buddhism on the people who inhabited the North Western Provinces and who were the natural outposts of Hinduism. The fact that Buddhism has had no such deleterious influence on the Japanese, shows that this theory is fundamentally weak. Dr. Barooah, the eminent Pali Professor of Calcutta University, who came to Bombay last week to preside at the annual celebration of Buddha Jayanti vigorously combated the view that Buddhism weakened India's power of resistance. He is justified in his criticism by the fact that the thousand years during which the yellow robe prevailed, were years of great internal prosperity and external security. Indian missions travelled to distant countries and established friendly cultural relations with them. That is by the way. We referred to the paper as indicating a tendency, which is beginning in educated Hindu minds to react with some vehemence against the principle of ahimsa as it affects the destiny of nations. An ancient seer deprecated dwelling overmuch on watchwords and Gandhiji's insistence on non-violence has itself given rise to a revulsion from it in some minds.

realpatidar.com

The example of Europe, the failure of the Disarmament Conference, the doctrines preached openly by Mussolini and Hitler and practised by all the Powers great and little are leading to the conviction that the power of survival of a community is strictly proportionate to its power to fight others successfully. Other causes of an internal character have also helped to encourage this tendency. The Indian mind being rooted in religion, the first signs of any important coming change are to be looked for in that region.

NOTES BY THE WAYFARER.

I wrote last week that the Indian Liberals have no future as their prototypes, the British Liberals, have none. The statement issued this week jointly by Sir Chimanlal Setalvad and Sir Cowasji Jehangir (Jr.) on behalf of their party is the best (and most unexpected) proof of it. Dr. Paranjpye spoke of the soul of Liberalism. The only thing which this document shows to be fundamental to Indian Liberalism is to remain within the British Commonwealth in the hope some day of getting full Dominion Status which, as South Africa has interpreted it, is ninety nine per cent Independence. Except that the King of Britain is allowed to be the King of South Africa and the protection of the British fleet is condescendingly accepted for the defence of its shores, South Africa is a foreign country, as much as Holland or Germany, to Britain and (necessarily) to India. It was said some years ago that the Commander of a Japanese warship which visited South Africa remarked with reference to a slight put upon him and his officers that but for the Union Jack flying over the port he would have resented the affront in a different way. An English acquaintance who was asked why safeguards should be insisted on in the case of India while none was demanded from South Africa, a recently and properly conquered country, said: "That is exactly the trouble. No Englishman need apply" is the order of the day in South Africa. We do not want the same thing to be repeated here. "The Liberals," say Sir Chimanlal and Sir Cowasji, "are firm in their creed of making India a full-fledged Dominion within the Empire." Neither of them is cast for the role of De Valera or General Hertzog who are showing what full-fledged Dominion Status is. If, however, it is their creed that India should become a Dominion of the South African type, the difference between it and Independence is hardly 'fundamental' as they make it out to be. Dominion Status in the case of India is Independence. Bernard Shaw, indeed, thought that it would mean India becoming the dominant partner. India as a Dominion is an etymological absurdity and political camouflage.

Sir Chimanlal and Sir Cowasji say that the other fundamental difference is, that Congressmen have amongst them a minority which has gained the upper hand in Bombay, of persons inclined to Communism. The Liberals at least in Bombay, it is no secret, are bound hand and foot to Capitalism but one hardly expected a public avowal of partnership at this juncture. The vast mass of the Indian people are neither Capitalists nor Communists. Capitalism versus Communism is not an Indian issue. Even in Bombay it is not really an issue though it suits some on both sides to make it seem so. The employer says the Textile Strike is due to the machination of Communists. The Strike leader says that it is due to the iniquity of Capitalists. Really speaking, the Capitalist and the Communist are concomitants. Without the one the other is unthinkable. The difference between them is one of emphasis. The Capitalist wants to get more work for less wages from his employees. The Communist wants to get more wages for less work from his employer. This economic dualism is at the bottom of the class war. The occupational caste avoided this dualism. Every man was born with his work. To strike work was to lose caste. The conflict between Capitalism and Communism will have to be solved on those lines, if it is to be solved peacefully. However that may be, the Liberal Party is not a Bombay but an All-India political party and it is a tactical blunder of the first magnitude—to say the least—to identify itself with either party in this economic struggle in which it should be the mediator. Except that it is opposed to Independence and Communism—both negative items—Sir Chimanlal and Sir Cowasji do not tell us what the fundamentals of their Liberalism positively are. There are in fact none. Gladstone summed up the difference between Liberals and Tories in two pithy sentences. Toryism was based on fear of the people; Liberalism on trust in them qualified by prudence. How does Indian, especially Bombay, Liberalism stand this test? The "cold aspect of practical politics" is all right in its own place but without an ideal to warm it, it cannot become effective as an influence. The Liberal leaders have not only no enthusiasm themselves but discourage and despise it in others. They are not above using Gandhism as they use Communism as a bug-bear to frighten the authorities with. When they had a great opportunity on the introduction of the Montague Chelmsford Reforms to give a national direction to the administration, they with one or two exceptions failed utterly to assert themselves. Both Sir Chimanlal and Sir Cowasji were, if one remembers rightly, trusted members of the Lloyd Administration. But the masterful Governor had it all his own way, a very costly way too to the Presidency, unmindful of the stalwarts of Liberalism at his Council table. By an accident, rare in the experience of Indian publicists, I was present by invitation at a meeting of the Executive Council several years ago. I have since entertained a sincere regard for the independence of English Civilian members on important issues. Their point of view is seldom the popular one if they can help it. But "the man at the plough or loom" who, Lord Curzon declared, was foremost in his mind in all that he did and planned in India, next to the interests of their own Service, is, or used to be, closer to their minds.

The Government Press Note, reprinted elsewhere, justifying the arrest of fourteen Strike leaders under Emergency Powers intended principally for a quite different contingency, will convince only those who do not require to be convinced. In fact, the opinion expressed on the Strike and the motives of the leaders, were more forcibly expressed by Mr. H. P. Mody in his address to the Millowners' Association on which we commented last week. The Government Note refers, as did Mr. Mody, to the twenty points of the Strikers. These are, of course, absurd and the reiteration of them at this time was an act of crass stupidity. Government themselves point out that the personnel of the Strike Committee has been frequently changing, a circumstance which to some extent obviously could not be helped—and there is no doubt that as negotiators, the Strikers cannot stand comparison with their employers. But I am in a position to say that if the Strike leaders had had the same opportunity of explaining their attitude to the head of the Government, as Millowners, he would have found that the twenty points were of no account and a very small concession, coupled with an assurance that Government would see that justice was done to the workers, might have ended the Strike within ten days or a fortnight of its declaration, and the arrests and waste of Police and Magisterial power in dealing with the situation might have been avoided. The second arrest of the leaders has not ended the Strike. On the other hand, four Mills have closed down which till then were trying to carry on. The strikers have refused to avail themselves of the proffered co operation of tried leaders like Messrs. N. M. Joshi and Bakhale.

"HINDU FUNERAL REFORM." (By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

Mr. C. Tejpal's article under the above caption in the Indian Social Reformer of Bombay of the 19th May 1934 calls for a few remarks. The burden of his song seems to be that we Hindus are a nation of corpse bearers, and merit the reproach in South Africa of being named as Indian Coolies; that we must carry our dead no more on our shoulders but in a vehicle like the Christians and Moslems; and that otherwise our caste-system and untouchability won't go.

1. One fails to see how these two institutions are bound together with the mode of carrying our dead and why with the latter the former two should go. Manu (5-85) and other Smritis refer to the principle of untouchability in the following six instances, namely, 1. the touch of a 'Panchama,' 2. of a woman in menses, 3. of an out-caste or degraded man, 4. of a woman in confinement, 5. of a dead body or corpse, and lastly, 6. of one who is himself polluted by the touch of any of the five above. So that it is clear that it does not rest solely on caste-system but comprehends various other principles. Items 1 & 3 alone may, if at all, be said to relate to the question of caste. But items 2 & 4 concern women in general and have nothing to do with it, while item 5 relating to corpses falls wholly outside the range of caste, though it may partake of untouchability. Therefore to say "Hindus in general cannot honestly abolish untouchability since it has its stand on the conduct of Hindu funerals," is only to stress on one point and ignore a lot of others.

2. But, one may ask, what has this funeral reform of carrying the dead on wheels instead of on shoulders got to do with untouchability or removal thereof? Yet the correspondent asserts: "The caste-system and untouchability are relatives to each other but alien to Christianity; yet some of the Indian Christians in the South have caste because of their method of funeral conduct, which is the same as that of the Hindus." By 'funeral conduct' he probably means "conducting the dead, body over shoulder instead of in coffins or on vehicle." Does it follow, then, that the reform will abolish untouchability and caste at one stroke? Is it not a mere accident that the Indian Christians continue to observe the caste and the bier, as certain converted classes among Mahammadans have done the custom or law of inheritance or succession among Hindus? If not mere accident, the real reasons must be sought elsewhere alike in both cases than in the caste or untouchability principles. They may relate to usage convention, economy, or vested interests in property, according to the nature of the case.

3. Next the correspondent waxes eloquent over the corpse-bearer being no better than a cooly, and the Indians (Hindus?) luckily escaping the serious denomination of being a nation of corpse-bearers or coolies, on account of sheer politeness on the part of other people. Is corpse-bearing so bad as to invite such a dubbing? Is it so dishonourable to carry our dead over our own shoulders? If so, why did Manu lay down in 5-104 that while Kinsmen are available strangers must not carry the dead? And why should Vishnu Smriti (19-1-5) repeat it and add that sons must do this duty by their departed father and mother, except where the son was born of a Sudra wife, among the three regenerate classes?

4. The matter then resolves itself into two aspects touched by the correspondent himself. The bier may look ugly to many an eye. But can it be said of the Brahma-ratham of a South Indian Brahman and the decorated palanquin of others? Why should a horse, carriage and driver be hired for the purpose when the deeply mourning relatives can "pay their last tribute of respect," nay of love, to the departed by their own personal service and save some avoidable expenditure? Are not our temple Gods and Goddesses taken in procession over shoulders of devoted men? Was not a hero of mortal fame seated in an elevated chair and carried over his admirers' head in England? Was not Gandhiji drawn in a carriage by his numerous political chelas the other day from the Central Station in Madras? Do not men all the world over take to sometimes enjoying the pleasant burden of their children on their own shoulders during a crowded tamasha or tournament? So it is clear that whenever respect, love or joy takes an excessive form, our very person comes in to shoulder the dear burden, dearer many a time in the case of a departed parent, guru, relative, friend or national hero.

5. Lastly the correspondent says "but the character of Hindu life and death can be gathered from the fact that a Hindu alive is not so much polluted by the touch of others as a dead one is." True, but not for his reason or object. The matter is put in a nutshell by Mauu in 5-104, above quoted, that a Brahmin's corpse is an "Abuti" or sacred oblation to God. Hence the scrupulous care enjoined in this respect by the Sastras. Asawalayana Grihya Sutra might approve or record the custom of carrying the dead body "on a hearse drawn by bullocks," but the genius of the Indian masses has accepted the simpler, easier and more acceptable and congenial mode of carrying the dead over the shoulder instead of in a cold and indifferent manner in a hearse. After all the latter will have to be every time disinfected before a fresh corpse is placed in it lest the previous infection should affect the people, dealing with the body.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE. • (By JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.)

If I would summarize the trends of modern thought and life in the religious field, I would declare that what we have known as the supernatural is everywhere giving way before what we have come to recognize as the natural. Nature is at last coming into her own. What is this matter of secularization for example, but the discovery that politics, education, and business, the regular affairs of every day, are merely a part of the natural processes of man's life upon this planet. Why must a child be baptized at birth, or an old man be given the last unction at death, when birth and death are but the beginning and end of the natural cycle of existence and thus have their own sanctity and beauty. So with morals! Why seek for some revelation of what is right and wrong, when out of the substance of man's own experience there proceeds the secret of the law? Science teaches us the same lesson. There was a time when nature was but the abode of the supernatural; the world was peopled with gods and demons. Phenomena of sun and rain, storm and ocean, were all of them marvels, to be explained in terms of miracle and wonder. Even after Copernicus and Galileo had done their work, Kepler explained the motions of the stars by saying that each was the abode of an angel. Today all such ideas are gone. Science has dethroned the gods, and established in their place the democratic rule of law. The natural, in a word, has swallowed up the supernatural. For now we know that

Out from the heart of Nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old;
The litanies of nations came,
Like the volcano's tongue of flame;
Up from the burning core below
The canticles of love and woe.

It is this passing of the supernatural before the triumph of the natural which makes inevitable the passing of religion as we have known it in years gone by. For religion has always been associated up to our time with the supernatural. Its rites, its ceremonies, its doctrines, its laws, all have developed out of the supernatural concept of the world. But does religion belong exclusively or necessarily to the supernatural? Must it be identified with the idea of miracle? Are there divine processes only in floating ex-heads and dead men's bones, and not in whirling planets and moving tides and blossoming flowers? Is God to be found only in smoking Sinais and Bethlehem mangers, and not in .....the light of setting suns,

And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man?

Is there no religion, in other words, in nature herself? What are we to think of that wonderful hymn found in the note book of Leonardo da Vinci after his death? He had been pondering, this early scientist, upon the wonders of natural law. Moved by the disclosure of what James Russell Lowell so well called "the commonplace of miracle," Leonardo lifted up his cry, "O marvellous Necessity, thou with supreme reason constrainest all effects to be the direct result of their causes, and by a supreme and irrevocable law, every natural action obeys thee by the shortest process."

What is the fundamental truth about religion today? It is that religion springs direct from the heart of man—that religion is life as we feel it within us and see it about us. Where did religion come from? It has its origin not in revelation but in experience—the experience of man wrestling with nature and with his fellows in the stupendous struggle for survival. Religion may be best defined as man's reaction upon the universe, upon the infinite and eternal realities to which his eyes first open on the earth. In the early days this reaction was predominantly that of fear. Man did not know and understand the processes of life, and therefore was afraid of them, and by his religion he sought to propitiate them. In time his ignorance began to turn into wonder, which led to awe and reverence and worship. Then came the beginnings of knowledge; and with knowledge, universe began to take on a kindlier, friendlier aspect. In our day, with the triumphs of science, we are extending the bounds of knowledge and mastering the processes of life with the result that we are accepting the universe instead of fearing or adoring it. We run to welcome and receive it, instead of running away from it, or bowing down before it. We gather life up into our embrace that it may become a part of us and we a part of it. Our desire is the desire of the poet—to be "at one with the perfect whole." Knowledge, in other words, has led us away from fear, through adoration, to love. We have discovered a passion of fellowship with all created things. This passion is a new religion. It is the religion suggested at least by Bertrand Russell, in his little book "What I Believe," which he identifies with "the good life" as "guided by knowledge and inspired by love."

To see this kind of life as religion is to come to a new understanding of the process of our age. What is really happening today is just the opposite of what seems to be happening. The religion which is disappearing today is the religion of the supernatural. But this religion of the supernatural, in the very meaning of the word, is superstition and ought to disappear. True religion, however, religion understood as the spiritual expression of all things natural and normal, this is not disappearing; on the contrary, it is floating in like a great tide from out the deep, and flooding all the area of man's existence. Do I speak of secularization? What is this but the sublime discovery that politics, education, business, the personal affairs of every day, all pertain to the soul of man and therefore are embodiments of this spirit? Ethical autonomy—the breaking away of morals from the sanction of religion! What is this but the discovery that morals is its own religion, exercises its own authority, and reveals its own necessity? As for science, what is this but the mind of man delving its persistent way to truth, which is the heart of God? Religion going? On the contrary, religion is only just beginning to come. At the moment all is confusion; the forces about us seem to be the forces of destruction. But this is because superstition is in the way and must be removed, as the walls of some building must be removed and carted off before the new edifice, already conceived and charted, can rise in a soaring structure of steel and stone. Temporarily this means chaos—not in three hundred years has the religious world known such chaos as that which engulfs us at this hour! But in the darkness there broods upon the waters a creation which will some day bring a new world into birth.

As I look ahead and try to discern the outlines of religion as it will dwell among us in days to come, I seem to see certain things:

1. There will be no gods in the future—no "Jehovah, Jove, or Lord"—but, to quote the words of Charles W. Elliot, in his "The Religion of the Future," "one omnipresent, eternal energy, informing and inspiring the whole creation at every instant of time and throughout the infinite spaces."

2. There will be no churches, as we have churches today. There will be just the community, with its sacred places of the common life—here a quiet spot like the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, where the soul may go apart and pray; there a vast arena, like the Civic Auditorium in Cleveland or the open park in St. Louis, where men may come together in pursuit of truth and beauty.

3. There will be no Sundays, as we have Sundays today. There will be just the endeavour of the common life to make every day a holy day, one hour of each day an hour of communal consecration, and regularly the festal days when all may seek for joy and recreation.

4. There will be no bibles, as we have our Bible today. There will just be the assembled literature of all ages and peoples, the works of universal genius sanctified by usage, and growing with the growing vision of men's minds and hearts.

5. There will be no prophets or saviours, no Messiah, Christ, or Son of God come down to earth to save mankind from death. There will be only the great and good among mankind—seekers after truth, heroes of justice and the right, champions of liberty, servants of love; a new calendar of saints—Isaiah, Jesus, Francis of Assisi, George Fox, all of these; but also Darwin and Pasteur, Lincoln and Emerson, Whitman and Tolstoy, Romain Rolland and Mahatma Gandhi.

6. There will be no religions as we have them today, but simply religion. This means that there will be no sects and denominations—no Confucianism, Hinduism, Judaism, Christianity, Theosophy. These names, and many like them, may survive, but they will be like the "many mansions" in God's house—just so many parts of the one inclusive whole, which is the divine brotherhood of humankind.

So will the world become as one great temple, and men as one great family, and all true life divine. Longfellow caught the vision when he saw, in the happy days to come, that universal church,

As lofty as the love of God,
As ample as the wants of man.

BUDDHISM IN CHINA

Mr. Tan Yun-Shan, a Chinese scholar, who is trying to establish a Sino-Indian Cultural Society with a view to blending the Indian and Chinese cultures, delivered a lecture, entitled "Buddhism in China" on the 25th May, at the hall of the Mahabodi Society, Calcutta.

Dr. B. K. Sen was in the chair.

After tracing the history of the introduction and development of Buddhism in China, the speaker said that during the early years of the Tsin dynasty, all the Emperors had faith in Buddhism, the country then was peaceful and the nation powerful; Buddhism also enjoyed as much prosperity as ever before. But towards the end of the Manchurian regime, Buddhism, as well as the Chinese nation itself sank into a state of obscurity and degradation. It was during this time that European civilisation poured into the Far East like a stream upsetting the Chinese minds. The old system of civil examination was abolished, new schools after the European model were established and scholars were sent abroad to learn the western methods and pursue the scientific knowledge. Buddhism, consequently, sank into the darkest bottom.

In the first few years of the Republic of China, peace and order was not restored and Buddhism was there silently watching and waiting for chance. There was first the "May 4th Movement" of 1919 by students, then known as the New Cultural Movement, but many of the new scholars, as the time was not ripe enough, were merely "embroidered pillows" without any true cultivation of character and knowledge, so that their words were shallow and their deeds unfruitful. The significance of philosophy was too difficult for them to understand, so that attacks were made on religion at random and their attitude towards Buddhism was far from being sincere and friendly. It was only after the success of the nationalist movement and the establishment of the Central Government at Nanking seven years ago that the tendency of blindly imitating the West was checked. Now, religion is protected and promoted, especially Buddhism revives with fresh energy and commands the faith of a great many people; even of some leading members of the Government. The Chairman of the National Government, the President of the Examination Yuan of the National Government, the President of the Judiciary Yuan have much reverence for and deep belief in Buddhism. General Chiang Kai-Shek respects Buddhism and has built in his native district a grand "Vihara" on the beautiful Such-Tau hill. There is, therefore, in China a splendid opportunity to bring about a renaissance of Buddhism.

Buddhist religion is divided into as many as ten schools in China. Fortunately, these different schools have now gradually harmonised themselves and at the present moment it is very difficult to distinguish one from the other. Buddhist leaders are now striving for a movement of unity and have built up at different places Buddhist Associations, while there is the Chinese Buddhists General Association at Shanghai to serve as the Headquarters of Buddhists in China. So far as the Buddhist literature and its teaching is concerned, there is an unusual demand for it, for it is regarded as a kind of essential knowledge and the perusal of such literature is also considered an important factor. Buddhism has influenced almost everything in China; her thought, literature, language and arts, habits and customs of her people, all bear the stamp of Buddhism. Of the present Chinese life, at least a lesser half may be said to be Buddhist. But it is a pity that in recent years the Chinese Buddhists pay attention neither to international propaganda nor to the study of Sanskrit or other foreign languages. So that they are handicapped in preaching their religion. On the other hand foreigners not conversant with Chinese tongue fail to appreciate the beauty and conception of Buddhism as embodied in the Chinese languages.

Replying to the question as to how Buddhism could make itself felt in China so profoundly, the speaker said that its answer was to be found in the Chinese culture which is moulded by the "golden mean" hence adaptable to "harmony" and specially rich in the spirit of great unity and "universal Ahimsa." The Chinese sages in all times teach people the virtue of magnanimity by the metaphor of the "great Ocean," so that the Chinese people are apt to show a receptive and magnanimous attitude to any other civilisation of the world and try to assimilate and reform it. That is why China can contain the different religions and yet be free from the destructive religious wars which have filled up the pages of world history. The teachings of Buddha and Confucius are not far from each other and the cultures of India and China are also similar to each other in many respects, so Buddhism is able to reach its special development in China. Today, is the opportune moment to make efforts for a universal propaganda and for a cosmopolitan salvation through Buddhism which is gradually being appreciated throughout the whole world. It is reported that the Mahabodi Society is contemplating to establish at Sarnath, an International Buddhist University. This is a great work and the speaker hoped for its early realisation. It is of urgent need that all the Buddhist countries must join their hands together for world salvation.

Father Blatter:—The Rev. Father Ethelbert Blatter, S. J., Ph. D., F. L. S., died on Saturday at the Deccan Hospital, Poona, after a long illness. The funeral took place on Sunday at the Sepulchre cemetery, where the Archbishop of Poona conducted the service. It was attended by a large number of his colleagues, friends and admirers from Bombay and Poona.

THE INFLUENCE OF BUDDHISM IN NORTH INDIA.

Prof. Gulsan Rai contributes an interesting series of articles in The Tribune of Lahore in which he discusses the position of Hindus in the Punjab. Writing of the part played by Buddhism he remarks:-

If we look carefully into the present distribution of Muslim population of India, it is a very significant phenomenon to note, that all those tracts of land in this country which were formerly centres of Buddhism, are today centres of Islam. At the time of the Buddhist emperor Kanishka, who probably ruled from 120 to 160 A. D., Sindh, Baluchistan, Afghanistan, North West Frontier Province, Kashmir, and Western Punjab, were all Buddhist in population. Today an overwhelming proportion of the population in these lands is Muslim. The Pala kings of Bengal, who ruled in Bengal and Bihar from 740 A. D. to 1070 A. D., and in Bihar from 740 to 1197, are known to be staunch Buddhists. In their time East Bengal was a centre of Buddhism. Today it is a centre of Islam. The natural inference one can draw from this is that it was the Buddhist population in India, and not the Hindus, who became converted to the faith of the Arabian prophet Muhammed. In our present day histories we are taught that the Muslim rulers of India converted the Hindus to the faith of Islam at the point of the sword. Stray individual rulers may have some time done it, but they could not in any case have brought about mass conversions. We know that the centres of Muslim political power in India have been at Delhi, Agra, Lucknow, Jaunpur, Golkanda, Bijapur, Ahmadnagar, and Ahmedabad in Gujarat Kathiawar. Some of the kings in these places have been very bigotted Muslims. And yet we find that almost the entire population round about these capital towns is to this day mainly Hindu. No, the sword could not have, at any rate in India, brought about the conversion in mass of the people to the faith of Islam. If it had been so, I would have considered Hinduism to be a failure as a spiritual force. If it had been so, it would have been unable to produce personalities like Rana Pratap, Sivajee, Guru Govind and Hakikat Rai. If it had been so it would have, like the ancient faiths of other countries in the world, long ago disappeared under the hammering blows of 25 centuries of invasions. Really the fact is that all those parts of the country which had, before the arrival of the Muslims in India, been reclaimed by orthodox Hinduism, have remained Hindu in population to this day. Those people who had lost faith in the Vedas, those who had trampled under foot the structure of society laboriously built up by the Aryan Rishis and Munis, and those who had ceased to take pride in their own culture and civilisation, it is they who easily became slaves of a foreign culture and civilisation, imported into the country by foreign invaders.

The Buddhists in north-western India became not only themselves lost to Indian culture and civilisation, but they also brought about the enslavement of the rest of India. The Buddhists lived in the region which is called the sword hand of India. Buddhist religion had taught them to hold Vedic culture and civilisation in contempt. They attached so exaggerated a value to the idea of the brotherhood of man, that they altogether lost sight of the principle of nationality. They became so extreme followers of the doctrine of non-violence, that they neglected all military preparations for the defence of the country. The result was that the people living in the region watered by the Indus and its tributaries which is of so great a strategic importance to the rest of India, lost all ideas of patriotism, and did not consider it worthwhile to fight in defence of Aryan culture and civilisation. For the next seven hundred years north western India was under the military, political and cultural domination of foreigners. North Western India now became a base for the subjugation of the rest of India. Within two hundred years after the conquest of the Punjab, the whole of the Ganges valley was conquered, and within another hundred years, Muslim arms reached Cape Camorin. It took the Muslims quite 400 years to conquer north western India. They took hardly twenty years to conquer the whole of the Ganges valley. Ala-ud-din Khilji took less than ten years to conquer the whole of the Deccan and South India.

For full five hundred years after the conquests of Mahmud, the Punjab and other parts of north western India remained lost to Indian culture and civilisation. But help again came from the Ganges valley. First came into the Punjab the Yogis, the followers of the sect of Guru Gorakhnath, who lived in Oudh somewhere in the 13th century. This sect had combined the old Hindu philosophic systems of Jaimini and Patanjali, that is to say Karma Mimansa and Yoga, and given to it a flavour of Muslim Sufism. They, like the old Buddhists, established monasteries, and then began to preach their faith to the people. They became respected even among the Muslims, and to this day they possess in the Punjab the title of Peers. Then came into this part of the country the Sanyasis, the followers of the sect founded by Swami Sankaracharya. They too established monasteries, and filled the country side with their preachers and friars. After them came into the country the Bairagis the followers of Swami Ramanand who lived in Benares in the 15th century. After Swami Ramanand, the Punjab, it seems, became flooded with the preachers of all kinds, who came from the United Provinces, and re-awakened the Hindus of the north west to the political and cultural greatness of the ancient Aryans. A great amount of credit is due to the four Sadhu fraternities of the Yogis, the Sanyasis, the Bairagis, and the Udisis, in re-awakening the Hindus of the Punjab. They certainly put a new life into the souls of the Hindus, who were being crushed under the heels of foreign invaders. It was under such an atmosphere that the great Sikh movement rose in the Punjab. Guru Nanak lived from 1469 to 1539. He and his nine successors, the Sikh Gurus sought to establish in the north west a spiritual empire in the hearts of the Hindus. The people of the Ganges valley have always come to the rescue of the people living in the region of the Indus and its tributaries, whenever they are lost to Aryan culture and civilisation.

WILL AUSTRALIA BREAK UP?

Mr. John Rawdon writes in Current History:-

About a year ago Western Australia held a referendum in which a large majority of its 450,000 inhabitants voted for secession from the Australian Commonwealth, of which it is one of the six federated States. In the United States, which is accustomed to granting the importance of sectional interests, it does not appear so strange, as it does to English commentators, that so small a population should be willing to face the difficulties and responsibilities of independent statehood. Geographical factors are of overwhelming importance in Australia, which has fewer inhabitants than those of New York City but an area almost exactly the same as that of the Continental United States. It is therefore natural enough that people who live in the remote regions should feel that their interests are neglected at Canberra, the Commonwealth capital in favour of more populous districts.

Western Australia has been joined by other States, particularly Tasmania and South Australia, in protesting against the proportions in which revenue is allocated to Federal and state purposes. At Canberra, on the other hand, there has been a feeling that the Federal Government's powers should be increased if it is to function efficiently, for the Australian Constitution, like that of the United States, leaves the residuary powers to the States and not, as in Canada, to the Federal Government. As a direct consequence of Western Australia's threat of secession and of the discontent prevailing elsewhere, and on the suggestion of Mr. Lyons, the Federal Prime Minister, a constitutional conference of the Federal and State Premiers met on February 16, to review Australia's thirty-three years of federation. It immediately became clear that there was a sharp conflict of interest. Mr. Stevens of New South Wales was the only one of the State Premiers who defended the Federal Government's point of view; the others put forward various plans to obtain greater revenue for their States.

Prime Minister Lyons, in his opening speech, held out little hope of financial concessions, which would involve increased taxation and might threaten the Commonwealth's capacity to pay its way. He referred to a resolution by the five dissident Premiers which advocated, unless unification was the ultimate goal, amendment of the Constitution as the only way of putting the States on a stable financial footing, and he pointed out to them that they had not proposed any specific amendment. He deplored any suggestion that constitutional changes should be made on a depression basis, and suggested that the depression was the chief cause of troubles. He then asked for Federal control of inter-state shipping of minimum wages and hours of labour, and of company law, films, aviation, broadcasting, unlawful associations and fisheries.

Premier Stevens of New South Wales, dissenting from the resolution, said that the State owed what credit they had to the Federal guarantee of interest on the whole public debt. He proposed, however, that the temporary grants to the smaller States should be made permanent, and that the Commonwealth should make some further financial concessions.

Acting Premier Menzies of Victoria said that the Federal guarantee was poor compensation for the per capita payments to the States which had been made before the years of crisis. He contended that, failing the adoption of a virtually unitary government (which no one seems to want), the Constitution must be amended to insure that the States would have sufficient financial resources "to discharge in their sovereign capacity the duties reserved to them." Mr. Menzies's views apparently did not impress the Federal Ministers who were inclined to regard the financial difficulties of the States as temporary; but he was enthusiastically backed up by Premier Butler of South Australia who said he would leave the conference if some concessions were not made, and by Premier Collier of Western Australia, who renewed the threat of secession. Sir Walter Lee, Premier of Tasmania, endorsed this threat.

Mr. Lyons, replying to the criticisms of the States, reminded the Premier that the present conference was experimental and had no authority to accede to any of the proposals made, and that suggestions for constitutional reform had to be submitted to Parliament and to popular referendum. None of the State Premiers, he said, had made concrete suggestions in regard to the means whereby Commonwealth liabilities might be lessened in order to make concessions to the States.

The conference then went into committee and considered certain practical schemes concerning revenue. None of the proposals made were acceptable to all the participants, and the financial discussions were finally abandoned as abortive on February 26, although the Commonwealth Government appears to have agreed that the necessity for a constitutional amendment would not be regarded as a bar to any proposal which was otherwise acceptable. In these circumstances the States proved to be quite unwilling to grant the Federal Government the powers which it desired, and the conference broke up on February 28. Its practical decisions were limited to the agreement that the Federal Government shall control whaling, pearling and Beche-de-mer (trepang) fishing, thus providing a romantic subject of study for Federal officials who live far from the sea, and permitting the ratification of the recent international agreement on whaling.

The States, with the exception of New South Wales to which the Federal Loan Council granted the statutory borrowing authority for which it asked, were bitterly disappointed, but the conference was not entirely without result, for the discussion of constitutional problems was valuable and informative. One of the most important of the questions dealt with was inter-state trade; a commission of experts is to be set up to recommend how a clearer delimitation of Federal and State powers can be made. Although the financial difficulties of the States (which collectively still have a budget deficit) remain to be solved, and the threat of withdrawal from the Commonwealth has not finally been staved off, their readiness to disagree on constitutional problems is perhaps a sign that the worst of Australia's economic troubles are over.

The exact nature of these troubles and the methods adopted to meet them are explained in Professor Douglas Copland's book, "Australia in the World Crisis 1929-1933," which has recently been published in the United States.

Although Sydney and Melbourne, each with a population of over 1,000,000, contain about a third of Australia's inhabitants, the country's chief resources are agricultural, and the depression was felt early and severely. It became extremely difficult to find the interest on Australia's large foreign obligations; the farmers' income fell, and since their purchases fell, too, there was much unemployment in the cities. The Government consulted a committee of economists, of whom Professor Copland was the chief, and was advised to adopt certain remedies.

First, the economists endorsed, as a means of preventing credit deflation, the depreciation of the currency which had already occurred, and which the Commonwealth Bank found little difficulty in maintaining at a given level. Second, they recommended comprehensive but limited deflation, including the lowering of wages. Third, they suggested an extension and cheapening of credit through conversion of public loans to lower interest rates. This affected external as well as internal bondholders, and was carried out with the co-operation of the London money market, while private interest, rents and so on, were cut by legislation. Fourth, no encouragement was given to any attempt to create an artificial scarcity by withholding raw materials from the market; the wool crop was sold each year for what it would bring, thus leaving a clear field for the future. Fifth, the tariff, which had been raised in 1930, was lowered, since the chief problem was to raise agricultural rather than industrial prices, and to facilitate exports.

Australia differs in its economic position from industrial countries in that its chief source of prosperity lies in the export markets, and wages are, more clearly than in other countries, rather an item in costs than a basis for increased demand. The theories of Australian economists, though they would not all find favour elsewhere, have nevertheless been very well borne out in practice, and the prompt disposal of stocks has enabled the wool-growers to take full advantage of the improvement of the wool market in Great Britain, America and Japan.

In Professor Copland's view recovery would have been more complete if the tariff had been further reduced, but the manufacturing interests and the industrial trade unions are now exerting a great deal of pressure to have it restored to its former level, in order to benefit by the increased wealth of the farmers. The unions are also beginning to demand a restoration of the wage cuts, although the Federal arbitration Court has recently further lowered the minimum wage.

THE BOMBAY MILL STRIKE.*

Government have again found it necessary in the interests of the public safety and peace to arrest and detain under Section 3 of the Bombay Special (Emergency) Powers Act 14 persons who are professed Communists connected with the present leadership of the Bombay Mill Strike. It has for several days been evident that these persons, and others acting under their directions, have been abusing the liberty of speech allowed to them by delivering to the mill hands speeches of an inflammatory nature which had small reference to any dispute in the textile industry and the main object of which was to incite the strikers to attack the police and to defy all lawful authority. Such speeches have lately resulted in an increased tendency to the commission of acts of violence against loyal workers and the police. On the night of the 23rd May, after speeches of this character had been delivered on the Esplanade Maidan, a procession of strikers attempted to force its way by a prohibited route and violently attacked the police whilst being dispersed. Such demonstrations are now being instigated and organized by the strike leaders with the deliberate object of bringing the strikers into conflict with the police. A further indication of the character of the present leadership is contained in a leaflet issued on the 23rd May under the signature of the Secretaries of the Joint Strike Committee in which an appeal is made to the railway, dock, municipal and tramway workers to spread the strike all over Bombay and thus to launch a general campaign against the existing order of Society. It is significant that similar advice is given in an anonymous leaflet issued in the name of the Communist Party of India in which workers of all industries are urged to join the strike, collect arms and ammunition and fight the Police and the Military.

In now removing the persons responsible for these methods of leadership of the strike Government have considered only the requirements of the peace and safety of the City and have not departed from their previous attitude towards the strike itself. The present position of government in regard to the mill hands and Millowners is as follows:

On the 9th May the Secretaries of the Joint Strike Committee sent to Government and the Millowners a statement of 20 demands for which they alleged that the mill hands had gone on strike. On the 19th May Government addressed an enquiry to the Secretaries of the Joint Strike Committee asking for particulars of the constitution of this Committee and its authority to speak for the textile workers as it was alleged that such authority had been given by the two Textile Trade Unions. As there appear to be almost daily changes in the personnel of the Secretaries they were also asked to state their authority for the statement of 20 demands, some of which were not within the power of the millowners to grant and appeared to have no relationship to an industrial dispute. Government have so far received no reply to this letter. As regards the Millowners the correspondence has already been made public in which, on the invitation of Government, the Millowners' Association have confirmed the fact that they have no intention of making any further alterations in wages or conditions of labour until the results of the investigation of these matters already instituted by Government have been published and considered.

Government are aware that the Municipal Corporation and other bodies have suggested the establishment of a Board of Conciliation. Government understand that the bodies making such suggestions probably do not refer to the establishment of a Board of Conciliation as defined in the Trade Disputes Act, 1929, for the purposes there specified, but they contemplate a small body which would seek in some manner to bring both sides to a settlement. After careful consideration Government think that action in this direction is not likely to be effective before the publication next month of the report of the investigations now being held by Government.

INDIA'S METALLIC RESERVES.

Sir Montague Webb, who only recently sent a cablegram to President Roosevelt in connection with the free mintage of silver, has issued the following statement to the Press:

"There is a talk of Great Britain making another 'token' payment next month to the United States in silver. India should be keenly on her guard, lest another twenty millions of her precious monetary metal are quietly removed without her permission and then not properly paid for.

"Last year, it would be recalled, in pursuance of the Hilton-Young Policy of Monetary Restriction and Silver demonetisation, 20,000,000 ounces of India's silver were, without the Indian Legislature's permission, quickly shipped to the United States, under arrangement with the British Government.

"But, when the United States generously accepted 20,000,000 ounces of silver from Great Britain as a 'token' payment towards Britain's liabilities to the United States, President Roosevelt credited Great Britain with the same 'fifty pence per ounce' that India had been compelled (by her own default) to pay the United States for the silver in 1918-19."

"But Great Britain only credited India with twenty, and seven-sixteenths pence per ounce which was, of course, more than the current market rate at the time. But why was India not credited with the full 50 pence per ounce that she paid?"

"Therefore it is of vital importance that, if England makes a 'token' payment in silver to the United States next month, she does not do so by withdrawing precious metal from India. The wording of the Reserve Bank of India Act and the recent issue in Calcutta by the Government of three crores of rupee notes based not on silver, but on the Government of India's sterling paper balances lying (quite uselessly and unnecessarily) in London, are now secretly working to push India off silver (just as the British themselves have been forced off gold) so that India, with a paper currency here based on a paper currency there may be more easily controlled within the sterling (paper) area in which the London money powers are working to enmesh and control the whole world."

* Government Press Note.

FROM CATHOLICS TO LUTHERANS.

Sengaraiyur, a fertile village on the banks of the Coleroon, eight miles from Lalgudi, situated on the border of the district just opposite to Tirukattupalle on the other side of the river, in the Tanjore district, was the scene of great enthusiasm yesterday when more than 3,000 families who had professed the Roman Catholic faith, or of late had become 'Self-Respectors,' became converts to the Lutheran Mission of the Protestant Church. A Conference of the villagers in the vicinity was held at the same time to declare their intention publicly not only to all people in the two districts but to mobilise their own forces and be present at the inauguration service held at the village.

The conference commenced its proceedings with a prayer by Rev. Manuel of Irungalur, Mr. V. O. Arpudasami, in requesting Dr. A. Mathuram, to declare the Conference open, recounted the various difficulties and disabilities under which they had suffered in the Roman Catholic Church, and hoped that their intention to change to Protestantism would result in their regeneration. He appealed to the Christian community as a whole not to call them Adi-Dravidas or depressed classes, but as Tamilians and sons of Bharata Mata in the same way as people similarly placed in France and England called themselves as French and English people.

Dr. A. Mathuram, in declaring the Conference open, read an address, in the course of which he congratulated the Christian Harijans on devoting their attention to the consideration of spiritual subjects when political and social subjects loomed large in all Conferences. He outlined the benefits of British rule and Christian influence for the good of India and emphasised the need for the obliteration of all caste distinctions, particularly among Christians in the precincts of the Church. Dr. Mathuram warned his fellow-religionists not to fall into the trap of those who would lure them by promising impossible things in regard to their political status and advised them to give up the drink habit, to lead clean and pure lives and above all, to be united and act in fear of God.

Mr. T. Xavier in the course of his welcome address stated that the community was suffering under great disadvantages which they represented to the Roman Catholic Church first with fear, then with obedience; but the Church had turned a deaf ear to their repeated requests.

Mr. Das Manickam, M. A. Ph. D., Headmaster, Union Christian High School, Madura, who was formally voted to the chair, then delivered an address in Tamil in the course of which, he referred to the condition of Negroes in America who had advanced a great deal during the last sixty years. He was often asked while in America about the condition of the depressed classes in India and he was not ashamed to tell the Americans of the efforts taken by reformers and the various missions to improve their lot. Whatever others might do for them, the community had to rely on themselves for their own uplift, although it could not be denied that extraneous help was necessary. Reviewing the work of the Christian Missionaries in India, the President paid a tribute to their great educational enterprise and South India, he considered, in particular, owed them a deep debt of gratitude. It could also be found that where education was spread, Christianity coexisted. It seemed to him that they had decided to become converts to the Protestant faith and the Lutheran Mission to which he belonged. He would write the Trichinopoly Correspondent of the Hindu, ask them the same question he was asked by others, how long would such mass conversion endure?

Would the movement continue to inspire the same belief in the individuals as single conversions; in other words, would those thousands who joined the new Faith that day continue to remain their for ever? Continuing the speaker said that he took some pains to examine the statistics of the spread of Christianity and found that the percentage of mass conversions worked at 80 per cent. Where whole families and villages decided on changing faith, there were no such difficulties and mass movements of this kind were quite in keeping with the spirit and social custom of India.

The Conference passed resolutions most important of which was the unanimous declaration of allegiance to the Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church from that day with a prayer to the Lutheran Church to receive them in their fold and to confer upon them such privileges and concessions as were granted to Depressed Classes of the Lutheran Church in other districts.

After the inauguration service conducted by Rev. D. S. Pichai followed by a benediction by Rev. T. M. Rajendrum, the Conference terminated.

PURDAH.

"Miss Jahan Ara" writes in the Mahratta of Poona :—

How many of the Indian Muslim women observe purdah? Not more than fifteen per cent. This might come as a surprise to some but it is true. Eighty per cent. of the Indian Muslim women live in villages and cannot afford the costly luxury of observing purdah invented by the upper middle and aristocratic classes living in towns and cities. The peasant women work in the fields working shoulder to shoulder with their men and have no time to think of expensive frivolities like the veil and the burkha. Hard indeed would be the lot of the Indian peasant if the female members of his household confined themselves to their homes and spent their time in idle gossip like their urban sisters, instead of helping him with his work. Nor does purdah prevail among town labourers whose women are earning members of their families and even if they do not actually go to work, they have to do household and domestic work which naturally necessitates their coming out of their homes. A labourer earning a few rupees a month who goes to work early in the morning and returns late in the evening can hardly be expected to keep a servant, only to keep his wife in purdah. But the world is so used to talking in terms of the ruling upper classes that again and again it is repeated that Muslim women in India observe strict purdah without realising that the bulk of Muslim population in this as well as in other countries is too poor to think of such things.

The evils of purdah system have often been discussed. But to me it seems that so far very little attention has been paid to the most important—the economic aspect of the problem. It is not perhaps realised how much this practice costs a lower middle class family. Strict observance of purdah means that the ladies are not expected to go out and do their own shopping and therefore servants have become an absolute necessity even in families of meagre monthly incomes. Whenever a lady has to travel, a male relative must accompany her however much expense and worry it may mean. Earning a living is of course considered too vulgar for gentle ladies and thus women are reduced to a position that is a dubious cross between an expensive maid-servant and an unamusing plaything.

• An uncle of mine who is an ardent supporter of this form of rigorous imprisonment for women, when told of the disastrous effect purdah had on the health of women, complacently said, "Why, if they did sufficient exercise in their own homes and made a thousand rounds of their court-yards daily, they would never fall ill." When I asked him to try this exercise himself and not to go out of the house for a few days, he pondered for a while and then decided: "Well if you think you are all tired of the four walls of your homes, go out in burkhas." I suggested to him to experience walking in this moving tent one day and then tell me how he enjoyed it. The discussion abruptly came to an end with his final remark, "Well, I am not a woman."

Now this is exactly the position taken up by men who support purdah. Just because they are men and we are unfortunate to have been born women, they think they have a right to keep us shut up in houses. Complacency thy name is Man! Having satisfied themselves that they are somehow superior to women they refuse to listen to arguments. Why should they care that thousands of purdah women die every year of tuberculosis and consumption just because their lungs never breathe fresh open air, because they are condemned to live in unhygienic houses? Why should it trouble them that every third purdah woman suffers from hysteria because she is denied all forms of recreations and diversion and eternally destined to look at the maddeningly familiar walls of her house that constitute the boundaries of her miserable world? Yes, why should they care? They are not women!

A story was published some years ago of a Chinese prisoner who had been condemned for imprisonment in a dark cell from which he was taken out after twenty years of servitude. When he was brought out of the cell into the strong sunlight, his eyes were blinded by the so long unfamiliar glare of the sun and he was so scared that he begged the warder to let him go back to his dark cell.

Indian women who are content to remain in purdah are in a similarly pathetic position and they refuse to come out of their dark cells fearing lest they be blinded by the sun or freedom so long denied to them. Such women are found not only among Mussalmans but also among other communities. Though the burkha may be the exclusive symbol of Moslim women, seclusion of women is rigorously enforced in certain sections of the Hindus also. A movement is already afoot for the abolition of purdah both among the Hindus as well as the Mussalmans but its progress is still slow and confined to those who have been made to discard purdah not to share the burdens and responsibilities of men but only to become 'society butterflies.' They don't seem to realise that they are still in the same interior position — mere playthings of Man. It is high time women themselves took the initiative and united in a determined attempt to rid themselves of the shackles of traditions and to assume their rightful position—equal partners of man in life.

Men who are conscious of the evils that have crept in our society because of utter seclusion of women, will undoubtedly help us in this task. But it is wrong to depend on them in a task that primarily concerns ourselves. We should remember two things: let us be free not to be frivolous but to work as our sisters work in the villages, let us do it ourselves without waiting for the men to come and release us. For if we waited for them the chances are the hour of our deliverance may never come.

NOTES

Unity a Shibboleth:—It is high time that Indian publicists gave up harping on the need of unity among the Indian communities, particularly Muslims and Hindus. The old generation of leaders seldom spoke of unity but there was if not more of unity at least very much less of disunity between the Hindus and Muslims then. For the last fifteen years we have talked of nothing but unity and, as a Muslim correspondent wrote to Gandhiji, there was never a time when there was more disunity than now, unity, like all essentials of life such as sleep, health of body and peace of mind, is best induced as an incident—something which has an intrinsic value of its own apart from its particular value to our personal or sectional convenience or comfort. Sleeplessness is never cured by worrying over how to get rid of it. Chronic anxiety about one's health predisposes a man or woman to ill-health as nothing else does. Peace of mind follows, as the Gita teaches and as every one can prove to himself, immediately on ceasing to think of oneself as the centre of the Universe. There is no unity between Hindus and Muslims. Notwithstanding that fact the world moves on and India with it. In as much as they reflect the fact that Hindus and Muslims have existed as separate communities for centuries, that whatever may be the teaching of the Koran or the Vedas they hold diametrically opposite views in certain matters of conduct and that historical events have left racial memories behind which are not wholly effaced, communal electorates represent some of the realities of Indian life and cannot be got rid of on abstract grounds of being incompatible with Democracy or Nationalism. We would, therefore, give up trying to cajole, bribe or bully any community which fears for its safety into joint electorates. On the contrary, we would invite every community or even sect or caste which wants it, to claim and help it to get a separate electorate to itself. But we would on no account allow any weightage, not because it is undemocratic or anti-national, but because it is a species of favouritism calculated to turn communities against one another. Instead of fighting against separate electorates which represent an existing fact, we should fight against weightages which are based on a fiction. It is the weightages which add to the attractions of separate electorates and if weightages are abolished, separate electorates too will lose much of their fascination.

Asia and Europe:—The death of Admiral Togo recalls memories of the Russo-Japanese War which marked the opening of a new chapter in Euro-Asiatic relations. The destruction of the Russian Fleet in the Sea of Japan undermined the Tsarist regime and paved the way for the Soviet Republic. It raised hopes in all Asiatic countries which till then had accepted with almost fatalistic credulity the pretensions of Western civilisation, not only in the military and industrial but also in the moral and social fields, to unapproachable excellence culminating in Kipling's doggerel about East and West. In the person of Togo the East met and overthrew the West in the person of the ill-fated Rozhdestvenski. History has moved forward since then at a terrific pace and Japan today faces the Western world not only as an acknowledged equal but as a powerful and dreaded rival. She has won her position by mastering the arts of the West in war and industry. But she is not satisfied. We reprint a remarkable article contributed by a distinguished Japanese publicist to the Atlantic Monthly in which he gives a inside view of Japan's outlook at the present day. Japan asks herself, how does it profit her to win the whole world, if it means losing her own soul. Not that she undervalues her gains through acquiring the Western military and industrial technique. She would keep them but, at the same time, she would apply herself with more zeal than hitherto to recapture the spiritual values of old Japan which have gone somewhat into the background. India came under Western influence much earlier than Japan but her position today is far different from that of Japan. The industrial and military equipment of the West was carefully excluded from the purview of Indians. The whole trend of policy has been such as to make Indians diffident of their own capacity and to make them feel helpless without the support (at a heavy price) of the White Man. Thus it comes to pass that while Japan is ahead of the West and claims the leadership of Asia, we here are busy quarrelling over the White Paper scheme. Mr. B. C. Chatterjee shows that there has been a reaction against westernisation in India also.

Religious Intolerance :—We publish this week a report of a speech delivered at the Y. W. C. A. Hall, Simla, by Signor Macchiono, on the "Origin of Religious Intolerance." Signor Macchiono has come to India to establish greater intellectual co-operation between East and West; with this object he has been sent to Benares Hindu University by the Institute for the Middle and Far East at Rome. He gave a new interpretation of the origin of intolerance in religion when he remarked that Christianity had derived it from the Greeks. Gibbon, on the other hand, is equally definite that the origin of religious intolerance was to be found in the exclusive religious and social customs of the monotheistic Jews. "The descendants of Abraham," he writes in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," "believed that they alone were the heirs of the covenant, and were apprehensive of diminishing the value of their inheritance by sharing it with others..... Whatever difference of opinion might subsist between the Orthodox, the Ebionites, and the Gnostics, (among the primitive Christians) concerning the divinity or the obligation of the Mosaic law, they were all equally animated by the same exclusive zeal and by the same abhorrence for idolatry, which had distinguished the Jews from the other nations of the world." Yet the polytheistic ancient world of Europe was prepared to tolerate the Jews and to "protect a superstition they despised", while they launched a determined campaign of persecution against the Christians. Gibbon explains this by saying that the Jews were a nation while the Christians were a sect. Having received the Mosaic law ages ago the Jews were justified in following the faith of their fathers by the example of the world Christians, on the other hand, "dissolved the sacred ties of custom and education, violated the religious institution of their country, and presumptuously despised whatever their fathers had believed as true or revered as sacred." Prof. Macchiono contends that the Homeric conception of gods and later attempts at interpretations of life in the divine world were responsible for the persecution of dissenters. The Professor ignores the fact, however, that polytheists were not unwilling to include new gods in their pantheon. The experience of India and China has confirmed Gibbon's view that Semitic monotheism has been accompanied by intolerance. Hindu theism, on the other hand, has been free from it.

Germany's Lost Colonies :—The demand for the restoration to Germany of the colonies which were taken out of her control by the Treaty of Versailles, is gathering force. Gen. Goering speaking in Berlin towards the end of last month declared that unless Germany has a colonial soil she will "die of suffocation." Dr. Schacht in his "The End of Reparations" (Jonathan Cape, 1931), denounced the deprivation of German colonies as a "theft" and declared that it was bitter economic need that inspired the demand for restoration. He stresses the fact that Germany depends more than other countries on a supply of raw materials and with the loss of her colonial empire she was cut off from such supplies. Nevertheless, the demand is based on the Spenglerian view that certain parts of the world have been designed by Providence to provide raw materials to the Nordic nations and to consume the finished products of their factories. The League of Nations by its Mandatory system has achieved a technique, imperfect though it is today, by way of counteracting the imperialistic tendencies of western nations. Suggestions have been put forward for an extension of mandates to all backward countries, but they have not met with the approval of imperialist powers. Today in theory at any rate Germany has equal rights to trade in Tanganyika with other powers. Her demand for preferential treatment and the control of the Government there is not acceptable to the people of that territory who prefer the present regime to being under the tutelage of any single power. The League of Nations cannot ignore the wishes of the people of Tanganyika.

The Harijan Sevak Sangh :—At a public meeting of Hindus in Bombay after the Poona Pact in September 1932, an organisation was formed with the object of abolishing Untouchability by reason of birth and securing equal rights of access to public institutions for the Untouchables. This society which started as "The All India Anti-Untouchability League" and changed its name in the second year to "The Servants of the Untouchable Society," now emerges from its third year of life as the Harijan Sevak Sangh. The Sangh has issued its annual report for the year 1932-33, which reveals that the greatest work done by the society has been in the sphere of education. By the grant of scholarship, the opening of students, hostels and of day and night schools for primary education, the society has made a genuine contribution to the movement for Untouchable uplift. It has also secured the admission of Harijan children into the ordinary Municipal and Local board schools. Evidently the society considers the creation of the "David Education Fund" as its most important achievement during its short existence. The Fund aims at providing education from the upper primary standard to the close of a college career for a thousand Harijan students. The finances of the Fund have been augmented by the "Gandhi Recovery Felicitation Fund." As for social work, the report emphasises the need for steady effort on the constructive side. It remarks:—"The housing problem, merely for Bhangis in our cities is a huge problem, where we can show the way but cannot walk the whole distance. But we may reasonably expect to secure tap connections, install lights and even put up latrine seats, at the Harijan Sevak Sangh expense, where urgently required. This way of giving help is really more effective and better appreciated than even weekly sanitary visits and casual sweeping of Bastis and meagre distribution of soap cakes."

The South African Manifesto:—The two political parties of South Africa led by Generals Hertzog and Smuts have amalgamated and have issued a joint manifesto declaring their future policy. The Party, we are told, stands for protection of European, coloured and native populations against Asiatic immigration and competition, but maintaining the existing rights of Asiatics now legally domiciled in the Union. The whole world knows how well the South African Union Government protects its native subjects. As for Asiatics domiciled in the Union, mostly Indians, they have few rights left to be maintained and the new Party promises nothing more. When Indians were required to save Natal from ruin they were taken under indenture to South Africa with the distinct promise that on the expiry of their indentures they would be free citizens enjoying all the rights of free citizens. There was no restriction of the right of entry and many Indians went and settled in the country in the wake of indentured labour. This right India has always claimed. It was surrendered in the agreement made with the Union Government in 1914 in return for a promise, never kept, to treat domiciled Indians fairly. Sir Phirozeshah Mehta was furious at this unauthorised surrender of the claim of unrestricted entry which Indians as British subjects, he held, were entitled to. The Indian part of the agreement has been ever since rigorously enforced but the Union Government has not abated its hostility to Indians. The Asiatic immigration from which the new Party wishes to protect South Africa is not, therefore, that of Indians but of Japanese. Without British protection, South Africa is no match for Japan and that is, perhaps, the only reason why she does not declare her independence at once. In the ultimate resort therefore, it is Britain which upholds this anti-Asiatic policy of South Africa.

The Ethics of Default:—The British Government was presented recently by the Government of the United States with a bill for sums due on account of War Debt. In reply the British Government have issued a long statement explaining that it has decided not to pay as it would not be to the advantage of the world, of the United States itself and of the British people also, if the debts were repaid. It has also sought to make a difference between debt contracted for War and debt contracted for other purposes. These arguments and the decision they are used to justify, are altogether new to the world, particularly from British statesmen. Reuter says Europe is surprised but approves of the British decision. This was to be expected. Britain hitherto has prided herself on not being like the Continentals but she has now become one of them. America has evidently no illusions about repayment. She is prepared to give up her claims on condition that her European debtors undertake not to spend the money thus saved to them on armaments. The failure of the Disarmament Conference shows that this condition is unacceptable and that while America is not to be repaid her loans, the race of armaments will go on with unabated vigour.

Government and the Congress:—Government have withdrawn or rather suspended the orders declaring Congress organisations illegal but they retain the emergency powers against Civil Disobedience for use should there be a revival of it. This is precisely on the lines of the policy which was marked out for congressman at Patna, and we fail to understand the complaint of some of their leaders that Government have not been magnanimous. Congress Committees are free to meet and carry on their activities for uplift of harijans, svadeshi, village reconstruction, khaddar, prohibition of liquor trade and birth-control (if they wish) but any act of Civil Disobedience will instantly bring in force the emergency powers. Government do not see their way to release political prisoners. Perhaps they intend their release to be utilised as a consideration for a further bargain. No decision of the Congress arrived at in the absence of Pandit Jayprakash Nehru and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel can be regarded as final. As the abandonment of Civil Disobedience was unaccompanied by any conditions regarding the release of prisoners, Congress leaders can not at this stage make a grievance of the decision of Government to leave the question for future consideration.

Misunderstood Marx:—Two books have been recently published to correct the mistaken views about Karl Marx's teaching which have come to be accepted by a large circle of his followers as well as antagonists. Their authors, G. D. H. Cole and Sidney Hook, are men of recognized competence. We reprint today the review of them in the Information Service issued by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The writers show that Marx was not a materialist but an idealist, that he recognized values other than the utilitarian, and that he admitted the possibility of bringing about changes in the economic structure of society by methods other than "bloody revolution." One sentence in the review may be quoted: "Marx might have uttered from many a modern pulpit the statement, 'M. Proudhon does not know that the whole of history is nothing but the progressive transformation of human nature.'"

BOMBAY, JUNE 9, 1934.

WASTAGE AND EDUCATION.

The career of Sir George Anderson, Educational Commissioner with the Government of India, is unique in its interest and variety. Professor at a College in South Africa, on the conferment of responsible Government on that country, he along with other English employees were summarily relieved of their jobs. "General Botha owes me £ 40" was often on his lips when he came to Bombay as Professor of History in Elphinstone College. He was very popular with his students both because he took a genuine interest in them in and out of College and because his historical outlook was such as to engage his sympathy with the liberal tendencies on Indian politics. In the University he often voted with Mr. Gokhale notwithstanding that the Director of Public Instruction was officially in opposition. He collaborated with Mr. Manu Subedar, authority on Indian Finance and Translator into English of Dnyeshwari. Bombay, proved too small for his ambition. Mr. Anderson went to Simla where he became the right hand man of Sir Sankaran Nair. The Secretary for Education was Sir Edward MacLagan but it was the Under Secretary, Anderson, whom the Hon. Member liked to have always at his elbow. He might have returned to Bombay which had to import an officer from the Central Provinces to fill its vacant Directorship of Public Instruction. But he wisely preferred the Punjab notwithstanding its inferior status in the Provincial roll of precedence. There he made himself as indispensable to the Education Member, Sir Fazli Hussain, as he was to Sir Sankaran Nair. His almost unperceived accession to the topmost rung of the Indian Educational Service was the natural reward of his industry and gift of making himself acceptable to persons of diverse, if not opposite, temperaments. Mr. Anderson served with zeal and distinction on the Sadler Committee as well as on the Hartog Committee, the former on the condition of Calcutta University and the latter to find out how far the advance of Education in British India had qualified the people to become voters in scheme of constitutional reform. No such enquiry has been considered necessary to the enlargement of the franchise in any other country and very little use was made of the report of the Hartog Committee in the recommendations of the Simon Commission of which it was an auxiliary. But Sir George Anderson has found in it the main text of his review of Indian Education from 1927-32.

The Hartog Committee quite excusably forgot all about its main object, which was to appraise from educational facts the capacity for recording their votes of the people of India, and launched into a general survey of the merits and results of Indian education. In passing, we may note that since the beginning of this century the Indian Educational system has been almost constantly under surveillance by some Commission or Committee, Imperial or Provincial, either in whole or in part. One consequence, as might be expected, has been that Indian educationists have completely lost faith in themselves and are ready to plead guilty to any dereliction that may be urged against them. Indeed, some of the most prominent of them are the most vehement denouncers of their own life work. Sir P. C. Ray is the loudest detractor in this class. The Hartog Committee could find no redeeming feature in Indian Education. "Throughout the whole educational system there is waste and ineffectiveness," it declared. The "wastage" in the case of boys was great. In the case of girls, it was still greater. Primary education, secondary education, University education, all came under the same sentence, if anything the one more than the other. Sir George quotes the indictment at length and proceeds by tables, charts and other devices to justify and confirm it. It is not clear what is meant by 'wastage' in education. Every utility involves some wastage. The very food we eat has in part to go out as wastage in order that it may fulfil its purpose. In fact, if any Committee proposed to get all that we eat assimilated into the body we should die of stomach trouble. Some roughage is now prescribed if it is not present in sufficient quantity in the shape of bran in order that it may be wasted. Sleep may be considered a waste by conscientious educationists but nature knows better. Leisure may be described as waste by the factory owner but the wise employer knows that the efficiency of his worker depends upon his "wasting" some of his time. The question then is, is the so called 'wastage' in Indian education incommensurate with the results achieved by it? The next question, if it is disproportionate, is it so because of its special defects, or because the whole system of which it is a part, revels in waste from top to bottom? The third question is, what exactly is education intended to produce and which it does not produce in satisfactory proportion? The answer to these question will differ, according as the answerer represents the system or the society which it dominates. The last thing that we expected of Sir George Anderson is that he would succumb so thoroughly to the utilitarian view of education.

The times are critical, says Sir George. When were they not? Really, however, it is not the times but the way in which one regards them that makes them critical or placid. The Commissioner of Education thinks—many others think it is all an illusion—that far-reaching schemes of political advancement are in the making. He, of all officials, should be above this sort of claptrap. Education, surely, has a higher purpose than producing voters. We commend to the Commissioner, if he has not already seen it, an article headed "Education and Civilisation" by Bertrand Russell in the New Statesman of the 5th May. It is one of the wisest pronouncements on Education we have come across for many a long year. We pick out for the special attention of Educational Authorities in this country, the following :

The submissive lose initiative, both in thought and action; moreover, the anger generated by the feeling of being thwarted tends to find an outlet in bullying those who are weaker. That is why tyrannical institutions are self-perpetuating; what a man had suffered from his father he inflicts upon his son, and the humiliations which he remembers having endured at his public school he passes on to 'natives' when he becomes an empire builder. Thus an unduly authoritative education turns the pupils into timid tyrants, incapable of either claiming or tolerating originality in word or deed. The effect upon the educator is even worse; they tend to become sadistic disciplinarians, glad to inspire terror, and content to inspire nothing else. As these men represent knowledge, the pupils acquire a horror of knowledge which, among the English upper class, is supposed to be part of human nature, but is really part of the well-grounded hatred of the authoritarian pedagogy.

Authority and Discipline are the key words of the system of which Indian Education is a rather clandestine offspring. The schoolmaster or even Professor in India is a policeman in some measure. The Indian educator and the bodies which control it, from Local Boards to Universities, are constantly worried by the necessity of reconciling the purpose of education with political and administrative exigencies. So long as this state of things continues, it is futile to expect or attempt to instil any principle into education.

THOUGHTS ON THE PRESENT SITUATION

One of the many good-hearted, well-meaning English persons who are sincerely distressed at the estrangement between Britain and India and are anxious to do their bit to remove its causes, asks me what I think of the situation. The situation in India today is that Lord Willingdon's policy has completely succeeded in putting down Civil Disobedience and Non-co-operation. What Congressmen want now is that Government should accept their submission—which they try to clothe in the garb of defiance—and facilitate their purpose of capturing the Councils and, through them, the machinery of the administration. It is clear that they do not propose, as the old Swarajists did, to deny themselves the opportunity of taking office should it come their way. Although they have declared that their turning their backs on Civil Disobedience and Non-co-operation is not in the least due to a desire on their part to meet the wishes of Government, they, nevertheless, demand that Government should accept it as such and release political prisoners, remove the ban on Congress meetings, and otherwise show that they rejoice at the return of the prodigals. The Government, on the other hand, seem to think that, having put down Civil Disobedience and obliged Congressmen to realize the futility of Non-co-operation, they are in a position to do without their co-operation and to hoist the erstwhile Non-co-operators with their own petard. This is the present situation and, so far as I can see, it will be the situation in the near future.

The possibility of Gandhiji alone resuming Civil Disobedience does not materially affect the situation. One of the reasons, and it does them honour, which have led to his personal reservation of freedom to start Civil Disobedience, is that while Pandit Jawharlal Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and the Frontier Gandhi, Gaffar Khan, are in prison, it will be rank ingratitude to declare that the cause for which they went to prison has been finally given up. There may be other reasons, too. Congress leaders, though they could not act directly, have looked with satisfaction and not a little eagerness, at efforts to bring about a meeting between Gandhiji and the Viceroy before the latter left India. Gandhiji's personal reservation may be given up if these and other political prisoners are released. That brings me to my correspondent's next question, "Could Gandhiji deliver the goods?" The commercialisation of politics, and its consequent degradation, is exemplified by this hateful phrase. Delivering goods is the final incident in a sale transaction. When it is said that so-and-so can deliver the goods, the association of ideas suggests a sale transaction. Would the country accept as satisfactory proposals which satisfy Gandhiji? Three years ago, I might have said, yes, to this question. But today, I can not. During these years my respect for Gandhiji as a man has remained unabated. But my confidence in his judgment in public affairs has, I am sorry to say, appreciably declined. The revolt of the Swarajists has an unmistakable meaning. The spell is broken. I should welcome every sign of appreciation of Gandhiji's eminence on the part of Government here and in England. There is no man living of whom it can be said with the same confidence as of Gandhiji that he has no personal axe to grind. But his handling of political issues at the Round Table Conference, particularly the muddle about the representation of the Depressed classes, has made people apprehensive of leaving him to settle the political destinies of India. Gandhiji has a way of raising big issues and then compromising on trivial ones. Government have thoroughly understood this trait in his character, and they are better at a bargain than Gandhiji.

That is the situation in India. If that was the only factor involved, the White Paper scheme or an even more safeguarded one or none at all of constitutional reform, can be worked with the help of the Police and the Magistracy and the communal jealousies aggravated by the modern conflict between Capitalism and Communism. But there are other factors. They have their origin not in India but outside. The defeat of Russia by Japan led to the Morley Minto Reforms. The Great War led to the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. The clouds which are gathering on the international horizon, while they fill my heart with sadness as one who has friends in many lands, also give rise to hopes for the day when India too will share the travails and joys of the new world that is being born, not as an unwilling camp follower but as a free agent bringing her special gifts to the service of humanity. The increasing acerbity of European politics is a portent of black significance. But of far greater because nearer import is the courageous assumption by Japan of the hegemony of Eastern Asia. Japan has higher ambitions. The spokesman of her Foreign Office recently declared in an unofficial capacity, "we being Asiatics are far more capable of dealing with other Asiatics in their best interests than are Americans or Europeans." European writers realize the transformation wrought by world events in the position of Europe face to face with Asia. The far-sighted Mussolini in his address to the Asiatic Students Conference at Rome dismissed contemptuously the Kipling dogma about East and West and declared Italy's determination to work for the co-operation of Europe and Asia. The Asiatic Labour Conference held in Colombo a few days ago is also significant. The strained relations with the United States on the War Debts and the acrimonious exchanges with France at the Disarmament Conference this week, cannot but have their repercussions on the Indian problem. It is impossible to believe that Britain with her great political acumen will fail to see the advantage in these circumstances of having at her side a contented and co-operating India rather than behind her a sullen and resentful India. Sir Samuel Hoare's address to the women of Chelsea shows a marked advance on his earlier peremptory attitude. "The dogs bark but the caravan passes on." The same Samuel Hoare who said that years ago says to the women of Chelsea now that the Empire would go smash if the barking dogs are not taken into the caravan. He still believes that the White Paper meets Indian demands and satisfies Indian aspirations. He will soon change his mind on that too. There are signs that the truth about happenings in India is at last coming home to Britain. The British Sedition Bill has awakened the British people to the certainty that Anglo-Indian administrative ideas will invade British administration and that whatever is permitted in India will eventually recoil upon their own liberties. These things provide a background which relieves the internal Indian situation of some of its gloom.

N.

THE KUMBakonam VAJapeya YAGAM.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR)

The 'Indian Express' in its issue of the 23rd May raised a strong and dignified protest in a short and sweet way against the "unwanted demonstration of faith in those parts of the Vedas which have lapsed into quiet oblivion," meaning thereby the totality of Yagas involving bloody sacrifice of innocent animals. This has brought forth a prompt reply from the Treasurer, Tanjore District Brahmana Mahasabha, published in the same paper on the 29th instant, with a rejoinder by the editor in the same issue. While the public-spirited editor took his stand on a practical basis of stout common sense and current "Brahmin sentiment," the other took up an apparently invulnerable position on the authority of the Veda and Sastra. But is it really so impregnable that the editor should despair of meeting his adversary on his own ground? The 'Evening Mail' of Bangalore in its editorial of the 26th instant has ably struck the right note of indignant but balanced protest thus:— "The wise Brahmana had the ancient Dharmasastras recast in such a manner that for the Dwijas at any rate drinking, and meat-eating in non-sacramental fashion and the offering of animal food in the course of sacramental sraddhas were alike forbidden and the heaviest penalties attached to their contravention," and asks whether present day "Hindu society is tired of itself and has made up its mind to drift bodily into Semeticism."

2. Now what has really escaped public scrutiny in respect of the Kumbakonam Yaga, as distinguished from the Ellore Polaramman sacrifice of about 6000 animals is the most revolting and sorry spectacle of a section of learned Brahmins that have from time immemorial given up flesh and fish in every-day life, suddenly taking to the same under cover of Vedic sanction on the occasion. Nothing could be more inconsistent and disparaging except perhaps Mahatma Gandhi's mystic but yet indefensible act of despatching an ailing calf to an earlier grave, and his astounding justification thereof by his own notion of right and wrong in the light of his "inner voice." It is clear I would venture to submit that both the Mahatma and the Kumbakonam Brahmins have only grievously erred. The gross error on the part of the latter lay not in finding Vedic sanction for the present goat-sacrifice but in their grotesque application of an out-of-date ritual in circumstances wholly out-of-tune with the present times. It consists of an utter defiance of the very Sastras suited to more highly evolved types and classes of men, as ages roll on. Lord Shri-Krishna has in the Bhagavad Gita enjoined "Whatever thou drinkest or eatest, make an offering of it to me." What is it that the learned Sastries and Vaideeks have done at Kumbakonam? They have done just the wrong thing; they have offered to Him at the Yaga just the very thing that they have not tasted for ages together, nay, that they have solemnly abjured and heart and soul abhorred and eschewed from their own daily, monthly, and yearly ceremonies observed in common with their fellow Brahmins and higher classes among their non-Brahmin brethren.

3. In the language of the Manu Smriti (Chapter 5. Slokas 53-54) those Brahmins have both individually and collectively violated the strict vegetarian principle of scrupulous and deliberate avoidance of all flesh which has been held in merit equal to a hundred years' performance of annual Aswamedha or horse-sacrifice. The Ellore non-Brahmins might well be excused in offering any number of poor animals in bloody sacrifice as they were not far removed from the habit of flesh-eating and did not offer what they would hesitate or decline to eat themselves. The "Havis-sesha" or sacrificial remains must necessarily be (Manu, 5:24) honoured by eating and cannot be refused in a fit of spontaneous or natural revulsion, and cannot be eaten with a forced effort or repressed conscience, (Manu, 5:35) as the Brahmins must have done. What was there to prevent them from having recourse to Manu's fiction in the form of an animal made of rice or wheat flour mentioned in Chapter 5 Sloka 37? Is it not immensely clear that the animal-sacrifice rules and remarks mentioned by Manu in Chapter 5 Sloka 22-52 applied to an altogether different state of society than our own and were directed against indiscriminate slaughter of the dumb creatures in season and out of season so as to restrict the same to the specified occasions only?

4. Manu has no doubt referred as a fact (5:28-30) to a living being sustaining itself on other animal and vegetable life, and hence it may be that no slur is cast on doing things natural in the way of eating, drinking or sexual craving; but we must never forget that the great saint has added that it is most meritorious to avoid or escape from such natural temptations, (5:56). While enumerating the various kinds of fish and flesh (3:267-274) he would prescribe for the benefit of the ancestor's manes during Sraddhas, he emphasises the importance of vegetable food by way of oblation to them and the enormous satisfaction they derive therefrom, nay, eternal gratification they get when offered in monthly or annual Sraddhas, (3:267 & 272) which Sraddhas he says are superior and more important than Yagas to Gods (3:203). It is a matter of common knowledge that on this account and on the strength of this injunction even non-vegetarians, caste-Hindus and the Harijans or depressed classes alike, abjure to this day all sorts of fish and flesh on Amavasya and Sraddha days, and even marriage occasions while they are not so very particular on other occasions.

5. When the movement is thus gradually tending towards pure vegetarianism and animal food is on the decline on religious and humanitarian as well as on scientific grounds, it is simply atrocious to retrace our steps by first driving the thin end of the wedge under cloak of Yaga and Yajnya and set a very bad example to our less enlightened brethren, who in all duty must be given every uplift towards general advancement all round. If our eminent Vaidiks proficient in Sastraic lore take to such obnoxious forms of impotent exhibition of faith or piety at this late hour of the day, then would not their own English-educated children and children's children be fairly justified in their outrageous and unpardonable ignorance and open defiance of the very Sastras and take to all kinds of forbidden food or drink and all sorts of prohibited acts of commission and omission? Would not father's sins be visited on the children? If all goes ill with them, who is to be thanked? Every one seems to contribute his mite towards the general downfall of the happy blend of morality, religion and conscience, held up to admiration in our books of right knowledge and right conduct.

GENEVA'S JUNIOR LEAGUE OF NATIONS. (BY HENRY COMPTON)

The League of Nations is by no means the only example of international co-operation in Geneva. Many unofficial leagues of nations find a home in the international city, and among the most interesting and successful of them is the Geneva International School.

The School is in some sort a child of the League. It was founded in 1924 by a group of international officials, in order that their children might have a good education in their national cultures, while remaining in the international atmosphere of Geneva itself. The beginnings were modest. Eight pupils and three teachers attended the opening classes of the school, which were held in a chalet lent by an interested Genevese friend.

Today, as it approaches the end of 10 years' work, the School looks back with pride on a story of steady growth, of difficulties overcome, and of exceptional problems satisfactorily solved.

The scholars are now housed in a large handsome building surrounded by trees and playing fields. They number over 150 and they are drawn from 20 different nations. Boys and girls from England, America, France, and Germany rub shoulders with comrades from India, China, and Japan, and half-a-dozen languages are heard during the course of one day.

The language problem would appear at first sight to be one of the most formidable problems in international education. Actually, in Geneva, bilingualism is made one of the chief means of developing the children's minds. Some lessons are given in English, others in French.

In an address at a gathering in celebration of the School's tenth year of work, the Directrix, Madame Fernand Maurette, said that great importance was attached to the use of the two languages. "The French-speaking children," she said "are made to see how their English friends interpret the world around them, and conversely the English-speaking children see how the French-speaking children think. Two languages are two different ways of looking at the world."

In pursuance of this idea, the teaching in the two languages is made to reflect the differences between the corresponding ways of thinking: the French, analytical, logical, and orderly; the English synthetic, aiming rather at the development of literary sensibility and creative powers.

The national characteristics thus prove themselves to be complementary, and not inimical, to one another. On this principle the training of the children is developed from the kindergarten stage up to the age of eighteen. An international outlook is ensured by teaching geography and history from a world point of view. But no attempt is made to belittle national traditions. Once a week national culture lessons are given to the various national groups in the school.

International co-operation of this kind works smoothly. To the children it is the most natural thing in the world, and quarrels arising out of racial differences are practically unknown.

NEITHER MATERIALIST NOR REVOLUTIONARY.

The appearance of scholarly yet popular expositions of the philosophy of Marx (What Marx Really Meant. By G. D. H. Cole. New York, Alfred A. Knopf, 1934. $20.—Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx. By Sidney Hook, New York, John Day Company, 1933. $2.50.) calls attention to the widespread and growing interest in the chief historic source of socialist and communist theory. A perusal of them impresses one with the fact that Karl Marx was among the most misunderstood men in modern history. The stereotype most of us have formed of him is far from anything that his actual writings will support. This misconception is shared by friend and foe, by follower and critic.

Of the books under review, Mr. Cole's is simpler in statement and more readable. Those who have read his Guide Through World Chaos will read this book with high interest and without disappointment. Mr. Hook's is more philosophical and is heavier going. Both men are Marxists essentially, and their expositions are quite consistent though far from identical in form and emphasis.

Both writers are concerned to explain the materialism of Marx and to remove the current confusion that surrounds it. In what sense was Marx materialistic? Not at all in the ordinary sense. Indeed Mr. Cole asks "Why call such a conception 'materialist,' when it in fact embodies the fullest recognition of the conscious determining power of mind?" The reason he called his theory of history "materialist" was that he wanted to "mark it off sharply from the metaphysical idealism of Hegel and his followers." It would be more accurate to call Marx's theory "realistic" than "materialistic." He leaves ample scope for "the constructive influence of the minds of men." He was concerned to make men understand the material framework which conditioned their lives in order that they might control their environment. To this extent he was determinist but in no sense fatalist.

"Marx's own life," says Mr. Hook, "with its ostracism, grinding poverty, refusal to compromise truth and revolutionary honor, is an illustration of what his ethical values were. He was surer that there were some things that human beings ought to do than he was that those things would bring pleasure and not pain."

Furthermore, as Mr. Hook says: Marx was no utilitarian in the sense of the word used to designate the "happiness" school. "He condemns capitalism not because it makes people unhappy but because it makes them inhuman, deprives them of their essential dignity, degrades all their ideals by setting a cash value on them, and inflicts meaningless suffering."

Far from being "materialistic" about human nature, Marx entertained what most of us would call a spiritual conception of it. "By acting," he said, "on the external world and changing it man changes his own nature." Elaborating this point Hook interprets him further: "Once [man] acquires control of the conditions of social life, he can consciously make over his own nature in accordance with a morally free will, in contradistinction to man in the past whose nature has been unconsciously made over by the socially determined will of economic classes." Marx might have uttered from many a modern pulpit the statement, "M. Proudhon does not know that the whole of history is nothing but the progressive transformation of human nature."

The extreme interpretation of economic determinism is held by Mr. Cole to be a perversion of Marx:

"There are some Marxists who cannot see a flapper use her lipstick without producing an explanation of her conduct in terms of the powers of production and the class-struggle. It is, of course, undeniable that the prevalence of lipstick at a price within the normal flapper's purse is a by-product of capitalist mass-production, and has therefore an economic cause; but in relation to world history it is a phenomenon completely irrelevant to the class-struggle, and of no significance at all.....All that the most rigid Marxist needs to claim is that the influences which are not manifestations of the class-struggle are of a secondary order, and exert their effects, however important they may be, within limiting conditions set by the evolution of the powers of production."

Likewise, the notion of the inevitability of revolution is falsely derived from Marx. There is no guarantee, says Mr. Hook, of the "final validity and certainty of communism. Only the objective possibilities are given." Mr. Cole is also far from dogmatic in discussing the possibility of a parliamentary, rather than a revolutionary, solution of the economic problem. There is, he says, "a real possibility of capturing the state machine, as far as it can be captured as the result of a parliamentary election, on the basis of a policy that is not mainly social reform, but constructive socialism." The likelihood of this, he thinks, is not great. In Great Britain, the House of Lords and the Crown would stand in the way, and in the United States, the Supreme Court. Mr. Hook is troubled by Marx's own statement on this point: "We know that special regard must be paid to the institutions, customs and traditions of various lands; and we do not deny that there are certain countries, such as the United States and England in which the workers may hope to secure their ends by peaceful means." He thinks this inconsistent with the whole current of Marx's thinking, but after weighing alternative explanations gives it up.

Mr. Cole after a careful analysis of economic classes in modern society, concludes that "on the other hand, if the proletariat could be reinforced by the adhesion of even a minority of the technicians, administrators, and professional men and women who form the active section of the new petite bourgeoisie, it could be strong enough both to resist fascism and to build socialism against the united hostility of the grande bourgeoisie [the great capitalists and industrialists] and the more reactionary petit bourgeois groups [shop-keepers and the like], and even, with good fortune, to do these things by peaceful and constitutional means. That this should come about is by far the best hope for Western civilization in its present plight." This outcome Mr. Cole thinks unlikely. In any case, Communist policy is in danger of opening the door to "a real growth of fascism." The alternative possibilities are numerous and Mr. Cole, as a careful student of economic history, is "sceptical of inevitabilities."

Mr. Hook makes much of the point that in Marx's thought, the revolutionary purpose will never work itself out unless embodied in a political movement. The party is necessary to give form and effectiveness to the class struggle. Furthermore, "Marx and Lenin realized that left to itself the working class would never develop a socialist philosophy. . . . A revolutionary socialist philosophy does not flow from the same source as the primitive class struggle of trade unionism. It must be introduced literally into the trade-union movement, although without the existence of such a movement, socialism would have no revolutionary meaning."

Both authors are interested in Marx's method—dialectical materialism—more than in his specific conclusions. Says Mr. Cole, that method rests on a denial of formal logic, the essence of which is "the exclusion of the contradictory"—the assumption that a thing cannot be itself and something other. Marx, following Hegel, adopted a philosophy of "becoming" instead of the traditional philosophy of static "being" believing that the latter is wholly untrue to the real world. For things are always becoming what they are not. For Marx, however, the thesis, antithesis and synthesis are not ideas as with Hegel but things—specifically economic classes in society. The capitalist class creates its opposite, the proletariat. Conflict between them results and the issue is the emergence of a new class, or rather as Marx ultimately envisaged it, a classless society. The theory requires that each synthesis shall become a new thesis, but Marx was not interested in prediction to that extent.

As Mr. Hook puts it, for Marx, "the real task of the empirical philosopher.....was not to show that the content of history was logical but that the content of logic was historical." Communism in no sense "involves a complete break with the past," Marx was, first and last, a revolutionist but he found the stuff of revolution in history.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN IN GERMANY.*

Under recent German legislation loans are granted by the Government to young couples wishing to marry, on condition that the woman undertakes to abandon her employment. Further measures in connection with these loans have now been found necessary.

According to an article in Sociale Praxis, the system of loans has attained its object of permanently withdrawing a large number of women from the labour market and reviving the furniture and domestic utensils industries. Applications for loans, which the Ministry of Finance estimated would number 200,000 for the whole financial year, have however increased to such an extent (amounting to 194,485 between August 1934 and the middle of February 1935) that the funds allotted to finance them proved inadequate during the period between the middle of February and the middle of April. These funds are derived from special tax on unmarried persons, estimated to yield 220,000,000 marks a year; in February 1934 the amount granted in loans had reached 130,500,000 marks. Although the average loan had fallen from 730 marks in August and September to 560 marks in February, and the maximum had been reduced from 4,000 marks to 800 marks in October, the proceeds of the tax were insufficient to meet the demand for loans.

In these circumstances the Government decided to strengthen one of the main provisions of the Act, which prohibited married women from re-entering employment. An Act of 28 March 1934 amends the Act of 1 June 1930 by prohibiting any married woman from re-entering employment so long as her husband is not in need as defined for the purposes of unemployment insurance, and so long as the loan has not been repaid in full. A woman was previously allowed to reenter employment if the husband's income did not exceed 125 marks a month. The preamble of the Act states that women often left their employment temporarily for the sole purpose of obtaining a loan, knowing that their husbands were not earning more than 125 marks a month and were not likely to do so in the near future, and that they could reenter their former employment or find a new post without departing from the provisions of the Act. The new Act is intended to put a stop to this practice, which has prevented the Act from fully attaining its object of reducing unemployment.

The Minister of Finance also issued new instructions to the local authorities on 7 March 1934 in regard to the granting of loans; the maximum to be granted in future is fixed at 500 marks, and this sum may be exceeded only in quite exceptional cases.

On 16 March 1934 the Minister of the Interior issued new instructions in regard to the medical examination required for the grant of loans, the object being to render the regulations uniform.

Finally, the Government has decided that gifts voluntarily made by employers to women workers leaving their employment on marriage shall be exempt from income and wage tax, the tax on unmarried persons, the tax on gifts, and the special tax for unemployment relief.

Reference has also been made in these pages to the views of the German Government on the question of multiple earnings and the instruction of the Minister of Labour that all cases should be considered individually. On the basis of these instructions the Labour Trustee for Saxony, after consultation with the Minister of the Interior of Saxony, recently decided that the profession of midwife should not be considered as a case of multiple earnings unless the income derived from it considerably exceeded the minimum income guaranteed to midwives.

In support of this decision, it was stated that the profession of midwife comes under a special category in that it is carried on solely by women. It is desirable that midwives should be married. It is true that a minimum income is guaranteed to them, but in return they must be at the disposal of their patients at any hour of the day or night, and this greatly limits their capacity to fulfil domestic duties. They are not allowed to carry on any other trade incompatible with their regular profession, and in view of their considerable expenses, their earnings cannot be considered a net income.

ORIGIN OF RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE.

Signor Macchiono, the Italian visiting Professor who has been sent to the Benares Hindu University by the Institute for the Middle and Far East in Rome, established to secure greater intellectual co-operation between the East and the West, gave a lecture at the Y. W. C. A. Hall, Simla, on "The Origin of Religious Intolerance," on May 31. Sir George Anderson, Educational Commissioner with the Government of India, presided.

The origin of this particular kind of intolerance, the Professor said, was to be found in the Homeric or Greek conception of gods. The Greek legends, specially Homer's, claimed to know everything about the divine world. Homer described in his poems every detail of the divine life; he knew how gods sat, slept, fought, quarrelled and so forth. His way of thinking was connected with the scientific frame of the minds of the Greeks, whose greatest aspiration was attainment of knowledge; they wanted to know everything which could be seen and could not be seen.

The Homeric religion was the key to a right understanding of the origin of Greek mythology which originally meant the science of the divine stories, but latter writers, who used to deal with mythological stories, were small theologians. In other words mythology was not for the Greeks a complex of tales but a complex of notions. A new myth was not a new story but a new conception of gods.

From this later flowed the conception of two worlds—the one where we lived and the divine world—equally real and true. In Plato, we find the notion of the divine world, where souls live before being embodied. This Platonic and realistic notion of a divine world entered into Christianity. Theology, which is the science of the divine world is as true as science. Now science must be intolerant; science cannot come to compromises; scientific intolerance was transferred to theology because theology itself was a science. This was the origin of religious intolerance, which was fed on the presumption that it was possible to know God in a logical way.

The only way to overcome this intolerance was to give up pseudo-scientific knowledge of God, to reduce theology to mythology, and to consider it not as a complex of knowledge, but as a complex of imaginative representation of religious experiences, not very different from language and poetry. All religions must be considered as different languages, which expressed in different ways the same experiences. No language was true by itself—it was true only in reference to the idea which it expressed. No religion was true by itself—it was true only in reference to the expression of the religious experience.—United Press.

"WHAT HAPPENS AT LOURDES."

In an article on this subject, with the subtitle "Psychic Forces in Health and Disease," Dr. H. Planders Dunbar comments in The Forum for April on the importance of emotion in physical and social health. "It is emotion that makes us think, and it is emotion that illumines for each of us the things worth thinking about.....More especially it is emotion that makes us free to think and act." Yet "we think rarely of the whole range of psychic forces in the integration of personality or of our social order."

Lourdes has been described as "sordid, depressing, unhygienic and medieval," as well as "impressive, mysterious, inspiring." The atmosphere of fervour and devotion and the wonder of its people over the mysteries of God and nature affect pilgrims whether they are cured or not. Pilgrimage follows pilgrimage in the town, each with its daily schedule of "so many masses, so many hours of prayer for the sick at the baths, stations of the cross, nursing service, and participation in the great processions," all in a silence unbroken save by chants and prayers. The "ultimate power" rests not with the priests or the physicians of the Medical Bureau but with the nurses and stretcher bearers who

"constitute a powerful organisation" and who by their own criteria are quick to differentiate between real cures and hysteria. The hospitals are uncomfortable and by professional standards inadequate, but one is arrested by "an atmosphere of confidence and contentment" not achieved in more efficient hospitals under competent and famous physicians. Processions pass, "hundreds of sick and dying people carried painfully on primitive stretchers or drawn in wheel chairs over rough cobblestones. . . . The stretcher bearers, and the patients too, to the extent of their strength, pray constantly and audibly during the course of the procession.

"What is remarkable is that every one who comes goes away quiet, and that not just for a few days; often it is a quietness lasting a lifetime." Physicians say that their patients achieve "a different attitude toward their illness" whether they get well or not. "The important thing is that psychic forces without the help of scientific method and many of the tools for healing that science has given us, and indeed in disobedience of many of the principles science has taught us, are making people happier and freer to act. . . .

"We know now that we cannot have a sound mind or body with a distorted emotional life. More than this, the physician often cannot cure an ordinary disease in a person with a distorted emotional life. Even drugs, on which the physician usually relies, are hampered in their effect or rendered ineffective by emotional or spiritual conflict.

The physician has discovered that psychiatry has more effective techniques to offer than the temporary building of emotional or spiritual conflict with sedatives. . . .

"Modern civilization has accomplished a rather startlingly complete separation of body and soul, priest and physician, although early in our history the powers of both were vested in one person."

We forget that emotional conflicts or depressions when allowed to develop may be equally as disastrous as physical catastrophes. "One may venture to say that in all the history of the development of mankind, nothing more important has happened than the present application of the scientific method to the study, not merely of human behaviour, but especially of emotions from the point of view of their physiological significance on the one hand and their social significance on the other."

Dr. Dunbar is Director of the Committee on Religion and Medicine of the New York Academy of Medicine and the Federal Council of Churches.

Terrific Waste of Money:—Mr. Frederick Atherton, in an article in the Daily Herald (London) contrasts the pomp and splendour of the official headquarters in Simla during summer with the grinding poverty of the Indian masses in the plains. "When the Prime Minister leaves Downing Street for a few weeks and shelters at Lossiemouth, there are complaints that the business of the country cannot properly be conducted by dispatch and telegram and that such remoteness from the centre of affairs is bound to lead to inefficiency. What would be said if the whole of Whitehall and the Cabinet, all the secretaries to secretaries, the Civil Service, except for a very junior handful and endless truck-loads of files and papers were solemnly transplanted in the wake of the Prime Minister and established round about the Moray Firth for some seven or eight months? For this is what happens in India—in fact what is happening now. The Government of India is moving to Simla and the Provincial Governments are moving to their respective hill-stations."

EAST MEETS WEST.

1 INDIA.*

The gigantic protestantism initiated by the great Ram Mohan Roy and taking shape in the movement called the Brahmo Samaj, came to a spontaneous fruition under the divine touch of the Saint of Dakshineswar. The appeal of Ram Mohan Roy and Brahmo Samaj was to and through the intellect; it was bound to leave India untouched. I don't say that there was no need for the protestant movement we associate with the name of the great Rajah. But it awaited the coming of him who could bring to the deepest instincts embedded in our race consciousness the living touch of God Himself—of the Truth that needs no syllogism for its demonstration. The Paramhansa Deva's word was Truth which burnt up and dissolved the difficulties of a century like an irresistible renewing fire. Indeed, we have been the privileged witnesses of one of those visitations of Divinity in man in the hour of his soul's flagging and failing which constitute the purpose of human history and give it its meaning and dignity.

As students of history we are aware of the cyclical renewals of the human spirit but for which the record of man would have been a very sordid one indeed—one of mere existence and multiplication varied by outbursts of passion, individual, tribal or national. As a matter of history we know that there is hardly a nation or race on this earth which did not at some time or other come perilously near its doom, when all the attributes that lie on the Godward side of humanity appeared to have deserted it one by one, leaving an awful emptiness behind, of cynicism and despair—the very blackness and blankness of death. Some sank from this to extinction; but history bears witness to the fact that most of them were borne back to life by the resurgent wave of a regenerating flood which restored to the nation or the race concerned all its pristine possessions—faith, hope, courage, aspiration, and defiance of death. These visitations of Divinity in man, as I have already said, have gone down in history by such names, as Buddhism, Christianity, Vaishnavism and, the like.

We remember with a shudder to-day that we, the Hindus of Bengal and of India, were trembling on the brink of a spiritual extinction in the last century. The "English-educated Hindu" of the nineteenth century seemed to have lost his very soul—the spirit seemed to have died within him. He had become the sorriest ape, the miserable mimic of his European overlord. To be like the latter in all his external appointments, and even in the inward growth of his feelings and ideas, appeared to be his sole creed of existence. Approval of the Englishmen, summed up his experience of the highest bliss; his disapproval plunged him into abyss of sorrow. Nameless horrors began creeping over the face of India. The educated Bengali strove hard to forget even his mother tongue and preferred to speak his execrable English; he most probably would have forgotten his native tongue but for the saving fact that his mother, sister and wife refused to forsake their mother language. The Bengali of those days preferred to cover his person with a tawdry mimicry of Englishman's clothes instead of putting on his own national costume. As he all but persuaded himself that his country had never had a civilization and that its salvation lay in its transmutation into a vast suburb of Europe's civilization. Asia, according to him, had to be translated into Eurasia; India into Anglo-India.

We still thrill to our recollection of the new dawn-light that fringed our Eastern skies, the new life that came pouring into our being, with the oncoming of the new century. Just picture to yourselves how the educated Bengali, that greatest sinner of all in the matter of anglicization, stood suddenly transformed. A storm of patriotic fervour shook him from head to foot, and blew out of him all that worship of the West which had so gripped him in the century that was over. He shouted Vandemataaram with a new strength in his voice and a new purpose in his eyes and descried all the promise of his country's future in the revelation of her past. Indeed, he stepped out of his dead self—a perfect miracle of resurrection. The subsequent history is well known to all of us, and needs no recapitulation. Well, gentlemen, behind this miracle we begin to catch the glimpse more and more clearly, as the mist of the passing years lifts slowly, of the radiant figure of one, whom God sent us for our salvation in our hour of peril—the figure of him and of his apostles among whom was the great son of India, Swami Shivananda, who has left us so recently.

2. JAPAN.*

Of Japan of old—the Japan of the Samurai, of Utamarao, and of Lacquer were—the West has always shown a sympathetic albeit patronizing appreciation. The spirit of old Japan as reflected in the tranquil and mystic atmosphere of Kyoto and Nara finds numerous admirers abroad. It is this old Japan that not only her well-wishers but her enemies are anxious to see preserved or revived.

Many a foreign observer on Japan would remark with a sigh: "What a pity that things of the past, things of real beauty and joy forever, should be so mercilessly sacrificed at the altar of modernism!"

Heretofore this criticism apparently fell flat among the Japanese, who were so feverishly busy learning from the West—making what it made, trying to think what it thought and even sinning where it sinned. And what clever pupils they proved, too! To-day Japan is outwardly as modern a state as any in Europe and America. Her industry is carrying everything before it in the markets of the world, enabling her to feed fifteen times the population of Sweden on an arable area of equal size. She boasts of a navy and a merchant marine, the third largest in the world. And all that has been brought about within less than three quarters of a century following the rude awakening caused to Japan by the sudden appearance in her waters of Commodore Perry's dark threatening squadron.

Having thus almost blindly followed in the footsteps of the West, and having achieved a measure of physical progress undreamed of by their forefathers, the Japanese people began to pause and ponder.

What is all this mad driving and striving for? Where has it landed them? Where are the nations of the West whom they were running after? Would that be a consummation devoutly to be wished?

These are the questions they are asking themselves.

The strain in Japan's foreign relations consequent upon the Manchurian trouble and the unfair restrictions now being placed upon her trade everywhere had no doubt accelerated this introspective mood of the Japanese nation. But that is not by any means the cause of the reawakening which is so distinctly and vociferously in evidence throughout Japan. At first sight the same forces are at work there as in the Occident. It is an agitation for a thorough going revision of the system of capitalistic liberalism with all that it has brought upon the life of the Japanese people. To the extent that it aims at removing the evils of capitalism, it has something in common with the social and political agitation in Europe and America. But in that it is a national, not a class, movement, this new campaign in Japan is fundamentally distinct from that of either socialism or communism. Unlike these, moreover, it is at bottom a revolt of mind against matter.

The Oriental outlook is essentially idealistic. All surface indications to the contrary notwithstanding, the mind of the Japanese has never been westernized. True, under the pressure of the menace from abroad, they were obliged, much against their grain, to adopt the ways of the 'barbarous' West in order to be able to stand their ground against the aggressors. To the exclusion of all other considerations, and at the sacrifice of much that was precious in their traditions the entire nation was bent upon attaining proficiency in the arts, both of war and of peace, such as the West sets store by. Throughout these long years of restless endeavours, however, the Japanese people have never lost themselves entirely. Amid the glare and glitter of modern civilization, the grip upon them of the spirit of the past has remained as potent as ever.

When, therefore, the inherent weakness of Western civilization began to make itself felt in Japan also, when money and machine seemed rapidly to undermine all that the nation held sacred for centuries; when, above all, communists and fanatics, all products of the materialistic individualism of the Occident, went so far as to harbour designs upon the person of the Emperor, the very spirit of Japan incarnate, the disillusionment was spontaneous. That the re-action should take the form of a challenge to the western civilization, that the cry of "Back to Asia" should be adopted as a slogan, that the demand for Restoration should daily become more insistent seems likewise not unnatural. It is only another instance of history repeating itself. In those turbulent years preceding the Restoration, the skies resounded with the cries of 'Honour the Emperor,—Down with Shogunate'—Expel the Foreign Barbarians! The air is thick in Japan to-day with leaflets up-holding Nipponism, denouncing political parties as usurpers of the imperial power and, above all, advocating a strong foreign policy.

At home in Japan, the unrest, political, social and economic, has not in the least abated. The feeling is general that the national crisis has only just begun and that the worst is yet to come. And it is averred that nothing short of a fundamental reorganization of the political and economic structure of the state would suffice to weather the storm. As all efforts are bent in Manchuria to the creation of a state where the Confucian 'Kingly Way' may prevail and where there may be no exploitation of man by man, so in Japan a return to the 'Way of the Tenno (the Heavenly Ruler)' and the eradication of all the baneful aspects of the materialistic civilization, are impetuously demanded. Thus the Manchurian affair must be regarded only as a sort of prelude to the real movement.

The world has been accusing Japan of something of which she is entirely innocent—that is aggression as the term is understood in the capitalist imperialistic West, a thing which simply does not exist in the philosophy of the East. The Japanese, too, have tried their best or their worst, to defend themselves in the language of their accusers knowing full well, as they do that it is futile to argue where there is such an unbridgeable cleavage of thought and mentality. They felt from the outset that the best defence and the ultimate justification lay in the motives that animated them and the final results that would be attained. They are aware not without compunction, that in the meantime deplorable excesses have been committed both at home and on the continent; they are prepared for further annoying occurrences and development but all that is taken calmly as the inevitable throes attending the new birth which is taking place in Japan.

The whole situation in Japan today is rather too involved to be reduced to simple terms, nor are the various elements of the nation as yet thinking with one mind or working towards the same objective. On one point, however, there seems to be a consensus of opinion, and that is that blind imitation of the West has to cease and that there must be cool and mature re-examination of the materialistic institutions of the West in the light of the idealism of the East, so that there may be evolved a distinct civilization hitherto not known.

Even as she is, Japan is the only country on the globe where the old and the new can exist side by side with any degree of harmony. In the West, unfortunately, the break with the past is definite and final, while the rest of Asia still remains largely impenetrable to modern civilization, Japan has been looked upon as the meeting ground of the two. The aspiration to-day is for a higher role than that of a mere bridge or a halfway house. Not only shall the East and the West meet in Japan, but they shall meet and grow into a compact and coherent whole whose radiance shall brighten the remotest corners of the earth. That is taken to be the supreme mission of new Japan.

INDIA AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The Prague correspondent of the Hindu writes:—

An important step for the development of commercial and cultural relations between the two countries was taken last week by the opening in Prague of the India Society under the auspices of the Oriental Institute. The decision to open the Society is a reflection of the interest shown here in India. The inauguration ceremony took place in the main hall of the palatial headquarters of the Oriental Institute before a big and representative gathering of industrialists, professors, and others prominent in public life. A number of Indians from different centres were also present, including Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose who arrived from Vienna and Mr. Erulkar who came some days in advance from London. The proceedings were formally opened by the President of the Oriental Institute, Minister Hottowetz, who in a short speech welcomed the idea of forming the Society and expressed the hope that it would discharge work of value and utility. He was followed by the eminent Indologist, Professor Lesny, who is held in great esteem and affection by the not small number of Indians, who have the pleasure of knowing him and his deep interest in India and Indians. Professor Lesny, in a fairly long speech referred to India's cultural contributions of value, emphasised the need and importance of a close contact between India and Europe being maintained and developed, sketched the aims of the new society, and advanced the hope that the new organization would develop into an active, useful, and productive one. In general, stated Professor Lesny, the new organization which stood for the development of cultural contacts and direct trade relations between India and Czechoslovakia, would attend to the promotion of useful visits, spread of information, and convenience of Indian students. Professor Lesny, who is the Chairman of the new organization, in this connection also referred to the importance of the Society being supplied by Indian papers, periodicals and other publications, which would be made available for interested persons and put to public use. It is to be hoped that the suggestion and call of Professor Lesny coming at a time when there are renewed talks in India about the spread abroad of information relating to India would find a strong and speedy response. Publications are expected to be addressed to: The India Society, c/o Professor Dr. V. Lesny, Filosofická Fakulta, Smecanova 12, Prague 1, Czechoslovakia.

Messages appreciating the aims of the Society and wishing the Society success from several well-known persons and various organizations were read out. On behalf of the Indians, Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose, who on his previous visits had pointedly raised the issue of a Society as now opened, and Mr. Erulkar, the representative of the Indian Chambers of Commerce in London, addressed the audience. They expressed in warm terms satisfaction at the cordial feelings entertained here for Indians marked by the absence of false racial prejudices and superiority complexes which guaranteed Indian residents and visitors a congenial atmosphere, underlined the value and utility of the new organization, and stated that India would not fail to make all possible contribution to the Society. At the end of the ceremony, the guests were entertained to tea.

A special word of appreciation is due to Professor Lesny for the great trouble taken by him in attending to the comforts of Indian visitors and the close and affectionate interest he displayed in making the stay of the Indian students both pleasant and profitable. Several of the students, who came from outside for the inauguration ceremony, have decided to come down again for the vacation and some of them have found it possible to make arrangements, for their practical training here.

The address of the new Society is: The India Society, Oriental Institute, Lobkovický Palace, Vláská 819 Prague III, Czechoslovakia.

White Zulu.—An extraordinary case has just come to light at the Newcastle Colliery compound. The wife of one of the European employees of the mine found that an elderly native woman at the compound was in charge of a little European boy about three years of age. On asking whose child it was, she was informed that he belonged to a native woman. Further inquiries elicited the story that the native in question, who is married to one of the native employees of the mine, was in the Volksrust district and took the child, then an infant in arms, from its mother who, said the native woman, intended to strangle the child; but she persuaded her to give it up to her. Ever since the child had been brought up entirely by this native couple who have treated it as their own. They have no other children and the child is well cared for and clothed, but speaks nothing but Zulu. There is no doubt that the child is pure European. It is a bonny boy with fair straight hair and is stated to be particularly bright and intelligent. When told that the child might be taken away from her the native woman was most distressed.—Bhumeswar

THE PHILIPPINES ACCEPT.

One day last week, writes Time, New York, of May 14th 1934, Sergio Osmena and Manuel Quezon, the two great leaders of the Philippine Nationalist party, marched into the Philippine legislature arm in arm. Their appearance in that fashion was greeted with surprise and applause, for they had been political enemies since a year ago when Congress offered the Philippines freedom and Senor Quezon succeeded in defeating acceptance of the offer.

But the applause was as nothing compared to the demonstrations next day when the legislature in joint session adopted a resolution written by Senores Quezon and Osmena, promising "appreciation and everlasting gratitude to the President and Congress of the United States and to the American people." The resolution was adopted on the 36th anniversary of the day when Commodore Dewey sailed into Manila Bay and made Swiss Cheese of the impotent royal navy of His Imperial, 12-year-old Majesty, Alfonso XIII, last King of Spain. It marked the formal acceptance on behalf of the Philippines of the new offer of freedom made by Congress.

Next step on the road to independence will be the assembly (July 4) of a convention to draft a constitution. When that fundamental document is approved by the President of the United States, establishment of a Commonwealth next January 1 will follow. Finally independence will come ten years after the birth of the Commonwealth.

In one respect, however, last week's action made Filipinos already independent. Foreigners in the eyes of the United States immigration law, they were entitled to a quota of 50 emigrants to the United States per year. To grant immigration visas, a United States Vice-Consul was appointed to Manila just as if it were any other foreign port. Named to the post was Henry B. Day (Yale '27) who until last week was Vice-Consul in Hongkong.

A NEGRO CULT.

Week by week, says Time, during recent months Negro moppets have been disappearing in batches from Detroit's public schoolrooms. One day ten black pupils would be reported missing and the next it would be 20. Meantime reports grew that a Negro cult school called the University of Islam was making corresponding gains. Alarmed teachers complained to the city attorney. Detroit's truant officers called at the University of Islam, housed on the second floor of an old brick theatre building, ten blocks east of the city's downtown business district, and had the door shut in their faces. They went back with police, but the school's instructors were calm-mouthed.

Last week truant officers and police bore down on the school in earnest, seized text books, carted John Mohammed, 24 year old leader of the cult, Tadar Ali, Allar Cushmeer and ten other instructors off to jail. This time they found only two pupils, but some 400 were on the school rolls.

Two days later a mob of 500 disgruntled "Islamites" roared up in front of police headquarters. "Get along," said five patrolmen.

Knives flashed, fists flew. A riot squad charged out from headquarters, thwacked heads. In 15 minutes the melee was over, 13 policemen retiring for first aid, 41 rioters going to jail.

Arraigned on a charge of contributing to the delinquency of minors by keeping them out of public school, University of Islam instructors kept their mouths tight shut. From the text books police learned that the school's curriculum included courses in General Knowledge of the Spook being Displayed for 6,000 Years, General Knowledge of Spook Civilization, The Duty of a Moslem.

NOTES

The Question of Privilege:—The enquiry by the Privileges Committee of the House of Commons into the charge of influencing Lancashire manufacturers to modify their opposition to the White Paper, as expressed in a memorandum which they had submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, has ended, as might have been expected, in the exoneration of Sir Samuel Hoare and Lord Derby. Only one member of the Committee has thought it his duty to add, while agreeing in the exoneration of these gentlemen, a caution lest the free persuasion of witnesses in the present case should be regarded as a guiding precedent. Lord Hugh Cecil's warning was emphasised in the rather perfunctory remarks with which the Prime Minister moved the adoption of the Report in the House of Commons on Wednesday. "Not guilty but don't do it again." The procedure about Privileges like Impeachment was originally intended to protect the freedom of Parliament against royal intrigues through corrupt Ministers, in days when Ministers were appointed and could be dismissed by the Crown. The Cabinet now is a Committee of Parliament and whatever it does or fails to do is covered by the authority of the latter. Apart from the merits of the case, the consequence of finding the charges proved would have been the immediate resignation of the Cabinet, dissolution of Parliament and a General Election. It would have needed a far more serious matter than an Indian issue to induce a Committee of the British Parliament, composed of Party leaders and presided over by the Prime Minister, to face it. On the merits themselves, if Sir Samuel Hoare and Lord Derby did try and persuade the Lancashire manufacturers to adopt a conciliatory tone towards India, it would have been a service which any Englishman of goodwill, and more so the Minister responsible for India in England, was bound to render to an industry which looks to Indians to be among its chief customers. The credit of converting Lancashire to the gospel of goodwill is assigned by the Committee to the Chairman of the Bombay Millowners' Association, Mr. H. P. Mody. We only wish that the result of the conversion was more tangible than a pious expression of belief in the method of conciliation, which is what Lancashire was persuaded to prefix to its statement. This was all the change the Lancashire witnesses made in the evidence, which they had submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, after the Derby dinner and the Mody Pact. In a weighty speech in the Legislative Assembly on the 15th March, Sir Abdur Rahim who was a Member of the Indian Delegation to the Joint Parliamentary Committee, said: "I heard all the evidence that was adduced before it (the Committee,) and I admit that, after this Pact was entered into here, the evidence that was given by the representatives of Lancashire before had undergone considerable modification in tone. But as regards the substance of their representation they remained adamant." Sir Abdur quoted, from the minutes of the Committee a question put by Sir Phiroze Sethna to the Lancashire delegation. Sir Phiroze asked, in view of their expressions of goodwill, whether they would not withdraw a paragraph (in their statement) "because the implication of that paragraph amounts to this, that they would like India to continue in perpetuity to supply the markets for British manufactured goods and not attempt to develop her indigenous industries. The answer was "No; we do not agree to that." Sir Phiroze: "That is the clear implication of that paragraph as I read it." There was no answer. Mr. N. M. Joshi, in his speech, maintained that after the Pact was concluded a new demand, not theretofore made, had been added by the Lancashire Delegation, for a guarantee against what they called "political tariffs." From the point of view of India, therefore, neither Mr. Mody's Pact nor Sir Samuel Hoare's and Lord Derby's intervention brought about anything more than a few friendly expressions. No doubt this was made plain in the proceedings before the Privileges Committee and naturally the British Government do not wish them published:

Sedition in Britain:—There has been, so far as we know, no law of Sedition, no section like Section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code, in Britain. The jury had to decide in every case on the facts and in the light of public opinion of the day whether a writing or speech was seditious. The reason for this absence of a law of sedition was no doubt that the British Constitution provided a natural outlet for all shades for loyalty and disloyalty and that any group of men who had strong opinions on any question had a ready means at hand to have them embodied in the constitution by getting a majority of members of Parliament to espouse its views. In other countries special methods are devised to prevent rash constitutional changes. In Britain there are none. The Parliament Act was carried just like any other measure though it made large inroads on the functions and powers of one of the estates of the realm. Even Karl Marx recognised that it might be possible in Britain to establish a proletarian State without a violent revolution. The introduction by the British Government in Parliament of a Sedition Bill, has shocked British public opinion and the opposition to it in and out of Parliament is very strong. Especially important is the opposition of a great Conservative authority on constitutional law, Sir William Holdsworth. It forced Government to accept some important amendments in their Bill. Sir William is not satisfied. The amendments so far accepted, he maintains, leave untouched his original objections to the Bill. He writes:

Unless further amendments are accepted, the Bill will still place in the hands of a single magistrate the power of granting a search warrant if he is satisfied there is "reasonable ground" for suspecting an offence. It will still allow a single constable to enter premises on a warrant granted by only one J. P. and seize any documents which he personally thinks may be evidence of an offence.

The most remarkable thing about the discussions on this Bill in the British Press and by British publicists, is that they seem to be utterly unaware that the British Bill is a mild version of the law as it is in British India. The reason urged by Government there as here is that grave emergencies have arisen which necessitate such drastic legislation. The New Statesman demands proof of this which, it suggests, is pure panic. It says that the opposition to the Bill is growing in volume and strength and that Government may find it necessary to drop the measure. Even if they do so now, the danger will always be there so long as such measures in British India are acquiesced in without protest by the British public. Imperialism has its penalties. The chains which you fasten on subject peoples wind themselves round your own neck.

Crop Planning :—Since Russia started her five year plan, planning has become the fashion everywhere and in all sorts of things. The Government of India too after a long delay thought they should do some planning also. They called a Conference of the heads of all provincial agricultural departments and these with their advisers, assistants and camp-followers congregated in Simla to the great benefit of hotel keepers and rickshawallas of the place. When the Conference met, the Hon. Member of the Government of India in Charge of Lands opened the proceedings with the usual commonplaces about world depression and the duty of Governments to do something; and he invited the provincials to find out what it should be. One of the experts of the Government of India proposed that the production of rice should be curtailed in order to increase the price of the commodity and to make its cultivation profitable to the cultivator. All the provinces which grow rice at once fell upon him and tore him metaphorically to bits while the non-rice provinces enjoyed the fun. Then their turn came. The same or some other person proposed that the production of wheat should be curtailed and the wheat-growers made mincemeat of him. The Conference finally adopted a vapid resolution recommending the Provinces to watch the course of world prices and do whatever occurred to them to keep pace with it. The one crop which urgently calls for planning was relegated to the Central Cotton Committee which was established to promote the trade in cotton. A drastic reduction in the area under cotton would make Lancashire and Japanese Pacts unnecessary. We deliberately encourage the overproduction of cotton and then go begging other countries to take it off our hands undertaking in return to underproduce cloth in order that those other countries may have a share of the Indian market. We have been protesting against the exodus of the Government of India to Simla but now not only one Government but departments of all provincial Governments assemble periodically at Simla for Conferences which so far as the public know, lead nowhere. This is a very expensive and ineffective way of ensuring co-ordination among provinces after giving them what is called autonomy.

The Woman in the Temple :—The current number of the Dnyanodaya contains an interesting article on the authenticity of the story in John VII.53-VIII. 11 of the adulterous woman in the temple. The Dnyanodaya's extract from a more detailed account in an early manuscript is interesting. We had always felt a certain regard for the Scribes and Pharisees who by going away from the temple precincts had silently acknowledged that their own lives had not been above reproach. At any rate, it would be difficult to find any sect today which could be so touched, as were the Pharisees in the Bible story, by the simple words of Jesus "Let him who is sinless cast the first stone." The detailed version reveals that when Jesus wrote on the ground he wrote the details of crimes which the accusers had themselves committed and, as each one saw his evil deed discovered, he turned and fled. It is unfortunate that the fuller story has not been incorporated in the Bible as that would have settled a perplexing passage for many a Bible scholar. Miss Eva Gore-Booth, for instance, has built up almost an entire philosophy over Christ's silent writing on the sand. "The story," she writes, "is an illustration of the teaching of Christ that condemns the psychic tendency to judge and punish other people. For not only does he not judge the woman, but he does not judge her judges. He suggests to them that they shall judge themselves, and will not even impress, influence or embarrass them by looking at them. This seems the only natural explanation of his looking on the ground.... He will not accuse any individual, he will not stare them out of countenance; he will only give them a test by which to judge their own actions.....Some enlightened people now-a-days might have forgiven the woman, but would have denounced her self-righteous judges." This seems to us to be more consonant with Jesus' command "Judge not lest ye be judged," than the circumstantial story unearthed by our contemporary.

New Chapter in Madras Politics:—The adoption of a resolution by the Executive of the Madras non-Brahmin Party, known as the Justice Party, in favour of the removal of the ban on the entry of Brahmins, will, when it is adopted as seems likely, at the meeting of the general body in October, open a new and bright chapter in South India politics. Seven years ago this writer had a long talk with the late Raja of Panagal, then leader of the Party, and he expressed himself as being anxious to widen its basis so as to make it a true political party. An attempt was made next year to give effect to the Raja Sahib's desire but it failed. His untimely death caused an interruption but his successor in the leadership, the Raja of Bobbili and his colleagues have continued on the sagacious lines of the late Raja's policy and the time now seems propitious to effect the change which will give an All-India character to the Party. With this change, the distinction between the Liberals and Justices disappears. The Madras Brahmin Party when it drops its negative composition will stand forth, with its clear-cut creed of self-government as a component part of the British Empire, as the alternative Party to the Indian National Congress with its creed of Independence. The Party has an advantage over the Congress in two ways. It has been in power for over twelve years and has leaders who have acquired administrative experience during that period. It has no embarrassing communal commitments and is unhampered by conditions as to what members should wear and in what language they should express themselves in order to obtain a hearing at meetings of the Party. The leaders have chosen a psychological moment for enlarging the basis of their Party and we wish them God speed.

The War Debts Note:—The British note to America in justification of non-payment of war debt has been carefully studied in this country. The arguments used are generally regarded as special pleading. In extreme nationalist circles they have been commented upon mainly as strengthening the Indian claim to have the financial obligations of India to Britain investigated by an independent tribunal. The opinion of nationalists who favour attainment of self-government by India within the British Empire, is accurately voiced by Justice, the organ of the Madras Ministerialist Party. It observes that "the virtual repudiation of the payment has created a very bad moral atmosphere," that "a large creditor country, itself with outstanding obligations from many debtors all over the world, Great Britain can not afford to be a party to the theory of the repudiation of debts" and concludes by remarking that the provision made in the Indian budget towards repayment of India's portion of the War Debt to Britain "will be unnecessary to carry out, in case the present attitude of the British Government is maintained." The Leader of Allahabad, the organ of the Liberal Party, criticizes the British note in rather more direct terms. We reprint both the articles. Since the above was in type, America has replied to the British note. It is prepared, if the instalment due on the 15th June is paid, to discuss any proposals which Britain may make regarding the future disposition of the Debt question.

Purdah:—Mrs. Shaukat Ali's interview with the Bombay Chronicle reporter which we print in another column, must have come as a pleasant surprise to the advocates of abolition of purdah. For Maulana Shaukat Ali has been a staunch supporter of the purdah system in the past. At the National Social Conference in Madras in 1927 the Maulana Saheb startled his audience with a short speech, on a resolution by a Muslim lady for its abolition, in favour of the purdah. In his interviews two years ago after his marriage, he said that his wife approved of purdah. Mrs. Shaukat Ali observed purdah for a short time and has concluded that it is a man's institution and contrary to Islamic tenets. We trust that the Begum's public condemnation may be interpreted as a recantation by Maulana Shaukat Ali of his pro-purdah sentiments. The Maulana is temperamentally incapable of allowing others to cover his change of front and it will not be strange if his next public appearance is on the side of the purdah abolitionists.

Colonization Inquiry Committee Report:—The New Delhi correspondent of The Hindu of Madras reported last April that Sir Maharaj Singh, Agent to the Government of India in South Africa, had communicated to that Government that the South African authorities contemplated the suppression of the Colonization Inquiry Committee Report as a confidential document. We are glad to read in the Indian Opinion that Sir Maharaj Singh has denied the report.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, JUNE 16, 1934.

WASTAGE IN EDUCATION.

• In our leading article last week we referred generally to the charges of "wastage" in Indian education which the Hartog Committee made and which Sir George Anderson, the Educational Commissioner with the Government of India, who was a member of that Committee, has taken up for elaboration in his review of education during the five years 1927-32. He has given five illustrations of "wastage." The first is "the reckless and impetuous multiplication of primary schools" in Bengal. Those who are unacquainted with conditions in this country, will be astonished at the use of epithets such as "reckless" and "impetuous" with reference to an increase of primary schools. Primary schools are not liquor shops or gunpowder factories or even offensive trades like slaughter houses. These schools do not cost anything to the public revenues, as the commissioner erroneously thinks. To quote the words of the Director of Public Instruction in Bengal: "The number of primary schools has increased, largely as a result of individual initiative but there has been no effective control over them by local authorities and there are about twice the number of primary schools as (sic) are actually necessary....Schools of a very low grade, schools with only one teacher, teachers without a living wage, teachers without proper training, schools under no adequate control, schools with no effective inspection—these are the problems we have to face." Private initiative in education is a matter, one would think, for encouragement rather than deprecation. But Directors of Public Instruction in this country are apt to think that whatever does not originate with them and is not subject to their control, is mischievous. That explains the censorious epithets noted above. No one would want to have low grade schools, with only one teacher, paid less than a living wage, without proper training, if it can be helped. The position, however, is that Government will not or can not provide enough primary schools. The people have awakened to the importance of education to their children. Private individuals try to meet the demand by starting schools which in the circumstance can hardly be model ones. The Department, instead of thanking them for coming forward to supply what it should and does not provide, denounces them and the Commissioner of Education with the Government of India broadcasts this fatuous passage to the world with his hearty endorsement. We are unable to understand what the Director means by saying that there are twice the number of schools in Bengal as are actually necessary. Of the three Presidencies, Bengal has the smallest proportion of children of schoolgoing age under instruction up to the Vth standard, the percentages being 59.8 Madras, 49.8 Bombay and 48.8 Bengal. Out of 43000 primary schools only 4700—about one-ninth—are unaided schools with an average enrollment of less than forty pupils each. This is also the average in the primary schools under Government management. The vast majority of schools are under the management of local bodies or are aided schools supervised by the Department. The 52 per cent of children of schoolgoing age in Bengal who have no schools to go to, can certainly not be provided for by an addition of 2400 schools which is half the number of private primary schools. There is a considerable disparity between the numbers of children in the first two classes and those in the third, and this the Department stigmatises as wastage. It is certainly unfortunate that all children should not be able to proceed to higher stages but it is something that they study two years even. It may be noted here that of the three Presidencies the Bengal Government spends the least on primary education. The amounts are: Madras Rs. 191 lakhs, Bombay 167 lakhs; Bengal 67 lakhs. The parsimony of Bengal in respect of education compares ill with its lavish expenditure on measures to put down terrorist outrages. Open a school and close a jail, is an old saying which has stood the test of experience. It may be tried with advantage in Bengal.

The second instance of wastage which the Commissioner describes as even more wasteful, is the continuance of "the three class primary school." We understand that the reference is to the lower primary school with an infant class. The Director of Education in Bengal condemns this school on the ground "that they (the children) are at school merely to be out of the way at home." An excellent reason, we should think. A school which not merely imparts the three R's to children but also makes itself useful to their parents, thus serving a need of the community, is a social service institution with great possibilities. We knew a wise old school-master who, by way of inducement to parents, provided a spare room in his school in which on mats spread on the ground the infant brothers and sisters of pupils attending his class slept during school hours. His school produced many useful and even some eminent men. He was far ahead of his time. Kindergarten and Montessori were unknown. Madame Montessori, it is reported, will shortly visit Calcutta and we hope our educational bureaucrats will not miss the opportunity of learning from her some of the elementary principles of child education. The third instance of wastage adduced by the Educational Commissioner is the increase in the number of communal schools in the Punjab "which has resulted in extravagant competition, often in loss of discipline and in reduced efficiency." As Sir George Anderson was himself responsible for educational developments in the Punjab during the greater part of the quinquennium, he is the proper person to meet the Commissioner's criticism, "yet no reference is made in the Punjab report to any bold and concerted attempt to remedy this inadvisable form of expenditure." We can only say that circumstances vary in different localities and what may be unjustifiable waste in some places may be justified and even necessary in others. Communal prejudices have to be conciliated even if some extra expenditure is involved in order to induce parents to send their children to school though it may be hoped that the need for it will gradually disappear. The alternative is to convert the Educational Commissioner with the Government of India into an Educational Commissary of the Soviet type. That may not be a bad thing and it may come, but not in the time of the present writer or Educational Commissioner. The last example of wastage adduced is the rapidly increasing number of students "who throng the colleges and the upper classes of high schools, many of whom are incompetent to benefit by such instruction; hence the alarming increase of unemployment among the middle class." The large increase in the number of students is what was to be expected from the great awakening to the value of education among classes which until now have been apathetic to it. We should rejoice at the increase and expand our system so as to meet the growing demands made on it, instead of bemoaning it or devising means of choking off the increase. The unemployment among the middle classes has not been increased by education. This is a parrot cry which we are sorry to see repeated in the Commissioner's review. The unemployment would have been there if all our Universities had been closed down: only there would be uneducated unemployed instead of educated unemployed. As for the remedy suggested let us remind Sir George that unemployment is worst at present in the countries where education, general and technical, has attained a very high standard of efficiency. The fact is that the Indian administration has become wooden and ante-deluvian. It is unable to adjust itself to changing conditions. It is therefore thrown into a frenzy by every new development. It is alarmed by the growth of population; alarmed by the increase of students; frightened by its one shadow.

EUROPE AND ASIA.

From the commencement of this century attempts have been made to interpret Asia to Europeans— attempts mostly inspired by fear. The first sustained effort in such an interpretation was Meredith Townsend's "Asia and Europe." Mr. Townsend who claimed for his conclusions the authority of one who had "devoted a long life to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe," declared emphatically that the fears of the German Emperor of Japanese invasion of Europe preceded by Japanese domination over China, were baseless because the Yellow Peoples could make no headway against an united Europe which according to Mr. Townsend's thesis they would have inevitably to face. He, however, was equally definite in the belief that ultimately Europe and Asia would each go their own way. Mr. Townsend wrote between 1874 and 1910. The Coloured Races Peril theory, nevertheless, was welcomed in certain European circles for two reasons. First as a salve to a conscience uneasy at the methods employed in penetrating into Asia and Africa by the imperialist powers of the West. And secondly, as a much-needed distraction from European obsession with the Semitic question to which the historian Mommsen had given expression: "However wars and migrations may have altered the line of demarcation, and thrown the races across each other's path, a deep sense of diversity has always severed, and still severs, the Indo-Germanic peoples from the Syrian, Israelite and Arabic nations." The Yellow Peril scare was developed by Mr. Basil Mathews and Dr. Lothrop Stoddard to the point of dividing the world into two warring camps, the White race and the Coloured ones. The suggestions for meeting the situation put forward by these two writers were all on the lines of force. These arguments were countered by missionaries who stressed the possibilities of peace in their programmes for Christianizing the world. The most effective answer, however, was provided by the American writer "Upton Close" in his "Revolt of Asia" (1927). "Asia's movement," he wrote, "is thus far entirely directed against the Westerner on Asian shores. There is not the bud, thus far, of an offensive against the white man in his own countries. It would be decades before a new Yellow Peril could be born, even in thought."

Many incidents have taken place since Mr. Townsend wrote his book. Japan has shown that though, as Mr. Townsend remarked, all she wants is markets for her products, China alone can not satisfy her trade needs. If the Imperialist motive was lacking in Mr. Townsend's days, economic ones have now forced the situation. Moreover, Japan has learnt that even in opposition to her ideals and ambitions Europe cannot unite. The Manchukuo incident laid bare the defects of the League of Nations. It also showed up the weaknesses of the European powers. Japan, after biding her time, has now sprung on a startled West an Asiatic Monroe Doctrine relating immediately to China. There is little likelihood of a Pan-Asiatic movement arising out of this situation even though Japan has raised the cry of "Asia for the Asiatics." It has, however, revived European fears of an Asiatic menace and, though these fears are not factors potent enough to unite that Continent, various political parties are clamouring, for reasons of their own, economic and militarist, for action against Japan. Even the usually pacifist New Statesman urges in a recent issue that Britain should adopt a strong line on the new Japanese claims. Incidentally the British attitude is well summed up by Time of New York in its issue of May 7th. "The Occidental Powers cannot look to England to take the lead in resisting Japanese encroachments in China." And, as in the Manchukuo affair, Japan has not been slow in taking advantage of the present tendency in European countries of looking to each other for a lead. Western imperialism ignores the fact that the diplomacy of one Asiatic nation is concentrated mainly on securing for itself a place in world politics and attempts to read into the situation a threat to Europe's existence. In doing so it assumes a measure of unity in Asia which it has hitherto denied and which has never been attained in Europe itself. In their dealings with Asia the two leading colonial powers, Britain and France, have relied on diplomacy. The alternating use of conciliation and repression has served their purpose of maintaining the Status quo. But it is in Italy and Germany that efforts are being directed at finding a permanent solution to problems confronting the West in its intercourse with the East. Germany seeks to establish the cult of Nordic supremacy. Italy under Mussolini is interesting herself in attempts at bringing about cultural assimilation. Both have their prophets. Mr. Oswald Spengler, with his pessimistic forebodings of the extinction of the White race and destruction of their ideals, urges his German followers to press forward their advantage and to keep the coloured races in check. Mr. Cohen-Portheim presents the ideal of Asiatic-European co-operation in solving world problems. The publication at this juncture of English translations of Mr. Spengler's "The Hour of Decision" (Messrs. George Allen & Unwin; 8s 6d) and Mr. Portheim's "The Message of Asia" (Messrs. Duckworth & Co.; 8s 6d) is most opportune.

Mr. Spengler maintains in his recent book, as he did in his earlier "Man and Technics," that "the whites are under attack by the collective mass of the coloured population of the earth" and that the white peoples are an exhausted race. He sees the hope of Europe centred on the German nation. The struggle of the day, as he visualises it, lies between the herd collectivism of Asia and the individualism of the West. He has a feeling that the White race is nearing extinction but in the Hitler movement he sees the germs of resistance to decay. The collapse of the West has been put off by the rise of the Nazis to power and is no longer regarded as imminent. This is certainly more optimistic than Mr. Spengler's conclusion in "Man and Technics" that all that the white man had was the right to die a noble death. Mr. Spengler derides pacificism as symptomatic of weakness. He obviously makes the coloured man in his own image when he remarks "the coloured man sees through the white when he talks about humanity and everlasting peace; he scents the other's unfitness and lack of will to defend himself." The coloured races have been free from traditions of war. Even if they did desire to engage in a life and death conflict with the Whites, they are far too much under White control to achieve that end. There is, however, one pleasing feature—to the Nordic—about Mr. Spengler's new book. The "White" epithet has been utilised to include the Italians and the French and the adjective "Nordic" or "Faustian" has been employed very sparingly. This should go far to give Western Europe the security of numbers and to allay its panic. We welcome Mr. Spengler's book if only for this reason because unless Europe discards the fear complex there can be no true understanding of Asia.

Mr. Paul Cohen-Portheim's book, "The Message of Asia," is on a far higher plane. Mr. Portheim, an Austrian author who died in 1932, writes with insight and vision. The East is fortunate in having an interpreter who can discriminate even in things relating to the Orient. Approaching the subject from the cultural standpoint, Mr. Portheim sees the conflict between Asia and Europe as a clash of individualism and universalism. "The history of civilisation," he writes, "is the history of the efforts, struggles and compromises of Asia and Europe." Our author pictures the history of Euro-Asiatic contact as an exchange of qualities peculiar to each continent. The present era is an age of the grand "settling up of disputes" for humanity. Recent events do not seem to bear out Mr. Portheim's optimism regarding the approach of a new era of reconciliation between the two ideals. Yet side by side with the forces of reaction in East and West there is a steady movement for solidarity. It is a singular coincidence that Spengler and Portheim start from the same premises—the conflict between individualism and universalism and the European exaltation of reason above intuition—but arrive at diametrically opposite conclusions. This is chiefly due to the fact that Spengler's conception of history is almost solely as a succession of wars while Portheim's is a steady movement towards a synthesis. Of the two methods of European approach to Asia there is no doubt that the cultural is superior to the militaristic.

So much for the European attitudes of the present-day towards the East. In large measure they have been responsible for two similar movements in Asia itself. The militaristic attitude of Spengler finds its oriental counterpart in the cry of "Asia for Asiatics." There have been many Asiatic interpreters of European civilisation of the Cohen-Portheim School. The superficial attitude underlying the dictum that "East is East and West is West" has not had a very wide appeal in Asia, probably owing to the closer contact with the West which this continent has had for over a century. Even in Japan, where the new Asiatic Monroe Doctrine has been formulated, the anti-European feeling is not so acute as the Occident might imagine it to be. Japan, notwithstanding Spengler's assertion to the contrary, has not yet reached her peak. She is not likely to deliberately court the exclusion or restriction of the right of immigration of Asiatics, which European countries might enforce as a measure of retaliation. As the first of the Asiatic countries to assimilate the lessons of the industrial West, Japan will not, even for leadership in Asia, forego the advantages of points of contact with Europe. The rest of Asia, with the example before it of Japan, has come to realise that her survival in the future depends largely on a mastery of the technique of Europe. That she has also in recent years come to realise that this alone is not enough, will not affect materially her relations with Europe. The attitude of Asia towards European imperialism in Asia has very little to do, at present at any rate, with Euro-Asiatic relation. The future will largely depend on what Europe requires from the East—co-operation or markets.

A Madras Minister on Temple Entry:—Speaking at the Tamils' Conference in Tinnevely, the Hon. Mr. P. T. Rajan, Development Minister in the Madras Government, referred to the question of admission of antyajias to temples. Mr. Rajan said that he was not speaking as a politician but as a devout lover of his religion, Saivism, but his view may be taken to be shared by a large section of Hindus who have no interests in temples other than that of worshippers. He declared he was not in favour of any legislation enabling the Adi-Dravidas to enter into the temples. Public opinion should bring about the desired reform before any enactment was placed on the statute book. He exhorted his audience to open the temples to the depressed classes. This is also the view of Mr. Venkatrama Sastry and, we believe, even Raja Bahadur Krishnamachariar will not be opposed to it. This consensus of opinion is conclusive against the attempt of supporters of Temple Entry by legislation to hold up those who oppose it as enemies of Hinduism.

RAMA RAJYA.

Mr. S. D. Nadkarni who is not a stranger to readers of the Reformer has written a book, entitled "Rama Rajya," on which he wishes to have my opinion. It is in the form of an open letter addressed to Gandhiji requesting him to explain several passages in his writings and utterances covering a considerable period of time in which Rama Rajya is held up either directly or inferentially as an ideal State. Unfortunately I am not such a close student of Gandhiji's writings and speeches as Mr. Nadkarni. I know in a general way that Gandhiji regards Rama Rajya as being synonymous with righteous rule, as the generality of Hindus do, but it has never occurred to me to probe further into the matter. When millions of people for untold generations have held Rama Rajya as the best period of government known to Hindus, there is more than a presumption that there must be good grounds for it. Undoubtedly there is also an obverse to this medal as to every other. When historians write of the Elizabethan Age or the Augustan Period or the Age of Pericles, we know that there were several flaws in them but we understand that the general trend of those periods was towards progress and expansion. Rama Rajya has also to be understood in the same broad way. The tendency of modern historical research is to place greater reliance on tradition than on written records. The latter can be and have often been forged. Tradition can not be manufactured. Besides I have not found it necessary in connection with any question which has interested me, to doubt or deny the correctness of the belief that Rama Rajya was a model Raj. To reproduce Rama Rajya you must first produce a Rama. This is not a matter of practical politics. Mr. Nadkarni, however, seems to apprehend that an effort might be made to substitute Rama Rajya for parliamentary government and he has in this open letter tried to prove that it will not be an improvement. No useful purpose is served by discussing whether an impossible scheme will or will not be an improvement.

¶ The question raised by Mr. Nadkarni, namely, whether the incidents in the life of Rama which he has selected for reproof, are compatible with the traditional idea of Rama Rajya as a righteous Raj, admits of a simple answer. One of the first rules of criticism is that every historical character should be judged according to the standards of his own time. A ruler who in our day did some of the things alleged against Rama by Mr. Nadkarni would be rightly deemed guilty of objectionable conduct. In judging a pre-historic personage, who has come to be regarded by millions of Hindus not only as an ideal man and ruler but an incarnation of God, there is at the least a strong presumption that anything imputed to him which is out of tune with the main lines of his character and disposition, is due to misunderstanding or misreporting at the source or to our inability or failure to perceive the meaning of the figurative language which the ancients in India and elsewhere used profusely. There is yet another reason for caution. Valmiki's Ramayan is a classic. But its version of the story is not the most ancient. In one of the Jataka stories of Buddha, Sita is referred to as the sister and not as the wife of Rama. Javanese sculptures indicate some other variations. The incidents which Mr. Nadkarni notes, might not have taken place or might have been interpolated either by Valmiki himself or an earlier poet.

There is another episode which Mr. Nadkarni has overlooked—I am sure he cannot approve of it—which to my mind is a worse blot than these. The mutilation of Surpanakha was not only a brutal outrage but it was really the cause of the Rama-Ravana War. From the earliest times Hindu law and custom have condemned physical violence to women, even to a flower being thrown at her. The rules of war are even more emphatic on the point. I cannot believe that a great soul like Rama was guilty of this cowardly assault on a woman whose misfortune it was to fall in love with him. The Ramayana as history records the inception of two great movements in Hindu history. The one was the assimilation of the Vedic cult of Dasaratha with (or by) the philosophic school of Janaka, famed as Raja-Rishi or the royal sage. The other is the contact between the Northern fire-worshipping cult with the highly civilised Southern devotees of Shaivism. Valmiki has utilised this historical background to inculcate certain virtues of social and family life which were perhaps not very common in his day. The most prominent of these as it appears in the Ramayana is chastity in women. One gets rather bored by the extolment of this commonplace virtue until one remembers that Vedic sages were latitudinarians in sexual relations and that the daughter of the philosopher-king Janaka represented a new influence in the life of Ayodhya under the easy-going uxorious Dasaratha. That, to my mind, explains the malicious readiness of the mob of that city to cast suspicion on her whose life was a rebuke to its own.

Even if all these charges are held to be proved, the idea of Rama Rajya would remain unaffected. It stands for a system which is known now as the Totalitarian State. Kalidasa says that the King is the father of his people for all purposes except that of bringing them into the world. It was the King's business to keep himself informed of all matters affecting the well-being of his people. Like the Hebrew kings of old he was considered responsible for any calamity, including a natural calamity, that happened to befall the country. An earthquake would have been regarded as a punishment for some dereliction on his part. In one respect, and that an important one, Rama Rajya differed from the modern Totalitarian State. The King did not legislate. The laws were laid down by sages and was administered by the King on the advice of Ministers whose hereditary function was the study and interpretation of the Law. Adjustments of the Law according to changing conditions were made by the caste and the village councils which by an unanimous vote—majorities and minorities were unknown to Indian polity—could modify custom; and custom, according to an axiom of Hindu jurisprudence, overrode the written law. This is not the place to enlarge on this fascinating theme. But it may be said that in a self-contained State the Indian system provided all the requirements of both self-government and good government without the wasteful paraphernalia of political agitation. Thus Rama Rajya satisfied the Campbell-Bannerman aphorism which Mr. Nadkarni, without even a suspicion of the anachronism, insists on applying to it. N.

Gandhiji in Bombay:—Mahatma Gandhi and members of the Congress Working Committee arrived in Bombay from Wardha by the Calcutta Mail on Thursday morning. On arrival at Victoria Terminus, Gandhiji was received by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Mathuradas Vissanji Khimji, Mr. Bhulabhai J. Desai, Mr. K. M. Munshi and members of the Gandhi Reception Committee.

Among those who arrived with Gandhiji were Mr. Sarojini Naidu, Mr. K. F. Nariman, Mr. O. Rajagopalachari, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Dr. Syed Mahmud, Mr. A. V. Thakkar, Mr. Shankarlal Banker, Miraben, and Dr. B. C. Roy.

INDOLOGICAL STUDIES IN FRANCE—I* (BY PROF. SYLVAIN LEVI.)

India, involved in the current of European politics in the course of the 18th century, immediately attracts and retains attention. The "wisdom of India," consecrated by Greek and Latin testimonies, excites curiosity. The Church, as well as the Encyclopædists, propose to draw arguments from it, either to defend the Revelation or to condemn it. A twenty-year old Frenchman, Anquetil du Perron, eager to rediscover the Vedas of the Brahmins, as well as the Zoroastrian Scriptures, does not hesitate to sail as a volunteer in the service of the Compagnie des Indes, in 1754. Almost half a century afterwards, faithful to his programme, in a world which had undergone such drastic changes, he reveals to the elite of learned and patient readers the mystical and theological speculations of Ancient India; worded in implacably literal Latin, his work is the translation of a Persian version of the Sanskrit originals. Anquetil had not succeeded in obtaining from the Brahmins the knowledge of their sacred idiom.

Without leaving Paris, and with no other materials than the collection of manuscripts in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Chezy masters the Sanskrit language; a chair in the Collège de France is created to consecrate his success. Between the disasters of 1814 and Waterloo, France, faithful to her traditions, welcomes Sanskrit into the glorious institution which had formerly been the first centre of Greek and Hebrew studies. Endowed with a romantic temperament, Chezy was especially sensitive to the exotic charms of Indian poetry; he delivered, as his opening lecture, a "Discourse on the excellence, beauty and richness of the Sanskrit language, and on the utility and pleasures which can be derived from its study." But this distinguished dilettante did not shirk the most arid labours of the philologist to satisfy his taste. A passionate admirer of Sakuntala, which had been revealed by William Jones and enthusiastically greeted by Goethe, he succeeded in mastering the original by means of the materials at his disposal; the "Princeps" edition that he has given, is already almost a definite edition.

After Chezy, Burnouf, who succeeds him in the Collège de France, carries the gifts of the philologist to the point of genius. His marvelously balanced personality combines scrupulous exactitude, long patience and powerful labour with unflinching intuition, a very fine sense of realities and an accurate and pleasing style; he animates old texts anew, he revives life in the same way as the artist creates it. Whether he edits and translates a Brahmanic text, the Bhagavata Purana, or undertakes to study Buddhist literature with the Lotus del a Bonne Loi, or again, elaborates a vast synthesis of unpublished materials in his Introduction a l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, he builds up imperishable monuments. He still remains, and shall continue to remain, the model and the guide. On the threshold of an immense literature, where curiosity, attracted from every side, runs the risk of losing its way, he discerns and indicates the two directions that French science will most willingly follow after him: interpretation of the Vedas, study of Buddhism. The choice is not arbitrary. It bears on the two fields through which India has come into contact with the rest of the world. If the Vedas are not the "Aryan Bible," as some ardent imaginations had complacently pictured them to be, they nevertheless throw a unique and remarkable light on the religious past of a vast human group which reaches from the Atlantic to the Ganges; not only are they the starting point of the richest and most abundant religious development known to humanity, but they bring to the comparative study of religious phenomena an indispensable contribution. On the other hand, Buddhism propagates the genius of India outside the natural boundaries of the country; it links the peoples of the Far-East as Christianity links those of the West; while its action is evident in Tibet, in China, in Korea, in Japan, in Indo-China, it is traceable on Iranian soil, and is even attached, by Manichæism at least, to the destinies of primitive Christianity. Chezy had come into contact with India through Persia; he taught Persian in the School of Oriental Languages. Burnouf annexes to Sanskrit not only Pali, but Tibetan, Siamese and Burmese; and at the same time he deciphers, with almost unflinching accuracy, the old Texts of the Avesta which had been brought to Paris by Anquetil, but had as yet not found an interpreter.

The creation of Ecole des Hautes Etudes [School of Higher Studies] in 1868 opens a new centre of Indological studies. The edition of the Grammaire palie de Kaçayana by Senart; the essay of Paul Regnaud on the poet Bharthihari; the edition of the Bhāminivāṭara by Abel Bergaigne; and the review of this work published in the Revue Critique by a co-worker still unknown, August Barth, heralds the birth of a Pleiad of Indologists. The study of the problems of religion is a favourite pursuit with this generation of workers. The spirit of Romanticism had invaded erudition and tended to falsify its results. But the French school appeals to critical reasoning against arbitrary sentimentalism. Opposed to all sweeping generalisations, it proposes to study the religious movements of India within the framework of Indian civilisation. Barth's work on the Religions de l'Inde is the most powerful attempt which has been made to link up in one continuous series the religious manifestations of India, from the Vedic hymns down to the contemporary reformers. Bulletins des Religions de l'Inde, the scattered reviews and memoirs by Barth in several journals—at present put together in his collected works—attest to the extraordinary variety of his erudition as well as the vigorous fecundity of his critical powers. Bergaigne brings about a complete revolution in the sphere of religious history by a tireless series of works grouped around the Rîg-Veda; the Vedic hymns, which had been interpreted as songs of spontaneous adoration towards the forces of nature, reveal an artificial pedantic religion at his hands, surcharged with liturgy and rites. The primitive man, who was supposed to reveal himself through these hymns, vanishes altogether and leaves in his place the priest, the minister of a culture more formal than inspired. At the other extremity of Vedic literature Paul Regnaud shows in the older Upanisads the rudiments of the great philosophical systems. Senart devotes most of his energy to the study of Buddhism; he tries to discover in the legendary figure of the Buddha traits of Vedic origin as well as those common to the divinities of the Hindu pantheon; in a sphere better protected than all others against any preconceived ideas he demonstrates how through the tangle of fusion the legends evolve the figure of a mangod. The edition of the Mahāvastu offers to scientific research a biography of the Buddha particularly rich in mythical elements. It is also under the inspiration of Buddhism that Senart applies himself to the study of the inscriptions of Piyadasi, the Constantine of Buddhism, which furnish the earliest positive materials for researches on paleography, linguistics and the political and religious history of India.

Directly or indirectly all Indological studies in France to-day have their origin in Abel Bergaigne. It is under his encouragement that appear the works of Victor Henry on the ritual of the Agnistoma (in collaboration with the Dutch scholar Caland) and on ancient Indian magic, and Sylvain Levi's work on the Doctrine of Sacrifice in the Brahmanas is inspired by the same revered master. Bergaigne opened up another new field of research before his premature death. The conquests of France have opened up Indo-China to the explorers; Aymonier, a captain of the Colonial Infantry, has discovered an immense epigraphic literature in Sanskrit, which has been classified and scientifically dealt with by Bergaigne, and from which he has brought to light an unknown chapter of universal history; Indo-China owes her civilisation to India; the literature, the sacred language, the institutions and the arts of India have flourished in India from the first centuries of the Christian era. Suddenly, attention is drawn to the role of India in the civilisation of the Far East and on her importance for the civilisation of the whole humanity. The brilliant revival of Sinological studies in France favours this new orientation; the French scholars, who had given to the Science of Indology the invaluable accounts of the voyages of Fa-Hien and Hiuentang, find now fitting successors. The creation of the Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient at Saigon in 1899 definitely joins Indology to Sinology and its annexes.

The historical importance of India shines forth from that date in all its glory: connected with the group of original Indo-Europeans by her language and rituals, with Iran by an even closer bond of linguistic and religious relations, attached to Persia by the Achæminia conquest and to the Hellenistic world by Alexander and his successors, to China by Buddhism, to Tibet, Indo-China and Polynesia by the civilisation she has given to them, India is the connecting link between the two sections, apparently isolated, of the antique world. The recent discoveries in Central Asia, to which France contributed her glorious share through the Pelliot Mission, have added a new chapter to the already vast history of the cultural expansion of India. More than any other country in the world India presents our civilisation clearly as the result of the collective labour of the whole humanity, where every historical group has its own story of its loans and borrowings. It is from this fundamental conception of Indian civilisation that proceed most of the Indological works published in France during the last twenty-five years; it is a fundamental characteristic feature of the Mélanges, dédiés à Sylvain Levi. In the field of literary history it has inspired the Theatre Indien of Sylvain Levi and Lacote's essay on Gunadhya et l'histoire des contes indiens; in the field of history, in the narrow sense of the word, it has inspired Sylvain Levi's work on Nepal, the Hindu kingdom on the border of Tibet and with opening into China; in the field of archaeology it inspires the beautiful studies of Foucher on Greco-Buddhist art and the iconography of Buddhism.

The onerous task of editing texts was not neglected during this period; thus the Ratnaparikṣā of Buddhakṛatṭa and the Rāstrapālapariprekṣā were published by Finot, the Mahayāna-Sūtralankāra by Sylvain Levi; the Brhatkathā loka-saṃgraha by Lacote.

ISLAM AND PURDAH.*

(By Mrs. AYESHA SHAIKAT ALL)

I should have hesitated before giving my opinion on "Purdah" but for the fact that I have observed it myself for a short time and feel that I know both sides of the question. I can only speak, on "Purdah" as it affects Muslims, however, as I have not had the privilege of meeting many Hindu families. To be perfectly frank I cannot think of any justification whatever for "Purdah."

In the first place it is contrary to the whole spirit of Islam which is essentially a practicable faith, and one which gives, in theory, more privileges to its women followers than, I might say, any other Faith.

It is always put forward in defence of "Purdah" that the virtue of woman is of more importance than her health or happiness. But, I ask, what virtue? A woman of true virtue needs no "Purdah"; the virtue is cloak enough. As for the others a stimulation of virtue may please their neighbours—it is true—but will it satisfy God?

It seems to me after close observation that the whole system is essentially a man's institution. I am ready to believe that at one period of history it may have been necessary but that time has passed; unfortunately for all concerned man was given the opportunity of finding out the convenience of the system from his own point of view and he is naturally reluctant to give it up. His women folk keep a discreet silence on the subject which speaks more eloquently than words.

I am afraid that only a measure of economic independence will be able to restore their individuality and their freedom of speech—as it is they are only a faint echo of their menfolk.

'Purdah' seems to be based on the assumption that man is capable of running his own particular sphere without the help of woman. This is merely ridiculous optimism for no community which amounts to anything, has ever been able to work on these lines and makes a success of it.

Woman has a specific role in life which demands health, knowledge, beauty and confidence for its fulfilment. One must ask oneself if 'Purdah' is likely to encourage these.

It is no coincidence that the infant mortality of India is the highest in the world, and the greatest contributory factors, I should say, are poor physique of the mother due to lack of God's sunshine and the ability to move about freely—privileges which the lowest of His creatures can enjoy—and her ignorance of child-care, ill-health and ignorance are the two chief evils resulting from 'Purdah' not the only ones by any means, but quite enough to prevent woman from living that beautiful and natural life for which she was ordained.

Man may struggle to keep 'Purdah' but it can only survive another generation or so. Even now the upper classes are rapidly freeing themselves from the shackles of a useless and pernicious convention. Let us hope that this heralds the end of a useless and pernicious convention.

The initiate will have to beware, however, of confusing liberty with license and the dividing line is not always apparent to the inexperienced. I notice that many erstwhile 'Purdah' ladies, in their enthusiasm, are adopting some Western ideas which are not in the least suitable for them.

The superb dignity, grace, and modest bearing of the daughters of India are qualities to marvel at; it would be tragic if these were to be discarded for the vulgarity of the new world.

THE STORY IN ST. JOHN.*

The Indian Social Reformer has an interesting note concerning the Codex Sinaiticus which Britain has bought from Russia for £ 100,000. From this 'Mount Sinai Manuscript of the Bible' there is missing the section in St. John vii. 53—viii. 11 about the woman who was found committing adultery. 'Neo-Christian readers,' says the Reformer, have regarded Jesus Christ's 'treatment of the problem' of this woman 'as the noblest and most distinctive element in the Christian Gospel,' as 'there is 'nothing to equal it in other religions.'

Since two of the very oldest manuscripts, the Sinaiticus and the Vaticanus, both now in the British Museum, and most early authorities for the Greek Testament, do not contain this moving story, the English Revised Version prints this section within brackets and gives the footnote: 'Most of the ancient authorities omit John vii. 52—viii. 11. Those which contain it vary much from each other.' The Marathi Bible issued by the Bible Society also prints the section in brackets; 'the Athavale Version' (1st and 2nd editions) has no brackets.

Dr. Moffatt, from whose rendering of the story we quote mainly below, has the note: 'It is uncertain to which, if any, of the canonical gospels, this fragment of primitive tradition originally belonged.' As the Reformer learns with deep regret that this story 'is omitted' from early manuscripts of St. John, there may be some comfort derived from the theory some scholars hold that the section has strayed out of Mark's Gospel and that it possibly belongs to a different ending to St. Mark than the one found in our English Bibles. We give below, first the story itself, and then a remarkable addition from one of the manuscripts.

One day in the life of Jesus, the Scribes and Pharisees brought a woman who had been caught in the act of adultery, and making her stand forward they said to Jesus, 'Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now Moses has commanded us in the Law to stone such creatures; but what do you say?' Jesus then stooped down, and began to write with His finger on the ground, but, as they persisted with their question, He raised Himself and said to them, 'Let the innocent among you throw the first stone.' Then He stooped down again and wrote on the ground. On hearing what He said, they went away one by one, beginning with the older men till Jesus was left alone with the woman standing before Him. Looking up, Jesus said to her, 'Woman where are they? Has no one condemned you?' She said, 'No one, Lord.' Jesus said, 'Neither do I go your way, and sin no more' (John viii. 3-11).

Some years ago there was discovered an old manuscript which adds certain deeply interesting details to the story referred to above as narrated in St. John viii. 3-11. These added details show not only how very Pharisaic were those critics of the guilty woman brought to Jesus but also how Jesus penetrated their hypocrisy, for this old manuscript adds that when Jesus stooped down and wrote on the ground 'it was on sand that He was writing and that He wrote down the details of crimes perpetrated long ago by these very men. One of those accusers, says this old manuscript, bore the name of Eldad, and as Jesus wrote in the sand He wrote: 'Eldad slew his companion in the desert.' Though forty years had passed since the deed had been done of which none other knew, the crowd now standing around saw the flash of Eldad's sword drawn for murder; and Eldad crept away in silent guilt. Still Jesus went on writing and this time He wrote: 'Horan stole a house from Bunan's widow.' As soon as the horror-stricken Horan saw his deed written there, off he fled. And so, says the old story, Jesus went on writing some ill deeds done by each one of this woman's critics until every critic had vanished. Preachers among our readers will see in this striking story an illustration of more than one important truth.

MADRAS NON-BRAHMIN PARTY.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the South Indian Liberal Federation, Madras, was held this evening in the premises of Sir Theagaraya Chetti Memorial buildings. There was a large gathering of members from all parts of the presidency and there were forty members of the Committee. Sir R. K. Shunmugam Chettiar was present by special invitation, but did not take part in the proceedings. Kumararajah M. A. Muthia Chettiar of Chettinad, Chairman of the Executive Committee, presided.

The following resolutions were passed:

(1) This meeting of the Executive Committee of the South Indian Liberal Federation places on record its deep sense of sorrow and regret at the demise of Mr. O. C. Srinivasan, a member of this Committee, and conveys its sincere condolences to the members of the bereaved family.

Moved from the chair and carried all standing.

(2) Resolved that the following members do constitute an Election Board, with power to co-opt, to issue an election manifesto, arrange for carrying on propaganda, select candidates on behalf of the Party, and make all other arrangements for the coming elections to the Legislative Assembly:

(1) The Hon'ble the Rajah Sahib of Bobbili (2) Diwan Bahadur B. Muniswami Naidu, (3) Kumararajah of Chettinad, (4) Mr. W. P. A. Soundara Pandya Nadar, (5) Mr. R. M. Palat, (6) Rao Bahadur A. T. Pannirselvam, (7) Kumararajah of Venkatagiri, (8) Mr. Yahia Ali, (9) Rao Bahadur R. Srinivasan, (10) Dr. C. Natesa Mudaliar, (11) Diwan Bahadur G. Narayanaswami Chetti and (12) Mr. G. Lakshmana Reddi.

Proposed by Mr. T. S. Nataraja Pillai, and seconded by the Rajah of Mirzapur.

(3) This meeting of the Executive Committee of the South Indian Liberal Federation reiterates the following resolutions passed at its meeting on June 15, 1930:

'The creed of the South Indian Liberal Federation being (a) the attainment of Swaraj for India as a component part of the British Empire by all peaceful, legitimate and constitutional means (b) the attainment of social equality by the abolition of all distinctions based on birth (c) the ensuring of adequate representation of all communities in the public services, in the Legislatures, and in other public bodies. Any person above the age of 21, who subscribes to this creed, is eligible for membership in the South Indian Liberal Federation' and resolves that this be a recommendation to the next Confederation.

Moved by Dr. C. Natesa Mudaliar and seconded by Mr. K. A. P. Viswanatha Pillai of Trichinopoly.

(4) Resolved that the next Confederation be held at Madras sometime in October, the date to be fixed by the Reception Committee.

Proposed by Diwan Bahadur G. Narayanaswami Chetti and seconded by Mr. A. V. Banaji Rao.

BRITAIN AND WAR DEBTS.

(JUSTICE, MADRAS.)

Italy and France, as we have already pointed out, welcome the fact that Great Britain is in line with them in not paying the war debts. Meanwhile, in spite of the justification that Great Britain can find for the attitude that it has taken up, the virtual repudiation of the payment has created a very bad moral atmosphere, and there are not wanting people who desire to take advantage of the situation and to suggest that repudiation of debts in circumstances which are beyond the control of the debtor is thoroughly justifiable.

Great Britain has pointed out that any large payment of war debts at the present time would seriously cripple further the present trade position in the world. The restriction in international trade is of so acute a character that Great Britain feels that the world economic position will further deteriorate, and a greater slump in prices of commodities will be the result, if the payment is to be insisted on by the United States. The paralysing influence upon trade and commerce, due to the transfer of large amounts of gold and silver from one country to another, cannot be exaggerated. But it is not unnatural that America should find itself unable to accept this position. Its advocates feel that while they came to the help of Great Britain and the European countries in their hour of great need, the obligation then undertaken should not be repudiated with such little concern. They feel also that with the money that they will get they can support many projects of public utility involving capital expenditure, which may, both directly and indirectly, influence an upward trend in commodity price. This, in its turn, will have a salutary effect on the economic position of the world as a whole.

The Note of the British Government is not, obviously, the last word on the subject. A large creditor country, itself with outstanding obligations from many debtors all over the world, Great Britain cannot afford to be a party to the theory of repudiation of debts in extreme circumstances. That is why in every communication of the British Government stress is laid on the fact that no question of repudiation is involved. The amount of outstanding debt which Great Britain has to pay for the last three instalments is over fifty million pounds sterling. What the ultimate result of further negotiations, which are bound to take place, can be, it is impossible to predict at present.

India is, however, interested in the question, because the Finance Member has made a provision for the payment of Rs. 58,00,000 to Great Britain on account of war debts—a provision which it will be unnecessary to carry out, in case the present attitude of the British Government is maintained.

The reply from Washington will be awaited with keen interest, and until America realises that it is to its own interest not to press for its obligations at this juncture, and to come to a better understanding on the whole question of the payment of war debts, it is difficult to see how the question can be solved to the satisfaction of the debtor countries and their creditor.

(LEADER, ALLAHABAD.)

The British note on war debts presented to the United States shows that Britain is not going to make even a token payment. The grounds urged for withholding payment will be regarded as unconvincing by its creditor. It urges that the transfer of large sums will cause a sharp depreciation of the sterling against dollars which Government understands is inconsistent with the monetary policy of the United States. Britain seems to be much more anxious that the monetary policy of the United States should not be disturbed than the American Government themselves. The latter must have been fully aware of the effect on exchange of the transfer of large sums, and yet they were not deterred from making a demand for the payment of the debt instalments. The note seeks to link, not for the first time, the payment of the American debt with the realization of the amounts due to Britain from its European debtors. The United States has never admitted that the payment of its dues should be dependent on the realization of their dues by its European debtors. When it gave huge credits to them during the war, it was not stipulated that the countries to which it advanced the loans would repay them only if they won the war and were able to exact reparations from the defeated powers. If Britain cannot realize its war debts this cannot be a valid excuse for not meeting its own obligations. The note emphasizes that the chances of world recovery would be indefinitely postponed if Britain made demands of her own war debts. 'Such a procedure,' it is stated, 'would throw a bombshell on the European arena having financial and economic repercussions in all the five continents.' The United States, however, never wanted Britain to throw such a bombshell. The arguments urged in the note, in plain language, come to this that America need not expect any payment of the amounts due to it from its European debtors unless the latter are able to realize their dues from their debtors. Incapacity to pay is nowhere pleaded in the note as a reason for deferring payment.

It is an ungrateful world we live in. Had it not been for the timely American help in men and money it is very doubtful if the allied powers would have won the war. Britain and France, as a result of the crowning victory won, have made large additions to their territories and realized large sums as reparations. The United States did not claim any territorial expansion or reparations. It has been simply asking those powers whom it helped with money, men, munitions and materials in a moment of crisis, to repay its just dues. President Roosevelt in his message to the Congress has made it clear that he does not want to drive a hard bargain and that he is willing to discuss frankly and fully the special circumstances relating to the means of payment.

The British note wants the initiative to be taken by President Roosevelt for starting discussions for the 'ultimate settlement of inter-Governmental war debts.' We doubt if the United States will ever agree to start such a discussion. It has been ready to enter into negotiations with individual debtors, but it does not want to involve itself in the larger question of inter-Governmental debts.

(NATIONAL CALL, DELHI.)

Honesty is the better part of valour. And Britain has for once behaved honestly. Instead of continuing the farce of making token payments, Britain has definitely decided to default. Of course as is usual, Britain's action has been given the colour of martyrdom. England has repudiated its war debt and its obligations to America, not because it is unable to pay, but because England has discovered in it the only sure means of forcing America to come to terms with the debtor nations, and because unless the question is settled world prosperity would be delayed. It is significant that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made no provision in the budget for debt payments, and had assumed at the time of framing his budget, that the debt would be repudiated. After what England has done we hope British statesmen will hardly mind if India at a later date also decides likewise and repudiates such obligations which have been contracted on her behalf to further Imperial and not Indian interests.

realpatidar.com FATHER BLATTER.*

Fr. Blatter was born at Rebstein, a bright little township perched high above the banks of the upper Rhine. He must have been the joy and the despair of his mother. He was her only son and his father died so early that he never knew him and that a bachelor uncle, a physician, had to come to the rescue when a man's sterner handling was imperative. A boy so clever, keen, quick, so indulged with money, so sure to be pardoned in the end by a mother, could dare much and did not fail to do so. He went to sundry schools and the chief reason of his multifarious changes were the outrageous practical jokes which he played and inspired. For some years he went to a Real-Schule in the canton of Thurgau where he took up modern languages—French, English, Italian, Spanish, with such ease that later on he spent very little time in becoming familiar with English and French which he spoke almost as well as his native German and never found any difficulty in consulting Italian or Spanish books. In after-life for the purposes of his science he looked up Danish, Portuguese, Russian books and ascribed his facility to his early training. For his classical studies he went to the Benedictine School at Sarnen in Unterwalden. The monks despaired of reducing this irreducible Appenzeller to time-honoured discipline and so they advised the culprit's mother to make him finish his secondary classical studies elsewhere. This was done at Schwyz in a Gymnasium still more beautifully situated above the lake of Lucerne than Sarnen. Here he fell into the class of his future colleague at St. Xavier's College, Robert Zimmermann. Robert his whole life through kept something of the admiration which a more plodding school companion has for a brilliant, all successful fellow-student to whom everything comes easy: games, acting, singing, studies, popularity.

Blatter's vocation requires some explanation. What could have made this boisterous, jovial, life-loving, well-to-do, clever, universally popular Swiss lad dream of giving up whatever was most attractive to him? His uncle's practice was held in reserve for him; his aptitudes made it sure he would have a brilliant University career. He was an only son and his mother would be left all by herself. She was a Protestant until her son was in his teens, but she herself had taught him his Catholic catechism and went to church with him. Her conversion to the Catholic faith was the beginning of an extraordinarily saintly life. She instilled into her son her own deep religious outlook on life. He ever wore his good humour on his sleeve and only a few intimates knew his real self. His mother died some five years ago and like many good people lost all her money in the aftermath of the War. One consolation she had when her son saw her again in 1926. But he was so unwell that he went from the train to bed and from bed to the train for the return to India.

Blatter entered the Jesuit noviceship at Tisis, near the Jesuit College, Stella Matutina, Feldkirch, on October 1, 1896. Here he was initiated into the ascetic life with some fifty other candidates of his own age, hailing from Switzerland and S. Germany. The Jesuit novices have to undergo certain experiments laid down by St. Ignatius, the founder of the order. Our novice stood all tests and after two years was admitted to his religious vows. From the days of Bismarck's Kulturkampf, the Jesuits were exiled from Germany. Their houses of training had to be located just on the border as at Feldkirch or in Holland.

*J. D. writes in The Examiner.

In Autumn 1898, Blatter proceeded to Exaeten in Holland for the next stage in his Jesuit formation: the juniorate. Under excellent teachers he perfected his classical studies, followed lectures in rhetoric and aesthetics, wrote poetry and essays. There was none who came up to his level in genuinely original achievement in German verse. And yet when after two years of literary studies, our scholastic as he now was, proceeded to the well-known philosophical and theological College of the German province of the order at Valkenburg in the south west corner of Dutch Limburg, he lost contact with literary studies, rushed lightly through philosophy and applied himself heart and soul to Botany.

At the end of their philosophy, the scholastics of the then German province were detailed off for five years, some to Brazil, some to the flourishing Colleges of the province in the United States, some to Feldkirch or Copenhagen or Zittard, others to the Bombay institutions. Blatter had already been chosen for Feldkirch which he would have loved, when St. Xavier's College, Bombay, applied for a botanist. He was sent for a few months to Manresa House, Rochester, near London and came out at the end of 1908. For five years he taught Botany, set up a laboratory and made lengthy botanical excursions to Kashmir, the Deccan, Ceylon, explored every corner round Bombay and Khandala. The solemn old German Fathers were aghast when this young fellow, not yet ordained, began to publish papers and books. It was quite improper and ought to be stopped, but no one ever stopped Blatter from doing what he had set his heart on. He was soon one of the best botanists in India, in communication with whatever botanical research or garden or specialist within the boundaries of the lands then so gorgeously lorded over by Curzon. So much so that when Fr. Blatter returned to Europe for his theology in 1903, he was welcomed by the curators of Kew Gardens, became a fellow of the Linnean Society, had to read a paper at the Brussels exhibition of 1910. From the end of 1908 till the end of 1913 Fr. Blatter studied for four years theology at Ore Place, Hastings in the South of England. The College was in England but belonged to the Jesuits of the Paris Province; in other words it was a French institution on English soil. The professors were men like Condamine, de Grandmaison, Harent, Chossat, his companions, de Mondadon, Jalabert, Rousselot, Lorand and others.

He was ordained a priest in 1912, finished his Theology, went through his third year of probation at Exaeten, took his last solemn vows on February 2, 1915. From the middle of 1914, Fr. Blatter was busy on Botany at Kew Gardens and found himself in England at the outbreak of the War. As many of the English Jesuits joined up as military chaplains, Fr. Blatter had to take up some priestly ministry.

The war upset Fr. Blatter's plans altogether. His superiors had decided to give him the best training in Botany Europe could offer. But when the German Fathers were interned in Bombay, a Swiss who had successfully taught at St. Xavier's could not easily be spared and at the end of 1915 Fr. Blatter was again at his former post. Until May 1919 he did probably his best work and was in his fittest condition. He harnessed several men to his work, students, assistants, amateurs, professionals. A mathematician, Prof. Hallberg from Upsala, had done no botany whatever and yet Blatter fired him with such enthusiasm that a large number of papers were published under their joint names and Hallberg with the direction of Fr. Blatter was able to carry through the botanical survey of Kashmir, Hallberg did not live to see "The Beautiful Flowers of Kashmir,"—a really fine work, delightful to read for any one who loves flowers. Great botanical excursions were made all over India, in Assam, the Western Ghats, the Sind desert, Mt. Abu, the Indus Valley. The College magazine of those years and still more the recollections of those who took part could give an adequate idea of the more human and humorous incidents, the pageantry and chiefly the unforgettable energy and undaunted endurance of Fr. Blatter himself.

From the point of view of Indian botany and for Fr. Blatter's own sake it was a misfortune when, on the appointment of Fr. Goodier as Archbishop, he had to take up the principalship. It is true he was able now to display many of the gifts and qualities which had little scope in the more austere setting of continuous scientific research. He was nominated a fellow of the University, served for years on the Syndicate and other bodies, inspected all the Colleges and scores of schools, had much to do with preparing the way for University reform, became acquainted with a large number of people, high and low, rich and poor, belonging to all creeds, castes and races, devoted most of the day and even part of the night to the students, the administration, the correspondence of his office, the College associations. His first concern was to organise the College Golden Jubilee, a splendid occasion for revealing the full size and measure of this spacious-minded, far-seeing, many-sided, universally sympathetic character. Only he was capable of bringing out the lavish jubilee number of the magazine. During these years Fr. Blatter made a point of giving the classes of religion to Catholics himself. In 1924 he felt in duty bound to serve on the University reform committee.

His health could no longer stand Bombay. He did not want to return to Europe because his material could not be carried so far and he felt the need of the Indian sun if he were to last long enough for publishing what he had all but ready. Thus it came about that he applied to be made chaplain at Panchgani. Here with the assistance of his faithful secretary and co-worker, he had the happiness of preparing for the press an enormous amount of systematic botany. His last work—undertaken in collaboration with Father Caius—all but killed him but the manuscript is finished, in the lands of the printer.

When Fr. Blatter went to Panchgani he was suffering from diabetes and dysentery. It did not prevent him from working all through the day and into the night until the electric current was cut off. From 1926 till about 1929 he frequently came to Bombay for University meetings. Later on his visits became rarer. On a short botanising tour around Panchgani he entangled in a thorn bush, the small wounds caused were sufficient to bring him to death's door—they would not heal and whatever cuttings were necessary had to be made without chloroform or anaesthetics. But his marvellous vitality pulled him through. It was a glorious day when he felt fit enough to go to Waziristan with Fr. Palacios to study the flora and fauna of a country innocent of all previous scientific survey. Whether a bad fall from a horse was the reason of a general collapse on his return, is not quite so certain. In any case he had two mild strokes. He recovered once more but the power for work was broken. As long as he could, he carried on. When he felt there was no hope of ever doing again a full man's work, he lost the desire to live. In January this year he was so low that he was brought down to Poona on the 22nd. There he lingered on until the end.

NOTES

Britain and Japan:—When the negotiations for a trade treaty between Japan and Britain broke down, Mr. Walter Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, evoked enthusiastic cheers in Parliament by declaring that he would strike at Japan's trade with the Colonies which supplied much raw material to that country and took a lot of her manufactured articles. The Japanese Government showed little perturbation at this portentous challenge. The event has justified its confidence. Australia's principal newspaper promptly declared: "Australia has no complaint against Japan who is a good customer for her wheat and wool. Australia, as is natural from her geographical position, has found good markets in the Far East, and unless international rivalries are pursued to the point of national suicide that trade must not be discouraged. The poor people of England and Australia do not welcome a policy compelling them to buy in a dearer market." It is expected that Australia will have soon her own Agent in Tokio to look after her trade interests. It was found that treaty rights of Japan precluded invidious measures against her trade in East Africa. Tanganyika as mandated territory could not be subjected to imperial preference. A Doctor from Tanga wrote: "People forget the low purchasing power of the native boys. The purchase of cheap Japanese rubber soled shoes has done more to check hookworm here than all the efforts of the Health Department." In the realm of politics, Sir John Simon startled the House of Commons by pleading in answer to a demand for vigorous action against Japan in China that Britain had never entered into a treaty to protect the territorial integrity of China. The Chinese Minister in Washington drily remarked on reading this statement that the British Foreign Minister would seem to have forgotten the League of Nation's Covenant by which the League and every member State undertook to preserve the integrity and independence of every other member, including China.

China and India:—At no time were British people so anxious as they now seem to be to hear from their own publicists and foreign ones that they are the most stable, free, liberal and prosperous people on the face of the earth. In the course of an article calculated to assure his countrymen in these respects, Sir Arthur Salter incidentally makes a comparison between India and China. He says the natural advantages of China are incontestably greater than those of India. "Its climate, its resources, its river system, the average physique of its people," he writes in the Observer, "would, if other things were equal, promise a standard of living much higher than India could hope for." But other things are not equal. India has the privilege of being governed by the British. China has the misfortune to be governed or misgoverned by her own nationals. "The result is that the Indian standard of living," he writes, "instead of being much lower, is very much higher. The best economists' estimates put the average national income in India at £ 8 a year, in China at about £ 3 a year." Such monetary estimates, he admits, are misleading. He mentions as a more reliable test that whereas the Chinese peasant uses a wheelbarrow, the Indian has an animal-drawn truck. "You will not find in India as you do in China, men and even women, harnessed to the plough like oxen." India's economic position, he says, would be even more striking if the greater part of India's production had not been absorbed by a rapid increase in population, and went to buy Lancashire goods. India has to provide not only for her increased population but also for one fourth of that of Britain and that on a higher scale. The economic conscience of Sir Arthur Salter suddenly fails here. Then, while the Chinaman abroad notwithstanding his penury is a Chinaman, the Indian is a political non-entity. Sir Arthur hastens to assure the reader that he is not suggesting that Britain should take over China. It is very considerate of him.

Political Piracy:—To adapt the epigram of a British statesman who afterwards became the leader of the Party he denounced, the Congress Parliamentarians have caught the Liberals sleeping and have walked away with their clothes. When five months ago, a number of citizens who met in Sir Chimanlal Setalvad's office, to consider the possibility of calling a Non-Party Conference to consider the White Paper proposals, decided to leave the Communal Award out owing to differences of opinion on it among different sections, the Nationalist newspapers were extremely scornful of the timidity of the Liberals. Those very papers are now applauding the decision of the Congress Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board to do the identical thing, as the wisest decision that could be made. But the most startling proof of the rifling of the liberal wardrobe by the Congress swarajists, is contained in the astonishing statement which Mr. Satyamurti published in the Times of India on Thursday. He was the first to hoist the flag of revolt against the boycott of Councils early last year. He was followed on this side by Mr. Jamnadas Mehta. Then, suddenly Dr. Ansari and others brought matters to a head and announced the formation of a Swaraj Party. To Mr. Satyamurti, therefore, belongs the credit for the new development in the Congress and what he said may be regarded as representing the views generally held by the Congress Parliamentarians. Attention may be particularly called to his statement that Congressmen may have to work the White Paper scheme to the utmost limit of their capacity if it is adopted in spite of their protests. What has come of the "sanctions" which were vociferously demanded whenever any one spoke of having to work the new Constitution, unacceptable though it may be? The last paragraph expatiating on the greater value of a Conservative than a Labour Government for carrying through Indian reforms, is extremely suggestive. The tone of the statement, so obviously anxious to emphasise agreement with the Times of India, is also worth noting. The Parliamentarians are ready to outbid the Moderates for securing recognition at the hands of the powers that be as the political leaders of the country. The pendulum has swung from one extreme to the other. What next?

Apple of Discord:—Soon after the Parliamentary Board of the Congress was constituted, its President, Dr. Ansari, left for Europe. Before sailing he issued a statement which some of his colleagues thought might be interpreted to mean acquiescence tentatively in the Communal Award. The acting President, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, and the erstwhile acting President of the Congress, Mr. Aney, promptly corrected this misimpression and declared that they for their part would never be parties to accepting that ill-starred document. Their statements were welcomed by the Hindu Mahasabha which has consistently opposed the Award as anti-national. The situation was further complicated by the publication by Panditjee's son, Radhakant, of a compilation of opinions against the Award, with the imprimatur of the Liberal Leader, Mr. Chintamani. On Saturday last, the Working Committee endorsed Dr. Ansari's view. Pandit Malaviya and Mr. Aney at once sent their resignations.

The defection of two such prominent members created something like consternation in the Swarajist ranks. At midnight on Monday and with many tears the aged Panditjee signed a "formula" declaring that, while adhering to his opposition to the Communal Award, he agreed in deference to the appeal of his colleagues to withdraw his resignation. Mr. Aney also signed it but without any show of emotion. Since then Panditjee has been indisposed and in the hands of doctors. The same day came the news that Vice-Chancellor von Papen of the Reich withdrew his resignation, on account of censoring of a speech of his by Goebbels, on a personal appeal by Chancellor Hitler. A nationalist newspaper in reporting the incident dubbed von Papen an opportunist.

Querulous Criticism:—It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The Bihar earthquake has had at least one re-deeming result. "Never before in my life," says Dr. N. S. Hardiker, "have I learnt as much of human nature, its salient features, and its dark sides as I did during the last eighteen weeks of my stay in Bihar." One need not go all the way to Bihar to learn this. One does not look for the ideally beautiful in the presence of one of the most devastating calamities that can befall mankind. People who do so have no call to volunteer for relief work as what they apparently want is relief from their own oppressed feelings. We have to say this, for the statements published in the press by this gentleman display a total lack of understanding of the difficulties of local organizations and are calculated to convey the impression that they were resentful of the intrusion of helpers from outside. If Dr. Hardiker expected that he and his party would be hailed as saviours of Bihar, it was his own fault. It was made quite clear by the Bihar leaders at the very outset, and, indeed, even without that one should have known, that the need of the moment was for materials and money. The influx of a number of persons from outside, strangers to local conditions, was sure to be more a hindrance than a help. The motive was good but motive is not everything. In striking contrast to the querulous comments of Dr. Hardiker, is the generous acknowledgment, in the last Government review of relief operations of the valuable services of the Patna Central Relief Committee. Referring to the water scarcity due to the silting up of wells, it is observed: "The Central Relief Committee (generally known as Rajendra Babu's Committee) offered its service in an unstinted manner which proved very helpful in this de-silting work."

Note of Warning:—The Amrit Basar Patrika writes:—"The Congress organisations are being revived all over the country. We think we ought to sound a note of warning to Congressmen... It will be a bad day for the country if such people are allowed to gain influence or importance in Congress circles. We cannot certainly demand that our leaders should be saints but we can neither afford to owe any allegiance to scoundrels."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, JUNE 23, 1934.

MYSORE AND FEDERATION.

In declaring open a Swadeshi Exhibition in Mysore on Monday, Mr. C. Vijayaraghava Charya warned the people of Mysore that the State would be lowered in status to a zemindari if it entered the proposed Indian Federation without further guarantees. He argued that the Federation would be the creation of the British Parliament which would have power to legislate for the whole Federation including Indian States which at present were amenable only to laws of their own making. Despite the denial of the Prime Minister of Mysore who was present at the function, Mr. Vijayaraghava insisted that the Princes had given unwilling consent to enter the Federation. The States, it is true, are outside the jurisdiction of Parliamentary legislation at present, but they are subject to the control of the British Cabinet which is a Committee of Parliament, and if the Secretary of State for India wishes, he can easily get any State to pass any law which he deems necessary in the interests either of the State itself or of British India. It is moreover the fact—we are not thinking of Mysore here—that the people of several Indian States want the Government of India, as the representative of the Paramount Power, to exercise more powers of control, including legislation, in the States as the only means of ensuring fairly good government. Such independence as the States now enjoy are entirely by sufferance. Under the Federation they will have clearly defined rights in resisting encroachments on which, well-governed States like Mysore will have the support of British Indian opinion. Mr. Vijayaraghava is a veteran in Indian politics and an authority on constitutional matters. Nevertheless, we think that the position and status of the States in a federal system will depend entirely on their standards of administration and the amount of support which they command from their own people and not as now on the disposition of a Government of India Department. Whether the States (rather Princes) have agreed to enter the Federation under "free persuasion" or pressure, is one of the issues in controversy between Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr. Winston Churchill. That some Princes do not view with favour the contact which Federation will establish between British Indian politicians and their own, is inevitable. If you place the two ideas of Democracy and Autocracy in juxtaposition, the result will be the same as placing gun-powder in contact with a lighted match. Not a few Princes would have reason to be thankful if they are left at least the status of a zemindar. On the other hand, a wise and sagacious ruler may rise under the Federation to the leadership of United India, if he has breadth of vision and strength of character.

So far as Mysore is concerned, it had from the first whole-heartedly espoused the idea of Federation so that there is no suspicion of persuasion or pressure in regard to that State. It has done more. It has anticipated Federation by agreeing, in response to the offer of the Government of India, to levy an excise duty on matches made in the State corresponding to that adopted in British India. The duty is expected to add to the State's revenue about a lakh and a half of rupees. But it will also bring in a further five lakhs from the Government of India as the estimated share of Mysore on the basis of consumption. On purely equitable grounds Mysore would be entitled to the latter amount as it is the amount of duty recovered in British India on matches consumed in Mysore State. The principle of a countervailing duty has been discarded in British India and there is no reason why it should be insisted upon in the case of Mysore. When the Federation is an accomplished fact the Federal Government will have power to levy uniform federal taxation throughout India. Mysore by voluntarily agreeing to come into line with British India at once has given fresh proof of her faith in the Federal principle. As regards sugar also, the Mysore Government propose to avail themselves of the British Indian offer to exempt Mysore sugar from import duties if the State levies an excise duty corresponding to that introduced in British India. The Mysore Legislative Assembly threw out the Government proposal on the ground that it would raise the price of locally manufactured sugar to the Mysore consumer. This, as was pointed out by the official spokesman, was an erroneous assumption as the price of sugar, a world commodity, is regulated by world conditions. The Mysore consumer will have to pay the same price as the Bombay consumer irrespective of the proposed excise duty, unless Sir Mirza Ismail takes a leaf out of President Roosevelt's book, and decrees that sugar shall be sold at a certain price, neither more nor less, under severe penalties. But he does not seem inclined to imitate the President and for a very good reason. The States are a vast area, practically self-contained, with a highly developed industrial and administrative system and with incalculable resources and, above all, a Government responsible to none but its own citizens. There is nothing amazing or musing in the Roosevelt plan in these circumstances. It is bound to succeed and it has already succeeded to an extent which is not adequately reflected by the statistical results. The moral effect, which is the chief thing, has been tremendous, and even critical commentators admit that the position of the President was never so strong as it is now, notwithstanding some inevitable setbacks to some parts of his plan.

Sir Mirza Ismail concluded his lucid financial statement by a reference to the annual tribute which Mysore is obliged to pay to the Government of India. This is a medical anachronism which should have no place in a modern system. There are other weighty reasons why it should be forthwith abolished. Mysore by its wise and far-sighted administration has earned for itself the reputation of being the most progressive State in India. Even the most inveterate critic of Indian States, like Mr. Chudgar, pauses to pay a tribute to Mysore in the midst of his most impassioned denunciations. The Government of India will have the strong support of Indian opinion to the total repeal of this antiquated and offensive imposition on an enlightened State which has given conspicuous proof of its regard for the interests of the whole country.

HINDU PRINCIPLES OF COMPELLING NECESSITY.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

The system governing a Hindu life in family or society has been immemorially a happy blend of law, religion, morality, and social principles. Unlike the Western system of law defining rights and punishing infringements thereof, ours deliberately ignores them for all practical purposes and emphasises the aspect of duties and their breach. It might be that specialisation in the field of law without due and simultaneous regard to other aspects of life has led the West on to such a singular development of the law. But our story is different, owing entirely to so balanced and harmonised a conception of life that, instead of necessity knowing no law, dire necessity simply excuses or justifies its breach either occasionally or even permanently. The present purpose on hand is only to illustrate this by recourse to various well-known examples that are drawn at random from legal, moral, religious, and social sides of life and may appeal themselves to the general reader and the special student or critic.

1. Now, let us take the relationship of a Hindu host and guest. The Sastras tell us that a guest must have full and unqualified attention and protection at the hands of his host. He must be shown all honour and preference due to his caste and status in life. The host is enjoined not to think of offending him or anyway wounding his susceptibilities so long as he remains under his necessary hospitality. The treatment meted out to the guest is regarded as the very worship of the Divine in Man, even as the bali rite is held as the worship of the divine in (the Elements of) Nature, and the Yagas and Sraddhas are the worship of the Divine in the heavenly gods and our ancestral manes respectively. There is no corresponding right vested in the host as against his guest. Even if the casual visitor or wayfarer should wilfully or imprudently go the length of bearding his host in his own den, the latter ought not to offend him in return, even as a true and noble warrior standing in a position of armed vantage may not pounce upon his unarmed or ill-armed or otherwise unprepared opponent, subject of course to the necessity of being driven to defend himself or others in imminent danger of life from the enemy, when he is excused or justified in slaying the unforeseen offender.

2. Let us then consider the so-called 'trespass' (of English law) upon our Hindu homes by strangers to the family. Every man's house in England or elsewhere may be a castle or fort. But in India a Hindu's house is so built, with a pial or two under the front verandah abutting the 'koradu' or platform leading into the street by a flight of steps, that any stranger or wayfarer may take shelter therein for the night or during hot sun or heavy rain without leave or licence of the owner. A 'bhikshu,' whether Brahman or Sannyasin, may without fear or hesitation enter the main door-way, go up to the second door, look in for the inmates and ask for food for the day with absolute impunity. The notorious gipsy ever welcome for his ready though rough fortune-telling may also be seen freely entering the house to the same extent. Similar instances may be cited in numbers. And yet nobody thinks of prosecuting or otherwise taking them to task for the trespass. It is sheer necessity that sends them all there, a thing rather unique here.

3. Again, we know that a manager of a joint Hindu family has even now no manner of right to alienate or dispose of any interest in the originally impartible and inalienable family property except to the extent of family necessity or much-needed benefit. So too, a Hindu widow has none, and what she has by way of claim for residence and maintenance is only an extension of what she has when she necessarily steps into the shoes of her husband and looks after the estate in a way consistent with the status and reputation of the family. Again, a trustee of a Hindu endowment has to see to the necessity of the disbursements he is called upon to make and to the necessity of keeping the corpus of the trust-fund from deterioration in value or usefulness. Lastly, a Hindu son has to see if the debts of his deceased or retired father and head of the family were not 'avyavaharika' or illegal or immoral and were justified by necessity whether religious or spiritual or temporal.

4. Then again we see the driving force of necessity in discarding old and repugnant customs and usages and taking to new modes of life, not inconsistent with fundamental principles enunciated in our Srutis and Smritis. After the advent of Buddha with his uncompromising doctrine of Ahimsa, and that of the Transmigration of Soul as a result of Karma involving Himsa in thought, word and deed, we have clean thrown overboard the entire karma-kanda of the Vedas relating to torture and sacrifice of living beings in Yaga and Yajnya, and in anticipation of an equal if not higher reward of merit we have adapted the same into less offensive kinds of rites involving vegetable life or ghee only.

5. Then we have given up Sati or widow entering her husband's funeral pyre in favour of her more difficult and systematic self-abnegation for the rest of her life in view to meeting her lord again in a more blissful world to come. We have disapproved and discarded various kinds of inferior marriages in favour of the best type of marriage in Brahma form "where love gives and love takes the girl in marriage for the object (via, issue) of an ocean of love." We have also eschewed and forgotten the dozen kinds of fictional or representative sonships and taken to adoption of a son given and received in all love and hope of heaven. We do not again to-day court the rigorous poverty to which the Brahmins of old were wedded, nor yet suffer the penalty paid by the son for deposing in court against his father, or vice versa, nor even observe the restriction of free association with offenders guilty of major sins or the once necessitated free admission into society after due repentance and prescribed prayaschittam of women lost to honour and shame before their wily abductors' fraud, force, or threat.

6. To-day we must honestly confess we have been estranged from our own ancestors as the North from the South Pole though we make bold to claim to respect their very Vedas and Sastras, and pretend to walk in their footsteps. For, do we among Brahmins observe the very same Varna and Asrama Dharma so punctiliously as of old? Where is the Brahmachari with his Vedic study at the feet of his rigorous disciplinarian Guru, or the Grihasta with his five daily yajnyas and devoted to the propagation of learning and ideal conduct except one in a million, and where is the Yati or Sannyasin shunning human company and ever meditating on God and maintaining inviolate silence? Where are the unpaid Sudras now that formed part and parcel of the old Dwija family who on death received the funeral and annual oblations at the hands of the Sraddha Karta in the family? (Vide Manu, 3, 246). Where are the old Kshatriyas wholly devoted to their subjects' welfare lavishing money like water in the cause? And where are the generous Vaisyas that made a mountain of money only to be returned to the people (from whom they got it) in private and public charities? There may be a few honourable exceptions here and there. But what about the generality? Unfortunate necessity has made us so.

7. We have still a childish fancy for shining silk-wear that is doubly cursed. It offends against the principle of Ahimsa of our religion and against the boycott of foreign goods as most silk is got from China, Japan and elsewhere. Does it strike anybody that they are purchasing the very life-blood of the poor silk-worms in myriads that are ruthlessly steamed and boiled to death while deeply sleeping inside their cocoons and dreaming of their regeneration for dancing as butterflies amid tender leaves and blossoming flowers? Does it strike anyone that for the same money he can buy ten to thirty times the quantity of Khadder which may feed so many sinless but half-starved souls with a second meal a day? Political economists and Mahatmas might move the masses from a thousand platforms with all the persuasion they could command but the people would not go in for the dull, coarse, and heavy Khadder goods. They refuse to be weaned away from their childish hunt after foreign goods and silks. Even the uncrowned king of India with all the earnest and enthusiastic support of the greatest organisation of India and of the innumerable volunteer in individual capacity but with a common purpose of the message of Khadder being carried to the remotest corners of India, has not touched beyond the very fringe of the problem. Hence the very great necessity for securing immediate Swaraj for India, when only the poor man's necessity will be made to yield the economic prosperity of the masses in India.

8. In all such and similar cases necessity has ever been the mainspring of Hindu life as, perhaps, of all life in general through the world. Dynamic necessity has been the mother of inventions and departures from the original state of things in every department of life. When dire necessity makes itself keenly felt by the society, family or individual, then a change in the tenor of the existing order of things soon follows. When such a necessity is felt in the entire constitution of the body-politic, then the law of the land automatically changes in its content towards rigour or relaxation, as the case may be, and then a new era begins. Herein lies the secret of the fact of the Hindus surviving as a race or a nation all these thousands of years. Our own sages anticipated this long, long ago and laid it down for us that such necessary deviations determined on and settled by general agreement among the learned and the good should have also the force of the Vedic Law. But if the intelligent few happen to discover the signs of the impending change in advance of other people and move for an early or timely action before more mischief is done, then they begin to be styled 'social reformers' with all the odium of the name and have to undergo all the risks and misfortunes that fall to the lot of all pioneers in any field of activity. And if the fewer but bolder patriots of an energetic type want to have the thing done in an expeditious way then they suffer all the name, notoriety and penalty of blood-thirsty revolutionaries.

KARMA AND AHIMSA.

(BY SCRUTATOR.)

Two great thoughts of Hinduism are Karma and Ahimsa. Buddha took hold of the first and worked it out into a perfectly logical system, early Buddhism. Mahavira took hold of the second and Jainism is the inexorable application of the principle of Ahimsa to every nook and corner of life. Hinduism in which the two ideas were evolved never went so far. It taught that Karma was the root cause of conduct but it taught also how to break what would otherwise be a vicious circle. Anything done disinterestedly did not have the binding force of Karma. This important point is lost sight of by Christian critics of the doctrine. Neither in the case of Ahimsa did Hinduism go all the way with Jainism. The Gita which accepts Ahimsa as the supreme quality of satvic natures is the most powerful apologia for war ever composed. Death in the battlefield, it proclaims, is the open gateway to heaven to the soldier in a dharmic war. It has been sought to be explained that 'war' in the Gita is a subjective struggle. The Gita might mean also that but to insist that it means only that is to fly in the face of the consensus of Hindu belief for two milleniums. No. The real explanation of the advocacy of both Ahimsa and War in the Gita, is that War waged in a righteous cause, in defence of one's religion, hearth and home and country, is not Himsa and is perfectly compatible with Ahimsa. Hinduism has its head in the clouds but its feet are firmly planted on the earth. It is, in fact, a growth of the soil. That is why it has been able to absorb and assimilate every race and religion which found a home on Indian soil. That is also the reason why propagandist religions like Islam and Christianity have themselves become Hinduised in this country. I was listening the other day to a talk by the Anglican Bishop of Bombay on the radio. His subject was the opportunities open to the amateur botanist in Bombay Presidency. I was only an indifferent listener but I pricked up my ears when the Bishop, in an aside, confided to his invisible audience that he never killed an animal in his life. Ahimsa is not a Christian doctrine. Where did this good Bishop get it from? Where, except from India? What is perhaps more striking, is that in hundreds of Muslim families, the custom of animal sacrifice at certain holy days has been given up. Hinduism is the protector of animal life. Is it not a tragic irony that Hindus should resort to animal sacrifice when others are giving it up?

Religion lays down general principles and expects men to apply them to varying conditions in the light of commonsense. Sri Ramakrishna gave many homely illustrations of how this is to be done in his talks with his friends and followers. The Advaita Ashrama, Mayavati, has published a handy and beautiful edition of his teachings, which should find a place between the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius and the Imitation of Thomas a Kempis in every middle class home. Marcus was an Emperor and Kempis was a monk but Ramakrishna belonged to the middle classes and always kept in mind the needs of these classes; he drew his similes from the everyday difficulties of these classes, and framed his teaching to suit them. Apropos of Ahimsa, the oft-repeated story of the Snake and the Sage, is fully narrated in this little book. The Snake used to bite every person who walked on a particular road. A sage happened to pass that way and it rushed at him but he stopped it by a word and taught it the gospel of Ahimsa. The result was that every village urchin threw a stone at it whenever it came out of its hole and, at last, encouraged by immunity, they caught him by the tail and dashed him to the earth. From that day forward, the snake kept to its hole so that when the sage passed again that way he could find it only with difficulty. After much questioning the sage got out of the snake that its plight was due to its strictly following the principle of Ahimsa which he had taught it. "What a pity, my dear," thereupon observed the sage, "that you should not know how to save yourself from being thus handled by your enemy! I forbade you only to bite any creature of God. Why did you not hiss and raise your hood at those who wanted to kill you, so as to keep them at arm's length? So, raise the hood and hiss at evil—doers but bite them not. Keep them off by showing that you can deal an effective blow, if necessary that you have the power of resisting evil. Only one must take care not to pour out one's venom into the blood of one's enemy. Resist not evil by doing evil in return, but make a show of resistance with a view to self-defence. That is one of the dharmas of the householder," Romaine Roland who tells the story in his Life of Sri Ramakrishna, does so with a necessary reservation. All such stories should be taken with a pinch of the salt of commonsense in order to be properly digested. The point of it is, do not make a parade of your principles. Be wise as the snake but harmless as the dove, as Jesus put it. Which reminds one of another striking saying of Ramakrishna's regarding mystics of all faiths: "All jackals howl to the same tune."

"THIS MISSIONARY BUSINESS."

(By ARTHUR YOUNG.)

Not long ago you gave me space for my views on "religious understanding." Perhaps it may help if I continue the previous theme by stating what I personally understand by the term religion. To me religion is a form of symbolism made up of beliefs, practices, prayers, pictures, idols, music, etc., used in some form or other to stimulate an inner spiritual consciousness. In relation to the spirit they bear the same connection as the mind does to the body. In the same way as the body can be made to react to totally different thoughts, I believe the consciousness of the spirit, or that part of us which is other than mind and body can be equally developed by various forms of religion and that results depend not on what we have been accustomed to call religious truth but on the type of mentality and physique of the individual in relation to such truths. To put it in another form; however successful a particular religion may be with a certain class of consciousness and culture it may be useless or even positively harmful to people of another mentality and environment.

Again we must consider that our life, our education, our surroundings, and our history all supply us with a definite set of symbols in which we think and feel. As an example we know that apart from a few exceptions like Rabindranath Tagore and, say, Aurobindo Ghose and Dhun Gopal Mukerjee, few Indians are only able to express themselves in well known idiomatic English. They may write grammatically good prose but the quality of their imagery is alien to India. That is the reason I maintained in my previous article that conversion was essentially a matter for the psychologist rather than the priest.

The first time I realised the value of this reasoning, and I may add my first step on the path to freedom, was when I heard a Sadhu teaching a pilgrim. The man was a learned philosopher and Vedantist but he was advising his pupil to practice and believe in the crudest form of bhakti.

Taking this preface as a background, how much of the missionary endeavour in India is a gross impertinence and an exploitation of the ignorance of the poorer masses. We all agree that there can be only one God. The idea of duality in Supremacy is absurd. But we can only reach out to an aspect of this Supremacy or Omnipotence according to the tools and implements of consciousness and being we possess. Hence the various religions and sects.

What is the motive then behind missionary endeavour? If it is winning souls for Christ then surely "the hand of the Potter shook" during the Creation for God to become so dependent on man. I am not trying to prove every missionary is a fake. C. F. Andrews for instance fully believes that Christ came to fulfil the Law, not to destroy it; the result was that a Hindu meeting him became a better Hindu and a Muslim a better Mahomedan. There are many others and I have met some of them. I am fully convinced that many of those who join the mission field are misfits in the ordinary walks of life. Unable to come out like men and fight the battle of existence to satisfy their longings and ambitions, instead they take the negative course of preaching to others. A sympathetic and often gullible public at Home supply the necessary funds, little realising they are helping to alienate hundreds of ignorant Indians in their Mother-land. If the average Missionary was sincere he would be content to be Christlike. He would administer to the sick, extend a helping hand to the poor and educate the ignorant. More than this borders on hypocrisy.

By this I do not mean that Indians should not be welcomed as Christians. I believe that this attitude would draw a different type of Indian into the Christian fold, a type and mind that would enrich what is now almost a decayed force, alien to the spirit of the Great Master and only existing by inveigling support by means we are accustomed to associate with the sale of patent medicines and charms.

Dr. Besant's Successor:—The return of nomination papers in connection with the presidential election of the Theosophical Society are complete. The result will be declared officially on June 21. The United Press understands that Doctor G. S. Arundale has been elected, having obtained 20,000 votes defeating Prof. Ernest Wood the other candidate, who obtained only 5,000 votes. About 10,000 Theosophists refrained from voting. Arrangements are in progress for the ceremonial accession to the Theosophical Gadi on June 21.

Good Business!—In future we shall not go to war for dynastic reasons, but because it is good for business, said Cecil Rhodes, who had reasons for knowing. Speaking at the International Federation of the League of Nations Societies at Folkestone on Wednesday, Mr. John Epstein, a member of the British delegation, said that when the dispute was brewing between Bolivia and Paraguay, an agent of a well-known British armament firm was known to have secured within six months orders for over £1,500,000 worth of arms from Bolivia. At the same time his colleague was working with equal success in Paraguay. While the delegate of the British Government was seeking with his colleagues on the Council of the League to compose the conflict, licences were issued, according to information given in the House of Commons, for the export by British firms of over 2,000,000 rounds of ammunition to one belligerent and over 14,000,000 to the other.—Commonweal.

"RAMA-RAJYA"

(BY S. D. NADKARNI.)

I am glad that my brochure "On Rama—rajya and the Slave mentality of Our Orthodox—An expostulatory letter to the greatest Hindu of the Age from a critical Co-religionist," published in 1932 by the Samaj Samata Sangh of Dadar (Bombay), has been noticed in the Reformer, late though it may be. Informing and valuable as the writer's criticism is, it will be permissible to point out a few facts in that connection.

1. My "Rama-rajya" does not deal with the 'historical' Rama. It does not go into the question of the historicity and origins of the hero or the themes of the Ramayana as Biblical criticism does with the characters and incidents of the Bible. It is concerned only with the Rama of tradition—with the character of Rama as he is portrayed in our literary heritage, i.e., the accepted documents both sacred and secular, sanskrit and vernacular, as well as our oral tradition. It was wholly foreign to the purpose of the book to go into the question of how far (if at all) the story of Rama as these present it to us is historical. (That it is not wholly historical, the miraculous element in it is alone sufficient to cause the least sceptical to suspect.) The Rama of history (or pre-history) may be morally better, or he may be worse, for ought we know, than the Rama of tradition. But the book has nothing to do with him. In it I have confined myself to the ethical estimate, not of the 'historical' Rama, who can only be the subject of antiquarian speculation, but the Rama of tradition (miracle and all), the very thing which Mr. N. would exalt above recorded history. I have done so because it is this tradition, and not the 'history' of idealist 'historians,' which has been influencing Hindu social thought and conduct. It is the social effect and implications of the tradition itself that I have discussed in the book.

2. The book was primarily meant as a reply to the anti-reformers of the Varnasrama Swaraj Sangh, who, as stated in its preface, met in a conference in the Christmas of 1930 and declared that they wanted Swaraj as they had it "in the days of Ramachandra." They left you in no doubt as to what they meant by it, through their actions at the conference itself.

"Sudras and Untouchables, as well as women of all castes, were excluded from near the scene while a 'Vishnu-yaga' ceremony was being performed. The Untouchables were prevented from attending any of the conference proceedings. But Mahomedan policemen were among those who were there to keep order. The resolutions passed, inter alia, condemned the Sarda Act in strong terms as interfering in religious-matters, and stated that Sanatanists would be prepared to break it if necessary. Another resolution which dealt with the question of the remarriage of widows declared that a widow, however young, she might be, was forbidden by the Sastras from remarrying, and condemned legislation permitting such marriage. A third resolution referred to the Untouchables as being within the pale of Sanatan Hindu religion, but qualified it by stating that they did not form apart of the Varnasrama or four-caste system."

These were the fruits of what we may call a 'Rama-rajya Conference,' the first conference of the Varnasrama Dharma Swaraj Sangh.

3. Mahatma Gandhi, of course, is not the man to agree with these suicidal fanatics. Why then my "Expostulatory Letter" to him on the "Rama-rajya" of the Varnasrama-Sanghites? The answer is:

One would not have minded the use of the word "Rama-rajya" by Gandhiji as a proverbial or metaphorical word, meaning the best of conceivable governments, of course from a liberal point of view. But Gandhiji, presiding over a conference of subjects of the Kathiawar States early in 1925, advised our Princes to make Rama-rajya their ideal. One would not have minded it so much if he had stopped there, but he went on to mention King Rama's abandonment of his wife Sita to please the people as an example of what he expected of a popular ruler. That is certainly a matter on which Mahatmaji was expected to recant,—and that by critics including (I am glad to recall) the Social Reformer itself, which had an outspoken note on Mahatmaji's unfortunate utterance at the time. Mr. N. of the Reformer, however, now suggests that Mahatmaji's idea of Rama-rajya is far from countenancing the wife-deserting feature of it. I am sure, he would not have made such a suggestion if he had not forgotten or overlooked the above circumstances pointed out by me on p. 11 of the book as one of the reasons of my addressing the book to Mahatmaji.

4. The reviewer's advice that historical characters should be judged by the standards of their time and not by those of our own, is, it will now be clear, quite inapplicable to my "Rama-rajya" for the simple reason that it is not a historical disquisition. Even if it was such, the advice would not be a safe or a healthy one to follow. For one thing, it is itself a historical question, 'What are the standards of the time we are dealing with,' and also 'how do they compare with our own.' Secondly, would we not be false to our own times and to ourselves, if we totally ignored the standards of our day in judging the characters of the past, supposing it was possible so to ignore them? No man is his own ancestor, it is true; but it is equally true that no one is the same as his ancestor. He is himself, and he is also posterity in the making. As his article itself shows, the reviewer of my "Rama-rajya" is too good and practical a person to practice his own precept, which is as unethical as it is impractical.

5. We know how the orthodox sunnis of his time and our own did and do look upon Aurangzeb as an ideal ruler and saint. But an enlightened and conscientious Musalman of our time or any other time can only say that the ideas about an ideal ruler and saint of people who regard Aurangzeb (as he is known to us) as an ideal ruler and saint are far from being ideal or saintly. For one even to say that Aurangzeb was not the ideal ruler or saint the sunnis believe him to have been, will not be a very helpful thing. Not that Aurangzeb had no virtues which are not overlooked in my study of his character. But we Hindus of today will not be true to ourselves if we do not recognise that the ancient traditional idea of the ideal ruler as exemplified in Rama of Ayodhya, the alien—assassinating, wife-deserting, Sudra-lynching, and (as you would add) woman-mutilating King-God, is far from the true ideal. I am referring to the episodes of Vali's treacherous death, Sita's abandonment, and Sambuka's decapitation, at Rama's hands, and Surpanakha's mutilation at his instigation. Of these four, which constitute the blots on Rama's escutcheon, the first three are dealt with in my book, along with a number of other topics suggested by or arising out of these. The fourth is prominently brought out in a book entitled "Ravana the Great, King of Lanka" by Purnalingam Pillai, which was noticed in the Reformer in November 1928 and it has been justly, albeit tactfully, handled by Mr. N. in his notice of my book.

STATELESSNESS.

(BY SUZANNE FERRIERE.)

The problem of statelessness, serious enough in the period immediately following the War, has grown even more serious with the advent of the economic crisis. The presence in a country of a person of such doubtful origin that he was entitled to the protection of no government, was in general tolerated by the authorities of the country of domicile, on condition, naturally, that he did nothing to bring himself into conflict with the police. To-day the position has completely changed: with the coming of unemployment and the general crisis, police measures have become draconian; and whilst in former years it was exceptional to refuse assistance, or a permit of residence, for the simple reason that nationality was doubtful, the opposite is now the exception. Private relief organisations are faced with cases that are really tragic, and the efforts that have to be made in the attempt to clear up even one case are out of all proportion to the results obtained.

What has been done to solve the problem? In 1921 a Conference was held at Rome of representatives of the countries succeeding the old Austria-Hungary, and drew up a Convention that was only ratified by a minimum of the countries interested. In 1927, at Geneva, the Third International Conference for Communications and Transit attempted the establishment of a Convention recognising the validity of a standardised Travel Certificate. In 1930, at the Hague, the Conference for the Codification of Private International Law tried to get rid of a number of cases of statelessness by eliminating certain points of variance in legislation. The Convention (not yet ratified) which this Conference drew up marks a certain progress, but in all probability this partial success represents the maximum that can be obtained at present by way of international agreement.

The private organisations which have sought a solution of the problem insist less on international understanding than on ultimate modification of national legislation within the framework of existing treaties, and on a large interpretation of the regulations admitting naturalisation and the choice of a fatherland.

It is astounding that up to the present all the efforts made in this direction have met, almost without exception, with complete unsuccess. It is true that progress in this sort of work is necessarily very slow; but in this matter of statelessness, failure to move is almost complete.

When we seek the reason for this stagnation, it would seem that the error has been the tackling of the problem as a whole. If international talks have led to nothing, this failure seems to be in great part due to the fact that certain governments are afraid of life being made too easy for their political refugees living in other countries. It would seem, therefore, that the only way of approach is to differentiate the various categories of stateless persons and to proceed by definite stages, beginning with the simplest category and leaving on one side for the moment, the question of political refugees; not that these do not merit attention, but their situation is a serious problem in itself, which there is every reason not to identify with that of stateless persons whose origin is merely doubtful. The principle categories of stateless persons may be set out as follows:

(1) The most important category comprises stateless persons who have become so through after-war frontier changes. These persons have lost their nationality either through their ignorance of treaties, and of the decrees or laws which completed these treaties; or through indifference, believing that things would right themselves; or through unwillingness to leave the country of their residence, where they were earning a livelihood and where they had put out roots; or, again, because they were the victims of the ill-will or the incompetence of certain badly-informed administrations. This category also includes children born stateless, because the offspring of stateless parents.

(2) A certain number of persons, especially children, are stateless because the birth-place of the father is unknown, or because the records of the father's native place have been destroyed.

(3) One group of stateless persons (whose situation might be adjusted without much difficulty) is composed of individuals who have no valid "papers" because of mistakes made by different public offices or consulates—mistakes due in great part to personal circumstances, such as constant change of domicile from one country to another. Such changes of domicile make it extremely difficult for the competent government offices to interpret aright the different systems of law in force. Many mistakes have also been committed through haste in drawing up documents during the period of after-war chaos.

With regard to cases of statelessness due to conflicting systems of law, these form a fourth category which must be dealt with, little by little, by the Conference of Private International Law.

We leave on one side, as we have already said a fifth category, that of political refugees and of all those persons who are in conflict with their government for political or other reasons. But why should we not now consider what it may be possible to do for the first three categories, whose situation does not raise, or only indirectly, any political question? This business of statelessness should be withdrawn completely not only from the sphere of politics, but also from that of law, and efforts should rather be directed to the solving of individual cases.

Another obstacle to the straightening out of this question is the economic situation: at the present moment, every State dreads increasing the number of persons who are a charge on public assistance funds; but that is an obstacle that can and must be got over. The public danger created by the persistence of a state of things in which individuals have no right to settle down and make a home anywhere is greater than would be any mere money sacrifice called for by the straightening out of the tangle. We use the phrase: "public danger"—and is it not creating a public danger to exasperate, against Society and its law, those persons condemned to statelessness for reasons for which they are in no wise—or only in small measure—responsible? But even more than on its aspect as a public danger, we would insist on the fact that the present state of things is profoundly revolting to the human conscience.

The League of Nations have not yet taken up the matter as here exposed. Perhaps the League might find fewer obstacles in its way were the matter taken up in the manner I suggest, that is to say, by dealing only with the three categories mentioned above.

The question of assistance to indigent stateless persons has been considered by the Committee of Experts appointed by the Council of the League of Nations to examine the problem of Assistance to Indigent Foreigners. This Committee met for the first time in December, 1933. Among the recommendations which it prepared for transmission to Governments, it included one which suggested the prohibition of the refusal of entry to, or the expulsion of indigent persons without nationality or of doubtful nationality, until such time as they should be in possession of the visas or other papers permitting them to enter another country. The recommendation contained the further proviso that necessary assistance should be assured to the persons mentioned so long as they remain in the country of residence.

This is not a great step forward—it is indeed a very little one—but while we may not be satisfied with it, we must look upon it as an encouragement not to be weary of calling attention to this burning question, or of battling for its solution.

SIR SANKARAN NAIR.*

(BY MARGARET E. COUSINS.)

In paying respects to the Grand Old Man of Malabar, Sir Sankaran Nair, who passed away full of years and honours on April 24th, the public Press has failed to express the gratitude of one half of the Indian people, its womanhood, for his championship of their campaign for equal rights of citizenship when the Montford Reforms Bill was being hammered out, and for his invariable support of every movement for the advancement of woman.

Women have taken such an equal part in the public life of India during the last ten years that it is almost impossible to realise that it was only in December, 1917 that the first request was made by Indian women for citizenship by the extension to them of the suffrage on the same terms as to men in the Reforms then being envisaged. The favourable reception of this request by the late Hon. E. S. Montagu caused the Southborough Franchise Committee to examine the women's demand early in 1919. That historic Committee disposed of the claims of women in four short paragraphs out of their 400-page Report. They said, "We are satisfied that the social conditions of India make it premature to extend the franchise to Indian women at this juncture when so large a proportion of male electors require education in the use of a responsible vote." Following this priceless masculine logic that because some men are too ignorant to vote therefore it was too soon for any women to have a vote, they decided "not to recommend the extension of the suffrage to women," and the Government of India in its Dispatch on this Report agreed with the Committee's recommendation saying "in the present conditions of India it is not practical to open the franchise to women."

It is to the eternal glory of India that she had a son on that Committee, Sankaran Nair, who opposed this decision with might and main. It was significant that the one member of the then Indian government, who knew Indian conditions from the inside, and who was therefore most fitted to voice authentic Indian opinion, Sir Sankaran Nair, pressed for the removal of sex disqualification from the outset, wrote a Minute of Dissent to the Committee's decision on this subject, and fought to get women's claims granted at every opportunity during his visits to London in connection with the passing of the Reforms.

Later events proved how truly he gauged the capacities of his countrywomen, what a statesman-like vision was his, how loyal a representative of the matriarchal system he was. India today leads all Asia in the political equality it has conferred on womanhood.

It is very fitting that the Women's Indian Association has publicly appreciated Sir Sankaran Nair's services to womanhood, for he had constantly associated himself with the activities of the Association and helped it to gain its aims. He thought most highly of the work it has been doing for India during the past 17 years.

His public life was beautifully in accord with his private life as regards the equality he showed women. His charming wife and he were life-long comrades in the most real sense; and her death some years ago was an impoverishment of his life from which he never fully recovered. He saw that his handsome daughters got an education which has fitted them to be the intellectual companions of their husbands, most highly placed public officials. No child marriages, no child widows in his family! He knew by experience how safely inheritance rights and money can be placed in women's keeping. He knew also that no legal or religious bonds of marriage are comparable to the voluntary chains of free deep affection linked with mutual respect, true equality of the sexes and the economic independence of wife as well as husband. All these things are the essence of the matriarchal system, and he was a firm believer in its idealism and its practicality.

He had reached the fine age of 77 and none of us could wish to keep his ardent nature chained to a worn-out frame, but his death has removed one of woman's finest knights, sans peur et sans reproche. We greet his freed spirit with gratitude, and call on other young chevaliers to fill the space left void by his passing.

INDOLOGICAL STUDIES IN FRANCE—II.

(BY PROF. SYLVAIN LEVI.)

To confine India to Sanskrit and the allied languages is to reduce her arbitrarily. Sanskrit, the sacred language, is also a dead language, and India has used for a long time various other languages to convey her thoughts. France has evinced the same interest in India's present as in her past. Between the Sakuntala of Chezy and the Bhagavata of Burnouf, Garcin de Tassy published his admirable Histoire de la littérature hindoue et hindoustani. The recent work of Jules Bloch on the Formation de la langue marathe commemorates in a magnificent manner the entry of modern dialects into the domain of the rigorous science of linguistics.

A considerable portion of the Indian literature, almost the whole of the Sanskrit-Buddhist literature, has come down to us only through Chinese or Tibetan versions; the originals have perished in India with Buddhism. The science of Indology may, therefore, well take pride in such works as the Rgya teher rol pa of Foucaux, the Fragments extracted out of the Kanjur by Feer, the Index of the Bstan-hyigur by P. Cordier, the Sutralankara by Huber and the Cinq cents contes et apologues by Chavannes. The part played by France in deciphering the languages of Central Asia in recent times should also be mentioned in this connection: Eastern Iranian (Gautiot, Pelliot), Kuchean (Sylvain Levi, Meillet), Sogdian (Gautiot).

From 1915 onwards Indological studies have flourished in France without any interruption or set-back. Even though French Indology has lost her revered leaders Barth (†1916) and Senart (†1928), even though the War has entailed on her untold losses, young recruits have always brought into it new and vigorous forces. M. Przyluski, who combines in his ingenious researches the knowledge both of India and Indo-China, has enriched the comparative study of Buddhistic traditions by means of two important works: La Légende de l'empereur Asoka (Asoka-Aśvadhana) in Indian and Chinese versions and le Concile de Rajagrha, introduction into the history of the canons and the sects of Buddhism (1926). In the same field Demieville has given les versions chinoises du Milindapanha, with notes and memoirs which has greatly enhanced the value of this translation, as useful as it is valuable. M. Renou has risen to the very highest rank of the scholars in the field of Indology even on his first appearance on account of his various productions as abundant as they are irreproachable: la Valeur du parfait dans les hymnes vediques, les Maîtres de la philologie védique (1928); translation of the Raghuvansa of Kalidasa; Grammaire Sanskrit in two volumes. In the meantime he has completed the edition and translation of the Brhatkatha-Clohasamgraha which was lying half-finished after the sudden death of Lacote (†1925). M. Masson-Oursel in the capacity of an Indologist as well as a philosopher has drawn the Esquisse d'une histoire de la philosophie indienne. M. René Grousset has proved himself to be a past-master in the difficult art of presenting to the cultured public, in a form whose elegance does not interfere at all with scientific accuracy, the progress of knowledge scattered among the various technical publications of the specialists; Let us mention his sur les traces du Buddha Histoire de l'extrême-Orient, 2 vols; les Philosophies indiennes. M. Courtillier has condensed into one lucid and substantial volume les Anciennes Civilisations de l'Inde and given a tasteful summary of the Ramanaya: la Légende de Rama et Sita.

The vigorous growth of Indological studies has been gloriously manifested by the creation of an Institute of Indian Civilisation at the University of Paris. Founded at the beginning of 1929, this Institute has already initiated a series of publications both of original texts and translations, in the manner of the Collection Bude for the Classical languages. This collection, which is topped by the name of Emile Senart, has started with one of the major Upanisads, la Chandogya,—a posthumous work of Senart, seen through the press by M. Foucher. Under the auspices of the Institute of Indian Civilisation M. Renou, assisted by Mme Stohoupek and Mlle Nitti, has undertaken to publish a Didionnaire Sanskrit-Français, the urgent need of which was felt by generations of students, and M. Courtbin has published a Grammaire élémentaire du Sanskrit classique with texts and a lexicon.

The activity of the Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient of Hano is closely connected with the Paris School of Indology, which has given it most of its directors and research-workers. It has, moreover, trained up the first directors of the French archaeological delegation to Afghanistan; the beautiful work on les Histoires bouddhiques de Bamiyan, which is the result of collaboration between M. and Mme Godard and M. Hackin, and the results of the excavations executed by M. Barthou show how much new light can be thrown on Indian antiquities by this obscure region, so long closed to Occidental Science. It is the same Paris School of Indology which has given the Maison Franco-Japonaise, founded at Tokio in 1926, its first directors; it is the work of this school which is being continued in the Dictionary encyclopédique du bouddhisme according to Chinese and Japanese sources, published under the direction of M. Sylvain Levi and M. Takakusu, of which the chief editor is M. P. Demieville.

One of the most salient features of the modern period which begins with 1915 is the first appearance, and soon the rapid multiplication, of the thesis for doctorate of Indian scholars written in French. The value of these works, if an average is taken, is certainly above the level of mediocrity. A simple chronological list will suffice to indicate the diversity of interests evinced in these works: Kalidasa and Art poetique de l'Inde, by Hari

Chand Sastri; Vedanta, study of the Brahmasutras and their five commentaries, by V. S. Ghatge; Vartika de Katyayana, study of style, vocabulary and philosophical postulates, by V. G. Paranjpe; Etudes sur Ayurveda et le Catuhsastika, by Vaidya; les Theories diplomatiques de l'Inde ancienne et l'Arthashastra, by Kalidas Nag; le Rasa, essay on Indian aesthetics, by S. C. Mukherjee; le Canon bouddhique en Chine, les traducteurs et les traductions, by P. C. Bagchi; les Chants mystiques, de Kanha et de Saraha, by Shahidullah; l'Inde mystique au moyen age, by Y. Hussain; les Fleurs de rhétorique dans l'Inde, by H. R. Diwekar; le Pense de Rabindranath Tagore, by S. C. Mitter; les Sikhs, by Miss Ramakrishna, the first thesis presented at Paris by an Indian lady-student. It would be unjust not to mention also the charming and valuable thesis of an English lady from India: la Femme bengalie dans la littérature du moyen age, by Miss J. H. Rowlands.

INDIAN MARRIAGES AND ENGLISH COURTS.*

(BY M. K. NAMBYAR.)

The Imperial Conference is likely to meet in the coming year. In problems of Dominion Status, the Indian delegates may have neither part nor lot. But there are certain other matters of grave concern to their countrymen which they might usefully tackle.

Not a few Indians have settled down in England; quite a large number make sojourns there of limited duration. With the increasing facilities of travel and of communication, their numbers are likely to swell. Not infrequently therefore are questions of their status bound to come up for adjudication before English Courts.

In olden days, law was purely personal. That is to say, a person carried his laws wherever he went. The Christian traders in Turkey were permitted to administer their own laws. In Egypt and in China, 'extra territorial' jurisdiction in respect of certain foreigners still obtains. But the ambit of law has changed. It is no longer personal, but territorial. Except to the extent provided by treaty or by rules of international law, the laws of a nation bind both the subject and resident alien without distinction. Obviously some injustice would be bound to result. Most of the civilized States therefore have developed their own systems of Private International Law. In matters of status and capacity, France, Italy and Germany apply the individual's national law to both subject and alien. But in England, a person's civil status is governed by the law of his domicile, namely the law of his permanent home.

The vast majority of Indians who are governed by Hindu or Mahomedan law, do not however have the benefit of this rule of English law in several respects. In matters of marriage, inheritance and succession, the law is highly invidious. Marriage, declared Lord Penzance in Hyde (1866—L.P. & D.130), is "the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others." Applying this test, polygamous unions are no 'marriages.' Even if a Hindu or a Mahomedan should contract only a monogamous marriage, the union is still potentially polygamous, and English Courts refuse to recognize the same as a marriage in law.

Carried to its logical conclusion, this juridical concept of marriage in English law yields most difficult situations. An Indian couple of Hindu or Mahomedan religion, recognized as husband and wife by the Indian Courts, the courts of their domicile, would cease to have any enforceable rights against each other, the moment they reached English shores. The English High Court would refuse to entertain an action for maintenance or for restitution of conjugal rights. The husband would be disabled from seeking any marital relief in respect of his wife, for his wife is no wife. If the wife contracts a second marriage there, it is highly doubtful whether she would be guilty of bigamy. Lord Penzance in the case quoted above 'did not profess to decide upon the rights of succession or legitimacy which it might be proper to accord to the issue of polygamous unions,' but his doctrine that a polygamous union is no marriage excludes the hypothesis that the offspring of Hindu or Mahomedan couple, or for that matter any Hindu or Mahomedan, can lay claim to legitimacy in any of the Courts in England. For, how could a person be considered legitimate unless born in lawful wedlock according to the concepts of English law?

Nor is this all. If a Hindu or Mahomedan dies intestate in England possessed of real and personal property, the Courts in England would be called upon to decide questions of succession to his estate. In English law, lands and titles of honour cannot be inherited save by the eldest legitimate son of his father. Issues of polygamous unions would be debarred therefore from succession. With regard to movables, the question is less settled. The general rule is that movables should be distributed according to the law of the deceased's domicile at the time of his death. If a Hindu or Mahomedan dies after acquiring an English domicile his assets obviously would not be inherited according to the principles of Hindu or Mahomedan law. Should it however be proved that there has been no change of domicile, it would still be difficult for an English court to hold that his wife or son according to the law of his domicile is a 'wife' or 'son' entitled to succeed. The decision of the Supreme Court of South Africa holding in one case that the children of a deceased Mahomedan of Indian domicile could succeed to the father's estate while excluding the wife as no 'wife' is neither consistent nor logical. The rigid application of the doctrine of English law therefore that a polygamous union is no marriage leads to the result that the assets of a Hindu or Mahomedan dying in England should go to the Crown as bona vacantia, a conclusion as startling as it is unjust. There has indeed been one case in which the English Court ignored this strict rule and allowed the issues of such unions to inherit the movables. But here the Crown had not cared to step in and lay its claim, and the decision can hardly be regarded as authority.

Now the assumption behind Lord Penzance's reasoning is tolerably plain that the law applicable to polygamous unions, and the incidents arising therefrom is the law of England as applicable to Christian marriages. That is to say, a Hindu or Mahomedan marriage is to be adjudged according to the concepts of English marriage and not of Hindu or Mahomedan marriage. But do English courts apply the local law of England in trying the validity of foreign marriages? Scottish marriages by bare acknowledgment, popularly known as Gretna Green marriages, have been recognised as valid marriages by English Courts, notwithstanding that such marriages do not conform to Christian notions of marriage ceremonies. The English Courts did not apply the territorial law of England but the law of Scotland. Lord Stowell laid down in an ancient case in 1811 that the validity of the marriage rights 'must be tried by reference to the law of the country, where if they exist at all, they had their origin.' That is a venerable principle still enshrined in English law, and Lord Dunedin stated the same in different language when he said in Ber- thiaume v Dastous (1930 A. C. 79) that 'if a marriage is good by the laws of the country where it is effected it is good all the world over...'

It is long since a Christian marriage has ceased to be a voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others'. But in England unions 'for life' are not rarely dissolved by courts, and subsequent marriages follow. In the United States divorce is much less difficult than in England, and Reno divorces are notoriously facile. Nevertheless marriages performed in the United States of in Reno have not on that account been held to be invalid. In Soviet Russia a man may dissolve his marriage by his own unilateral declaration, a form of divorce as simple as the 'talak' in Mahomedan Law. Yet the Court of Appeal in England unanimously upheld a Soviet Marriage. It was certainly not a union for life, because it could be dissolved at will. It was not a union to the exclusion of all others, for by the law of Russia a man may share his conjugal bliss with as many wives as he chose so long as he observed the golden rule of one thing at a time. The new law of divorce in Spain is very close to the law of Russia, for a divorce decree may now be obtained there by mutual consent. Between Soviet unions and polygamous unions the border line may be morally existent but is hardly visible. Both on principle and authority it would be the law of India that English Courts would be called on to apply. Hindu and Mahomedan Law is no longer a mystery, English Judges sitting on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have shown remarkable grasp in their expositions of intricate questions of Hindu and Mahomedan Law. The British Law Ascertainment Act is also available to English Courts to invoke the aid of Indian Courts to help them when necessary to unravel Indian Law. Surely no English Court has ever refused to adjudicate a cause on the ground there was no law it could apply.

The Ex-Kaiser and Japan:—Mr. Randolph Churchill, son of Mr. Winston Churchill, has been interviewing the Ex-Kaiser at Doorn for the "Daily Mail." The ex-German Emperor said according to Mr. Randolph Churchill: "Emphatically, Japan was as capable of restoring peace and order in China as the British were capable of giving the same to India. It is useless to think that the growth of Japanese power in China can be prevented. Japan, moreover, constitutes in the East a bulwark against Bolshevism as strong as Germany provides in the West." If the British leave India, said the ex-Kaiser, there is bound to cause a cleavage between the Muhammadans and the Hindus. The Muhammadans were not only the stronger race—they were also more highly organised. The Hindus were in circumstances bound to go under. India is incapable of governing herself, he affirmed. And in proof, he pointed out to the fact that all the great Moghals were foreigners.—Bihar Herald.

Gandhiji and the Socialist Party:—Mahatma Gandhi in a letter to a Bombay Congress socialist says "I welcome the rise of the socialist party in the Congress. But I can not say that I like the programme as it appears in the printed pamphlet. It seems to ignore Indian conditions and I do not like the assumption underlying many of its propositions which go to show that there is necessarily an antagonism between classes and masses or between labourers and capitalist, to an extent that they can never work for the mutual good. My own experience, covering a fairly long period, is to the contrary. What is necessary is that the labourers or workers should know their rights and should also know how to assert them, and since there has never been any right without corresponding duty, in my opinion, the manifesto is incomplete without emphasising the necessity of the performance of duty and showing what that duty is."

ENGLISH EDUCATION A CENTURY AGO.* (By B. V. Roy.)

To the student of history it is a well-known fact that events frequently occur in "cycles," and even modes, manners and customs change and change back again in "cycles." This occurs not only in larger spheres, but in the smaller round of our daily lives also. For example, we speak apprehensively and with a doubting shake of the head, of our boys as "forging too rapidly ahead" in their ideas and ideals, but there is no doubt our parents and grandparents also said the same thing in their day with perhaps an indulgent shake of the head, though possibly there may have been a good deal of difference in what constituted this 'forging ahead' in their day as compared with ours. To continue the example further, we frequently hear it said now-a-days that the "godless" system of English education imparted to our boys has made them materialistic in their outlook, and we are in danger of losing the spiritualistic aspect of education which is truly Indian, that the great epics—"Ramayana" and "Mahabharata"—are derided by our boys as Fairy tales—and so on.

Let us go back a century in time, and turn over the pages of the Samachar Darpan, Samachar Chandrika and other Bengali newspapers then published in Calcutta. These papers have been re-vivified, and extracts taken from the issues from about 1818 to 1840 compiled and presented to us in two neat volumes by Mr. Brajendra Nath Banerji, the well-known Bengali historian, whose painstaking care and methodical compilation have laid all students' history under deep obligation.

In the issue of the Chandrika dated the 6th November, 1830 appeared a very interesting letter from a parent bemoaning the evil effects which had resulted from sending his son to the "Hindu College" for receiving "English" education. His complaints bear a curious similarity to those we are apt to make in the present day regarding the "evil" effects of such education. A free translation of the letter runs as follows:—

Sir,—I am a mofussilite, carrying on my avocation in this town of Calcutta. Hearing great things of the "Hindu College," where boys become very learned, where European Sahibs come and examine them, and also that boys who pass out from this College can secure good jobs, I was tempted, and, with great difficulty, out of my poor earnings, I had my son brought out from the mofussil and admitted into the College. But alas! such evil has resulted from this, that I must give my bitter experience to the public, so that they may be warned, and profit thereby.

I gave my son good dresses according to my means, and daily sent him early to school after his meals. The boy had been docile and obedient, and I may tell you, Sir, that whenever I used to call him to help in my domestic duties, he was always willing and helpful. But now things began to change, he gradually gave up our (country's) social modes and customs, and even dress. His fashion of haircut, his wearing shoes, throwing away the Mala (necklet of holy beads,) taking no baths, eating as soon as food is placed before him (i. e. without saying "grace"), no distinction between pure and impure,—all these things and more, have now become apparent. If I give him any advice, he is apt to retort "nonsense!" Well what can I do? However, I thought that I would, enquire about his studies and his proficiency in learning, and came to know that his subjects for study included English, Mathematics, Surveying History of ancient Kings of Britain, Geography etc.,

* From an article in 'The Calcutta Municipal Gazette'

etc. I was also told that he has to attend "lectures" 3 days a week, that is to say, fire is made into water, water is converted to gas, the sun, moon and their eclipse is practically shown. Also I understood that on some days they study religious and philosophical works also, and have debating classes in the evening, and that they can write English with a facile pen, and can also translate into English. On learning all these things, I thought that at least the boy was learning many subjects, even if he had turned rather pert and disobedient. But when I actually saw his handwriting, I found it extremely ill-formed and illegible, and his translations unintelligible and without any sense. He cannot write a common letter of invitation, or do ordinary sums of 5 figures, or keep bazar accounts. If I take him to task, he says "nonsense!" and further says that bazar accounts, etc., are "drudgery" and that it is only low people who write neat hands, and that the handwriting of learned people is always illegible! He does not like to mix with his own people, and even keeps at a distance from my society, because, forsooth! I am not proficient in English! When I told him to adopt our Bengali mode of dress, he refused saying that he was neither a Kirtan-wala (singer) nor a Jage-jhampa-wala (drummer) and that he wanted pantaloons, stocking and walking shoes, etc.

The more I delved in to his attainments, the more was I surprised, for I found that he could reel off a list of all the rivers in Russia, but knew nothing about his own mother-country—he did not even know in which direction from Calcutta lies Burdwan, where is the Some river, or where the Rajmahal hills are situated.

Miraben goes Home:—Miss Slade (Miraben), who is sailing for England, interviewed by the Associated Press, said:—"I am going to England to work quietly and persistently for a true understanding between India and England. Being by birth the daughter of an English Admiral and by choice also the daughter of Mahatma Gandhi, I feel the irresistible call at this juncture to go there and seek with all the strength of love which is in me for both the countries for living in harmony between them." Asked how she proposed to do this she replied, "By reaching the heart of the English people through Truth, and in this respect most especially by showing them what Mahatma Gandhi really is and what he stands for." Asked as to whose idea it was that she should go, she said: "It was entirely my own. It came to me in a flash and I first mentioned it to Miss Harrison, and then to another English friend before I mentioned it to Mahatma Gandhi." "Does Gandhiji approve?" was the last question. "He has given me his blessing," she replied.

The White Paper Scheme:—Sir John Thompson, who is one of the most energetic propagandists for the White Paper in England, recommended it to an audience at Bristol in the following terms.

"And what is the extent of the responsibility which the White Paper proposes to transfer at the centre? The die-hard will tell you that everything is being handed over, that is their copyright phrase; by a stroke of the pen the Government will establish full-fledged democracy. What do you think of this for full-fledged democracy? The Ministers will have the spending of 30 to 35 per cent of the central revenues. They will not control defence and foreign affairs, which will be under the Governor-General. They will not without the Governor-General's permission be able to touch those thorny subjects of currency and exchange. They will not have the control of payments on account of loans, the pay of the principal services or their pensions, and they will not have the administration of the railways. They will not be able to amend the constitution, and if they menace the interests which are to be specially committed to the Governor-General's charge they will find that he has ample resources of persuasion and of power to protect them. Can you wonder that while the die-hard talk of complete surrender their Congress allies in India should exclaim that the concessions made by the White Paper are no worth having?"

We are indebted for this interesting excerpt to our vigilant contemporary, the Servant of India.

685,

SWARAJISTS' RETREAT.

Here, says the Times of India, are the views of a front rank Swarajist, Mr. S. Satyamurthi, vice-president of the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee and one of the Secretaries of the Congress Parliamentary Board. He belongs to the constitutional wing of Congressmen and has been a member of the Madras Legislative Council for six years and Deputy Leader of the Opposition. As a member of the Selection Board of the Parliamentary Board and a prospective candidate for the Assembly in the forthcoming elections, his views will be read with interest.

He said: "The Times of India" has every right to make this appeal, and Congress must consider it carefully. Congress agrees that self-sufficiency, economic or political, is no longer possible, and India must bind herself economically and politically with other nations. From past history and other relative considerations, India would certainly choose to have agreements with Britain rather than with any other country. India does not want to lose Britain as an economic ally; only she does not want to be exploited by Britain or, for that matter, any other country. India contemplates an economic and political alliance with Great Britain—under different conditions.

"We are asked not to use the language of warfare. Congress does not, and does not want to use the language of warfare. It merely wants the remaining civil disobedience prisoners to be released as an answer to its gesture in stopping civil disobedience, particularly Sirdar Vallabhbhai Patel and Khan Abdul Gaffur Khan who have not been convicted of any offence and who are merely detained. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's release is asked for as a matter of policy. Although he has been convicted of sedition, it is well known that prosecutions for sedition are instituted at the instance of Government on grounds of State policy.

"I entirely agree with what The Times of India says under the heading "Patience" in this article. Congress takes the same view as The Times of India that communal differences will not be removed by pretending that they do not exist or by thinking that they will be abandoned by grandiloquent phrases or by staged ostentatious exhibition of concord. This is proved by the resolution passed by the Working Committee on the advice of the Congress Parliamentary Board.

"On the question of tactics I agree that, when the White Paper Reforms are forced on the country in spite of the opposition of Congress, Congressmen will have seriously to consider the advice given by The Times of India." We may have to work the Reforms to the utmost limit of their capacity and ours—with this difference that our object will be to show that they fall far short of the National demand which must be conceded, the earlier the better.

"I cannot, however, agree with The Times of India when it says that a constituent assembly is a dream. From the time of Lord Birkenhead's Secretaryship of State for India this country has been asked to produce a constitution for itself. A constituent assembly is the nearest approach to an answer to that challenge.

"In the last paragraph of its article The Times of India suggests that some people are looking forward to a Labour Government. The history of political life in India has shown me that a Conservative Government in power are stronger to deal with India's claims than a Labour Government in office but not in power. Nor are we merely bargaining. The Joint Parliamentary Committee's report is bound to be disappointing, but Congress can take no responsibility for it. It is not yet too late for a settlement between the people of India and the people of Great Britain, and Congress wants to prevent its being too late."

NOTES

The Hindu Mahasabha :—A session of Bombay City and Suburban Hindu Mahasabha met in Bombay on Saturday and Sunday. Sir Govind Pradhan, Chairman of the Reception Committee, in his speech welcoming the delegates said that he could not understand why critics who saw nothing to object to in the Muslim communal political organisations, should profess to be horrified at similar organisations on behalf of Hindus. There is some misapprehension on this point. The disapproval of communal organisations of Hindus by eminent leaders in the past is due, not to their disregard of Hindu interests, but to their conviction of the responsibility of Hindus to care for the interests of all minorities, some of whom would not have sought asylum in this country but for the protection assured to them by immemorial Indian policy. If the minorities or any of them want to shift for themselves, they are of course, entitled to do so. But Hindus, if they are true to their tradition, are under an obligation for all time to look after the interests of minorities as their own and, as a corollary, to resist with all their strength encroachments on the principle of equal citizenship for all. Compromise in this matter is betrayal of the historic purpose of Hinduism. His observations were mostly directed to obviating occasions of friction between the two communities. He suggested, for instance, that places of worship should be located at suitable distances from each other so as not to interfere with their respective services. He instanced the case of a mosque which was built opposite a pre-existing Hindu temple in Bombay. The worshippers in the new mosque raised objections to the kirtans (exposition of the epics to the accompaniment of music) in the temple which, they said, were obnoxious to them, and Sir Govind said that trouble was averted by police vigilance. Dr. Moonje who presided at the Conference, made a vigorous speech calling upon Hindus to stand up for their rights and not to allow themselves to be pushed to the wall by the aggressive tactics of other communities. The Indian National Congress, in his opinion, was not able to hold the balance even and sacrificed the legitimate rights of Hindus in its anxiety to secure the adhesion of other communities. It has become necessary, therefore, for the Mahasabha to safeguard Hindu rights. Recent developments at Patna and Bombay, have strengthened this feeling even among Hindus who stand outside the Mahasabha. The Leader of Allahabad, quoting the Hindustan Times, asks : "Is it true that this time the great Hindu community is not going to allow itself to be treated in this manner and that already some activities are going on, the result of which will show that the community does not consider its interests to be safe in hands where full justice cannot be secured to its interest lest some other interests might get displeased?" The Mahasabha proposes to run its own candidates at the forthcoming Assembly elections. We do not think that it has much prospect of success outside the Punjab. There, under the leadership of men like the venerable Raja Narendra-nath, it retains some trace of the great ideals with which it was started. One of its immediate objects, it is true, was to oppose the deviation from the policy of even-handed treatment of creeds and communities which was the corner-stone of British rule, but this was a subsidiary object. The spiritual and moral interests of Hinduism were to be the principal concern of the Mahasabha. It was not opposed to the Congress ; neither was it in any way directly or indirectly committed to keep step with that body as Dr. Moonje, ignoring the Chairman of the Reception Committee and other members present, made it out to be. The Hindu Mahasabha has little Hindu about it except the name. It is an imitation of the Muslim League and like all imitations it fails to evoke enthusiasm. It is inconceivable to us that any body professing to speak for Hindus, should fail, as the Mahasabha has done, to record its protest against the alarming revival of animal sacrifices which is degrading Hinduism.

The Ramakrishna Mission :—We should welcome more recognition by the public of the great service which the Ramakrishna Mission is quietly doing for the promotion of harmonious relations between different communities. Communal unity does not figure among its objects of which the principal ones are the dissemination of the teachings of Sri Ramakrishna and the precepts of Swami Vivekananda regarding the important place of service to humanity in religion. The Mission, as is well-known, holds all religions in reverence as Ramakrishna did, though its own medium of thought and work is the Vedanta. A unique function was held on Tuesday the 19th instant at the School of the Mission in Madras. It was the opening of a new dormitory built in the name and at the cost of a Muslim donor. Mr. Abdul Hakim, when he paid a visit to the School, saw the names of Hindu Rajahs and Zamindars perpetuated. "The thought rose in my mind," he explained, "to perpetuate a Mahomedan name also so that posterity might see that Hindus and Muslims were living together in terms of peace, goodwill and amity." This is absolutely true of the relations between the two communities in Southern India. Even more interesting and illustrative of the harmonising influence of the Vedanta, was the presence on the platform of the two principal speakers of the evening, the two Ramaswami's, who count among the front bench politicians of the day. Sir C. P. Ramaswami Iyer and Dewan Bahadur Ramaswami Mudaliar were, in the early days of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, regarded as the principal protagonists respectively of the Brahmin and non-Brahmin parties. Iyer was the best-hated man by non-Brahmin leaders and he, it is probable, repaid the compliment in full measure. Much water has flowed under the bridge since then. Both Mudaliar and Iyer have had frequent opportunities of viewing the Indian problem from above the clouds of caste predilections. We have heard the Dewan Bahadur spoken of by those who had excellent opportunities of observing his work at the Round Table Conference, as second, if at all, only to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. Sir Ramaswami Iyer impressed the late Mr. Montagu as the ablest Indian he had met during his tour of enquiry, and he has since added to his laurels fresh ones as the constitutional adviser of Indian States. The participation of the two eminent men at the function shows that the rapprochement between Brahmins and non-Brahmins in Madras has much deeper roots than political expediency. There was yet another incident which is of gratifying interest in the proceedings. The Madras non-Brahmin party had somehow acquired the reputation of being antagonistic to religion. Dewan Bahadur Ramaswami Mudaliar's remark in the course of his excellent little speech about the importance of religion is, therefore, of welcome significance. "I value," he said, "the religious atmosphere and the religious foundation given to the institution. Those of us, who have been in the midst of the bustle of the political, social or any other sphere, know that, after all, ultimate peace of mind lies only in the sphere of religion." He added that, because of their religious training, the students of the School, when they faced life's problems, would face them with courage and equanimity.

Obliter Dicta :—It is not clear why Sir Mirza Ismail, Dewan-President of the Mysore Representative Assembly, felt obliged to warn that body in his speech at the close of the session, that there was no idea of introducing any further changes in the constitution or of altering the structure of the Government of Mysore. He explained rather superfluously that he was speaking only of the present and the immediate future—of today, perhaps of tomorrow but not of the day after. Even so the concluding remarks seem to be out of tune with Sir Mirza's enthusiastic support of the Federal scheme. The members of the Assembly might, as in the past, have asked for more constitutional reforms and, as the Dewan admitted that they had worked the present system "most satisfactorily," they were entitled to do so. Political evolution is not a matter of the volition of individual statesmen. It is a part of the process by which the dualism of subject and ruler gives place to the monism of subject-in-ruler. In the perfect State allegiance and authority are corollary to each other. It is true that Parliamentary Democracy, because it has fallen short of this identity, no longer commands the same implicit faith which it used to do until the third quarter of the last century when Bismark contemptuously rejected it in the constitution of the German Empire. But the Bismarckian system has also collapsed and Europe is now faced with the alternatives of Fascism and Communism. To bang and bolt the door on constitutional reform, unless associated with a new doctrine of political evolution, is likely to turn the popular mind to one or other of the two alternatives which have taken its place in Europe. Sir Mirza is not a hand-to-mouth statesman and these considerations must have presented themselves to him. Perhaps the declaration was meant to reassure outsiders who fear reform in Mysore might outstrip their calculations.

Islam and Caste :—On Monday evening, Bombay citizens of all creeds gathered at the Cowasji Jehangir Hall to celebrate the birthday of the Prophet Mohammed, when Moulana Pir Motamiya presided. The Moulana gave a sketch of the life and work of the Prophet and commended Islam as a religion to his non-Muslim brothers. "Some of our present day non-Muslim brother reformers," he said, "out of zeal for social uplift advocate the cause of widow remarriage, women's right of inheritance, total abstinence from alcohol, abolition of the caste system, removal of untouchability, intercommunal dining, etc. All these reforms are already embodied in Islam, Islam is therefore a brotherhood, comprising all the reforms they aspire to, and are best suited to all the present-day needs and requirements of the members of their (the non-Muslim reformers') society." The Pir Sahib is right but, of course, social reforms cover only a small part of religion. Even as regard social reforms, there exists a broad gulf between precept and practice, as in other religions. Dr. Khalid Sheldrake, the English Muslim who attended the meeting, regretted that the ideal of brotherhood laid down by the Prophet and extolled by the Moulana was not practised among Indian Muslims and he asked them to live up to that principle. We publish this week an article by Mr. J. M. Datta on "Caste among Bengal Muslims" which shows that though theoretically the caste system conflicts with the democratic doctrine of Islam, yet Indian Mohamedans observe caste as much as, if not even more than, Indian Christians. Mr. E. A. H. Blunt in his "Caste System of Northern India" writes that in the United Provinces the caste system has an equally strong hold in Mohamedan society as in Hindu: "Many castes preserve more or less completely the Hindu wedding rights...the Bhat goes further still: he carries out first the Hindu wedding in the fullest form and then follows it up by a Mohamedan ceremony. Many castes still employ Brahmin pundits to fix an auspicious day for wedding and other ceremonies... Almost all of them are strictly endogamous." His Majesty Ibn Saud will disapprove of many things in Indian Islam, as contravening the puritan simplicity of the Prophet's life and teachings.

What is Truth?—"As for the reformers' method of agitation, they have been scrupulously non-violent and based on persuasion." Thus the Bombay Chronicle in its leading article on Wednesday. What about the two men beaten to unconsciousness at Guruvayur? Headline in Sun of same date: "News of further Sanatanist violence comes from Ahmedabad where Sanatanist Black Flaggers used lathis and bamboos against unresisting Congress volunteers on Mahatma's arrival in that city." In the body of the message: "A scuffle ensued between Congressites and Sanatanists. Both parties entered into a hand to hand fight. Sadhus used lathis and bamboos freely. One Congress volunteer was bleeding and was sent to the hospital. Four Sadhus were severely beaten. One was bleeding." (He apparently was left to bleed where he was.) The "unresisting" Congressites would seem to have made four Sadhus suffer for every one of their men injured. And there were only three hundred Sadhus as against "ten thousand" on the other side.

Plea for Polygamy :—It is inevitable that the communal problem should eventually intrude into social life. Asutosh Bhattacharya who appends M. A. to his signature, in a letter to the Amrita Basar Patrika, calls attention to the proportionate decrease in the Hindu population owing to its lower birthrate as compared to the Muslim in Bengal. Delayed marriages, absence of widow remarriages, antipathy of the "modern girls" to child-bearing in combination with various other causes, he says, have alarmingly arrested the growth of the Hindu population. He does not mention "birth-control" but it is also one of the causes in operation among the educated middle class. He suggests that unless the community is prepared to face the prospect of certain extinction, it has no alternative to reviving polygamy. He concludes by citing the instance of a Mahomedan tenant of his, as illustrating the urgency of the problem. He writes:—"I had a Mahomedan tenant of cultivator class, who approached me once for a small loan which he required to perform his third marriage. Both of his previous wives were living with him peacefully and he had issues of each. I was naturally surprised to know of his such intention when it involves him into debt. But he emphatically asserted that money could be made at times but men could not be made at the expiry of a particular age. He requires as many as eight sons to look after his agriculture but he had only four by his two wives. Hence this new endeavour. Have we, the so-called advanced Hindus, anything to learn from this rustic peasant? I pause for an answer." Mr. Justice Ramesam and Mr. P. K. Wattak should lose no time in answering Mr. Bhattacharya's pertinent question.

Jail Interviews :—We were surprised to read a spirited protest by a contemporary in North India against the presence of a jail official "within hearing distance" during an interview between Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mrs. Kamala Nehru in Dehra Dun jail. One of the rules in the Bombay Jail Manual—and we have no reason to believe that the rule differs in other provinces—expressly provides that "every interview with a convicted prisoner shall take place in the presence of a jail officer, who shall be responsible that no irregularity occurs and who shall be so placed as to be able to see and hear what passes and to prevent any article being passed between the parties. Conversations at the interview shall not be permitted in any language not readily understood by the jail officer present." We can state from our personal knowledge that the rule is rigidly adhered to and it has not occurred to either the prisoners or the relatives of the prisoners to protest against it. We have criticised frequently the treatment of prisoners in Indian jails but the procedure adopted at jail interviews does not seem a legitimate ground for grievance nor is it a matter of any importance. The paper greatly exaggerates when it remarks that "the whole object of an interview would in many cases be defeated if a jail official were within hearing distance." It proceeds to lay down that interviews should be allowed between prisoners and their relatives or friends within sight only of a jail official and that, while such a 'rule' should be observed in all cases, it should be all the more scrupulously observed in the case of a prisoner like Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru, "both on account of his eminent position in the public life of the country and because he is the very soul of honour." The preoccupation of the public with the treatment received by incarcerated Congress leaders has been the despair of the Congress rank and file,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, JUNE 30, 1934.

THE ATTEMPT ON GANDHIJI

On Monday evening Gandhiji went to the Municipal Hall in Poona City to receive a civic address. He had with him Mrs. Gandhi and three girls, daughters of his friends. A few minutes before his arrival, another car containing a party of Councillors drove into the porch. It was mistaken for Gandhiji's car, and the band of boy scouts, who furnished a guard of honour, blared out a welcome. Prominent members of the Municipal Council crowded at the door to greet the distinguished guest. Suddenly there was an explosion which was thought to be that of a cracker and passed unnoticed at the moment. The real nature of the incident, however, was soon revealed when several people were seen to have been injured. The injured men were at once sent to the hospital. Gandhiji and his party reached the scene and the programme was gone through in a somewhat abbreviated form. A public meeting was held soon after and Gandhiji issued a statement on the incident. He said that though he was not aching for martyrdom, he was not much concerned about the attempt on himself but he was pained to think what impression the world would have formed if any harm had befallen his wife and the children who were with him. Gandhiji addressed his remarks chiefly to orthodox Hindus who opposed his harijan propaganda. He assured them that he had not laid much stress on temple entry—which aroused their keenest apprehensions—during his present tour and that he would never agree to the admission of antyajias into temples by compulsion. He wanted this to be done by the goodwill of caste Hindus and his propaganda was mainly to enlist their goodwill. He repeated, what he had often said, that Hinduism stood to gain immensely by getting rid of the curse of untouchability, while neglect or failure in this vital reform would spell disaster to it. The nobility and grandeur of Gandhiji's personality never shone brighter than in his behaviour on an occasion like this which tears up the foundations of character. The attempt, providentially frustrated, to assassinate him, by whomsoever made, was a diabolical one and we trust that the criminal will be caught and punished, notwithstanding Gandhiji's magnanimous desire to let him go free.

There are, there can be, no two opinions as to the vileness of the deed and the sublimity of Gandhiji's behaviour. The attempt to fasten this deplorable incident on orthodox Hindus who are opposed to the Harijan movement, however, is the outcome of blind partisanship. Nothing is known so far to justify it. The Police arrested five persons after the incident and later released them as they were all invited guests and had cards of invitation. The injured men are being treated in hospital, one of them being a leader of orthodox Hindus. It is true that the proposal to give an address was opposed in the Poona Municipal Council by some orthodox Hindu representatives. But that by itself does not justify the conclusion that the bomb was thrown by them or at their instance. On just such reasoning persons who practised civil disobedience have been represented as accessories to anarchism. The social and religious reform movement has gone on for nearly a hundred years. The issues involved in the past came far more closely home to caste Hindus than the removal of untouchability which lies outside the daily routine of Hindu life. The remarriage of widows cut deeper into the convictions of Hindus than the admission of untouchables to temples can possibly do. As a matter of fact, hundreds of antyajias find their way into temples all over the country without questions asked about their castes. The fundamental difference between Gandhiji's school and the older school of reformers, is that while the former wish antyajias to be admitted as antyajias, the latter hold that, if untouchability is first removed, the bar against these classes automatically lapses. And this is the important point. Untouchability will be removed not by admitting them to temples but to the homes of caste Hindus on the same footing as members of other Hindu castes. How many of those who subscribe to the Harijan Fund will satisfy the test? The point was raised two years ago in the Bombay Hindus' Conference presided over by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya but it met with a chill reception. That is by the way. What we wish to emphasise here is the fact that, in all these years, Sanatanists who bitterly opposed social reforms, never took to bombs or knives. It is not, was never, the Hindu way. And we should insist on very clear proof before it is assumed that the bomb thrown at the Municipal Hall was instigated by any organisation of orthodox Hindus.

Gandhiji said in his statement that he could not believe that any sane Sanatanist could ever encourage the insane act that was perpetrated that evening. He however, went on, immediately to speak of the Harijan cause being advanced by the outrage and of the value of martyrdom to a cause. What evidently he meant was that the crime was the act of one or more insane Sanatanists who thought they were avenging thereby what they regarded as the outrage on Hinduism sought to be inflicted by getting antyajias admitted into temples. He is possibly right. There are, no doubt, among orthodox Hindus, as among other classes, criminals and blackguards. If some of these took it into their heads to murder Gandhiji, it is surely monstrous to lay the crime at the door of Sanatanists. But there are other possibilities also, including that of designing people utilising the Sanatanist antagonism to Gandhiji's propaganda as a smoke screen from behind which to execute their own evil purpose. It is grossly unfair until the responsibility for the crime is indubitably established, to denounce the Sanatanists as is being done, as authors and instigators of the outrage. The opposition of the Sanatanists has been throughout open. While they resent the attempt to force them, as they think, to admit antyajās to temples, they regard a reformer as an ephemeral phantom strutting on the stage, and their religion as eternal and beyond injury by mortal man. They are not fools. They know well that if Gandhiji goes, some one less devoted to religion may step into his shoes. It is also right to remember that till the question of legislation about temple entry came to the front, the Sanatanists acquiesced in, if they did not whole-heartedly support, the movement for the uplift of the antyajās. It is easier to believe that the anarchist revolutionaries are seeking fresh fields for their activities, than to believe that orthodox Hindus, mostly elderly man and women, whose one desire is to be left alone, organised this attempt on the life of one who, until a few months ago, they revered as a saint and a sadhu. It is a novel role for the Reformer to espouse the side of the orthodox Hindu between whose point of view and ours there has always been a wide gulf fixed. He is obstinate, misguided, blind to the signs of the times. He is often callous, sometimes cruel, at all times apathetic except to what he believes to be the duties devolving on him as on account of his religion and his caste. But in the now nearly half a century of its conflict with orthodoxy the Reformer has never had once to think of it as a nursery of potential murderers. It may be, however, that a change has come over orthodox Hindus and that the attempt on Gandhiji was really instigated by them. If and when that is proved, the Reformer will certainly not mince words in its condemnation. The position at present (Friday morning) is that the arrested men have been released. Government with praiseworthy promptness have offered a reward of Rs. five thousand for the apprehension and conviction of the person or persons concerned in this despicable crime. The only thing for responsible publicists to do just now is to suspend judgment.

SWADESHI IN THE MELTING POT.

One substantial result of the ten years of experimenting with national life, was the diffusion of the sense of duty to prefer goods manufactured in the country, particularly among the middle classes. Although 'swadeshi' came to be associated with politics, many people who had no political predilections, recognised the economic value of the principle and did their best to give effect to it in their own daily lives. This is due to the fact that Swadeshi did not originate with politics. Fifty years ago there were men who practised swadeshi and made efforts to promote indigenous industries. Ranade was one of the pioneers in this as in other directions. He thought that the economic domination of India by Britain had more serious effects than political domination. His idea of swadeshi was very broad. It included everything manufactured in the country and did not go minutely into the question of who owned the capital or provided the management. A political complexion was first given to the swadeshi movement during the agitation over the Bengal Partition. The National Congress began to hold Exhibitions during its sessions. After a time, the Industrial movement started the Industrial Conference as its own special organ. Government and British business men at first extended their support to the Conference. After a time the Industrial Conference threw off its association with the Congress and passed under the leadership of persons who, for want of a better word, may be called capitalists. The result was that the industrial problem thenceforward tended to assume more the aspect of a capitalist than of a national concern.

The Labour movement was the necessary concomitant of this development. An attempt to reconcile the two on the plea that the most urgent question was first to counter exploitation by foreign capitalist and that when that was done the Indian capitalist can be settled with, succeeded for a time. Under this compromise, politicians, workers and employers or capitalists joined hands and were able to get Government to adopt discriminating protection in place of Free Trade as its fiscal policy. This co-operation was broken when The Times of India fulminated on the condition of Bombay's slaves. The Factory Act was passed and made Labour self-conscious. Labour Unions grew up rapidly, which alarmed employers. Indian employers alarmed at the growing power of Labour in India and Britain and uncertain of the support of Indian politicians, turned to foreign capitalists for support. The depression in the fortunes of Labour in Britain and the advance of the idea of the Corporate State in Europe led to the degeneration of Swadeshi into salesmanship of commodities which, but for the accident of their production in this country, had no claim on the support of nationally-minded people. As Swadeshi, the weekly organ of the Swadeshi Sangh, observes: "The feeling is growing among large sections of the community that our industrialists are trading on Swadeshi sentiment without showing sufficient concern either for Labour or consumer." Wages are cut down and side by side by dint of agitation heavy protective duties are secured against foreign competitors. That is to say, the worker gets less in wages and the consumer is obliged to pay more in prices to keep up "the national industry."

The anomaly has struck Gandhiji, as it has every thinking man, and he, according to Swadeshi, is of the view that the Sangh and other bodies should confine their efforts of propaganda henceforth to the resuscitation of cottage industries and the introduction of subsidiary occupation for agriculturists. This may constitute ideal objects of rural reconstruction but to call them swadeshi activities would be a misnomer. Gandhiji's view is that the organised large factory industries can take care of themselves by getting protection from the State and do not stand in need of help from the public. This leaves out of consideration the fact that the factory industries have to deal with Labour and the result of leaving them alone will be to deny that Swadeshi has a duty to see that home industries are built up on sound lines as regards their incidence on Labour. We want rather an expansion of the idea of Swadeshi than a contraction of it to village industries. We publish today the admirable address of M. Godart, the President of the Eighteenth Session of the International Labour Organisation which opened at Geneva on the 4th of June. He has therein defined the problem before the industrial world in language as precise as it is eloquent. The problem of the Swadeshi movement is to embody in the national system the principles which the League of Nations Covenant has laid down for the International Labour Organisation.

IS IT JEWISH PROPAGANDA?

During the last few months three films have been shown in Bombay, the central figure in each of which was a Jew. About Easter week, "the Wandering Jew" made a great impression. It was a very powerful piece, both technically and topically. The trial and burning of the Jew in the presence and under the orders of ecclesiastics in their official robes, was a far more terrible exhibition of intolerance than the man with the drawn sword over the bent neck of a missionary which the local Catholic Examiner publishes on its front page. The behaviour of the Wandering Jew was courageous, calm, and dignified. It was calculated to impress those who saw the picture as typical of the superior moral and spiritual calibre of the Hebrew as compared with his European persecutors. To that extent, it may be regarded as a bit of subtle but effective pro-Jew propaganda.

Next came "Disraeli." George Arliss' personation of Disraeli is wonderful. You feel after seeing his Disraeli that you have been in the presence of the original. Disraeli was a great believer in race and in his own race in particular. In Arliss' Disraeli, the Governor of the Bank of England is browbeaten into endorsing the cheque of the bankrupt Meyer, to whom Disraeli had applied for the advance of four million pounds to buy the Suez Canal shares of the Khedive. The Governor of the Bank of England who was first asked, not only refuses pointblank but insults Disraeli. Disraeli tells him that he will find it elsewhere. The Governor, surprised, asks to whom would he go. "To the same to whom all Christians go when they need money, the Jew." After Meyer had given the cheque and before it could be cashed the Russian Government buys up all his obligations, and he finds himself a bankrupt. It is at this stage, that Disraeli summons the Governor again and urges that he should honour the cheque. He indignantly refuses. He calls Disraeli an adventurer. "And a Jew," prompts Disraeli. After the Governor had finished, Disraeli quietly reminds him that he is the Prime Minister of England. Waxing warm, he threatens to smash the Bank if the Governor did not then and there endorse the cheque. The scene is very tense but at the end the Governor walks sheepishly to the table and puts his name to the paper. Disraeli puts it in his pocket and triumphantly tells his wife of what had taken place. "But," she asks, "have you really power to smash his bank?" "I have not," is Disraeli's reply, "but he does not know it." In the closing scene, the Governor is the first to come and congratulate the Prime Minister on his patriotic action. With a twinkle in his eyes, Disraeli publicly thanks the Governor for his help and announces that the Queen was pleased to confer a peerage on him—and Meyer! When I walked out of the theatre I could not help thinking that the Englishman was a bit of a "chump" by the side of the Jew but, I recollected, he had the good sense to own it by making the Jew the Prime Minister of his country.

The "House of Rothschild" is another of these pro-Jewish pictures now shown in Bombay. The leading part in it is also taken by Arliss and it is one of his most successful roles. Here also the Jew appears as a clever competitor with English politicians and merchants. This has been criticised and it has been plainly said that the purpose of the production is propaganda. Propaganda or no propaganda, Jews have certainly produced a higher proportion of men great in all branches of knowledge and activity, except War, and it is well that the public should be reminded of the fact now that there is so much intolerance and persecution of this gifted race. One would like to see Lessing's "Nathan the Wise" in the form of a good picture. It will be a most attractive theme with striking characters—Saladin, the Templar, Saladin's sister, Nathan, certainly one of the noblest Jewish characters, and his daughter.

INDIA HAS HER FASCISTS TOO.

(By V. A.)

India has long had the distinction of harbouring every type of religion. It will soon be in a position to boast that it possesses representatives of every school of political thought. An attempt to emulate Italian Fascism was made two years ago in Calcutta when an organisation was formed to counteract the activities of the Congress. Members wore distinctive clothes with a prominently displayed badge and concentrated at the outset on nullifying the work of Congress picketers. They helped Calcutta merchants to have their goods conveyed from godown to shop and generally encouraged them to disregard the dictates of Congress leaders. For a fortnight the doings of members of this organisation were reported with enthusiasm in the Anglo-Indian press. Then nothing more was heard of it. And now news comes of a revival of interest in Fascism in South India.

It was a surprise to me to read in a recent issue of the Hindu of Madras a letter inviting would-be Indian Fascists to write to Mr. K. Suryanarayana Rao, Beehive Foundry, Broadway, Madras, with a view to facilitating the early convening of a conference in Madras. The writer expressed alarm at the growth of socialism and the rapid increase of disloyalty. He, therefore, urged the creation of a Fascist organisation to "shatter the evil seeds of communism and educate national conscience against laxity in political, economical or social standards." Mr. Dorai who evidently acts as Mr. Suryanarayana Rao's recruiting officer, has apparently forgotten that the British Government in India takes itself seriously as an opponent of communism and has 'educated' the Indian conscience against laxity in political standards. What the economic or social ideals of the proposed Fascist party are Mr. Dorai fails to inform his reader. A correspondent who writes a strong protest in a subsequent issue of the same newspaper is evidently perplexed by Mr. Dorai's reference to India as "the birth-place of Aryan Fascism." Mr. Dorai himself is vague on a number of issues, his only definite programme for the proposed Fascist party being the combating of communism and the infusing of moral tone into the political and economic fabric. That possibly is a necessary attitude to adopt in building up a new party. Mr. Dorai's letter reveals that his enthusiasm for Fascism is not the outcome of a mere passion for coloured shirts. His attempts at political and economic policy building are not likely to meet with much success, particularly since the British Government has already interested itself in both these subjects. The one sphere left to our budding Fascists is that of social work. A friend of mine who is too uneducated to appreciate the finer points of Hitler's political methods and economic ideals, expressed the highest admiration for the Nazi leader when he was told of his mass marriage programme. He remarked that the only hope of Indians shaking themselves free of social evils like the dowry system, unequal marriages, child marriages and the problem of widows, was for an Indian Hitler to set the people on the straight and narrow path. Mr. Suryanarayana Rao will, I am sure, not look down on work in the social sphere as worthy only of old women. The laxity in political and economical (sic in Mr. Dorai's letter) life has its origins in social laxity. If the Hindu father of to-day had acted after the manner of the old paterfamilias, much of our troubles would have been non-existent. Indian Fascism should, like charity, begin at home.

A MESSAGE TO YOUNG ASIA. (BY JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.)

The problem of world unity involves many economic and political and social factors. But those factors can never be effectively handled, and the problem itself solved, until we see that in all and through all and over all is that one spirit in the life of God and in the soul of man, which can alone make us one upon this earth. Unless we recognize this spirit and celebrate it, and manifest it in our lives, all economic problems and political treaties and social arrangements, however wise and necessary, will prove in the end to be vain. The organism of men's common life must be a living organism, and this life can only come through the incarnation of the spirit which is religion.

You of the East can help us of the West more, perhaps, than you imagine, because it is from the genius of the East that all the religious idealism of man has sprung. You seem to have the secret of the spirit, as you have imparted it to humanity through the centuries gone by. In ancient times you had the immortal Buddha. Today you have the equally immortal Mahatma Gandhi. In those we see your supreme gifts to mankind, and with them, as with Jesus and Zoroaster and the Hebrew prophets, we must march to the great goal of brotherhood.

You young people of the East can also help us just because you are young, and thus hold in your hands the promise of the future. That future will be dark or bright, a thing of death or life, according as you, the youth of the world, are faithful to God's will and seek in his immortal name the building of his kingdom among men. Do not fail us, for we look to you to save the world which the present generation has all but lost.

Together we must clasp hands and touch hearts across the stretch of continents and over the vast gulf of encompassing seas. We must recognize and acclaim our essential kinship and achieve the promises of our common life. As we are all children of God, so are we all members of the great family of God and thus brothers together. Frontiers must not divide us, nor creeds separate us. We must yield to no superstition of nationalism and fall victim to no prejudices of race. For as one of our greatest Christian prophets has said, "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell together on the face of the earth."

A BUDDHIST UNIVERSITY IN INDIA.

Buddhists in Burma and throughout the Far East will learn with interest that the Government of India have sanctioned the establishment of a Buddhist University.

An International Buddhist Academy, which is preliminary to this University, will be opened on Full Moon Day in November next. The Academy will be developed into the proposed University, in the course of the next five years.

The ideal which the Academy has in view is the advancement of research in the various departments of Buddhist studies on the basis of co-operation among Orientalists all over the world.

The proposed University, which will be known as the International Buddhist University, will promote not only Buddhist studies but also studies in scientific subjects concerned with the advancement of man's welfare.

The ultimate ideal of this University is to benefit mankind through a correct and farsighted exposition of Buddhism.

The Buddhist University, which will be run on the lines of the Benares Hindu University, will have a governing body, including Buddhists and non-Buddhists interested in Buddhism from Ceylon, Burma, Siam, China, Japan, Cambodia, Tibet and India, and also Europe and America. The University will have a president, one or more vice-presidents, a general secretary, three secretaries and a treasurer. It will be administered by a working committee of twenty-five including office-bearers. Mr. M. N. Mukherjee, a Judge of the High Court at Calcutta, has already been appointed President, with Anagarika B. Govinda (Mr. E. L. Hoffmann) of Ceylon as General Secretary.

The Academy will be housed in the Maha Bodhi Society Buildings at Sarnath, but later, it will be shifted to its own buildings, to be constructed at Deer Park, where Buddha preached his first sermon, the land for the purpose having been given by the Government of India. The Government have promised an annual grant for the upkeep of the University.

Justice-Liberal Rapprochement:—We welcome the following paragraph in the Leader as indicative of a possible combination between the Liberals and Justices in Madras: "A little bird has whispered in my ear that correspondence (or conversations) has been in progress between the Liberal and Justice parties in Madras, as a result of which it is not impossible that Diwan Bahadur Ramchandra Kao and Mr. Venkatrama Sastri may seek election to the Assembly with the combined support of both parties. I shall heartily welcome this development and shall not go into mourning if a man of sterling worth like Mr. Venkatrama Sastri goes into the Assembly in preference to Mr. Satyamurti who has no intention of allowing a single non-Congressman to succeed in the elections."

ALL-FAITHS CONFERENCE IN NEW YORK.

To take a leading part in New York City's fourteen supplementary sessions of the first World Fellowship of Faiths (the second Parliament of Religions), Sir Francis Younghusband, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., (famous British explorer, general, statesman, author) made a special journey from England, where he is Chairman for London of the "Threefold Movement"—Union of East and West, League of Neighbours, "Fellowship of Faiths"—which developed the World Fellowship of Faiths. Professor P. A. Wadia, distinguished political economist of Wilson College, Bombay, a follower of the Zoroastrian or Parsee religion, was also among the seventy-two speakers at the fourteen meetings held in the grand ballroom of Hotel New Yorker during the Peace and Goodwill Week, May 12 to 18 inclusive, 1934. These New York City meetings supplemented the sixty sessions held in Chicago, during Chicago's second World's Fair, June to November 1933, when the World Fellowship of Faiths continued and improved upon the Parliament of Religions originated at Chicago's first World's Fair in 1893.

Included among the seventy-two eminent speakers who, in the fourteen New York City Meetings, represented many faiths, races and countries were Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Mr. Norman Hapgood, President Bernard S. Deutsch of the New York City Board of Aldermen, Professor Edwin R. A. Seligman, economist of Columbia University; President Emeritus Charles F. Thwing of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio; President Arlo Ayres Brown of Drew University, Madison, New Jersey; Professor William A. Kilpatrick of Teachers' College; Professor H. Douglas Wild of Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey; Miss Ruth St. Denis, internationally-known dancer; two national leaders of the Coloured race—Mrs. Mary Church Terrell of Washington, D. C. and President R. R. Wright, Jr. of Wilberforce University, Ohio; Rabbi H. Pereira Mendes of the Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue (who also took part prominently in the first Parliament of Religions in 1893); from other leading Jewish rabbis—Louis I. Newman, D. DeSola Pool, Israel Goldstein, Morton M. Berman; Benjamin C. Marsh of the People's Lobby, Washington, D. C.; Dr. Hereward Carrington of the Psychic Institute; Professor Ernest P. Horowitz, Orientalist of Hunter College; Mrs. Alice A. Bailey, international lecturer; two College Christian Mystics—Dr. F. Homer Curtiss of Washington, D. C. and Rev. Rosalie A. Beatty; Mrs. Owen Neill Brown, Vice-chairman of the League of Nations Association; Mr. William H. Short, Director of the Motion Picture Research Council; Dr. Jessie Wallace Hughson of the War Resisters League; Dr. C. M. Flumiani, editor of Foreign Affairs Confidential Advisory Service; Rev. Sydney Strong from the Geneva Disarmament Conference; two Ethical Culture Society leaders—Dr. John L. Elliott and Dr. Henry Neumann; Dr. Christian F. Reissner of Broadway Temple Methodist Episcopal Church; two representatives of the Baha'i faith—Mrs. Mary Hanford Ford and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab of Persia; four leaders of the New Thought movement—Dr. Edna Lister of Buffalo, President of the International New Thought Alliance; Mrs. Ada Cox Fisher, director of the New York Centre of Truth; Dr. Albert C. Grier and Miss Villa Faulkner Page; Dr. John Howland Lathrop, Unitarian; Rev. Eliot White, Episcopalian; Dr. John Curry Walker of the Plymouth Church of the Pilgrims; Rev. Cameron Parker Hall of Christ Presbyterian Church; Rev. Walter Brooks Foley of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Lake Ronkankoma, Long Island; Rev. Anthony Evans, Pastor of the West Park Presbyterian Church; Rev. Ahva J. C. Bond of the Seventh-Day Baptist Conference; Rev. Sokei-ann Sasaki, Buddhist Priest of Japan; Ibrahim Sefa Bey, a Moslem from Turkey; Basil Alexander, President of the Soas of Roumania; and four representatives from India—Swami Bodhananda (the only personal disciple in America of Swami Vivekananda who was an outstanding leader in the 1893 Parliament of Religions), Gobind Behari Lal, Scientific Editor of the Hearst Publications; Vidya-Vibhushana Pandit Dr. Shyama Shankar, Hindu, formerly foreign minister of the Indian State of Jhalawar, and Bhai Manilal C. Parekh, Jain, from the province in which Mahatma Gandhi was reared. Sri Balwant Singh Grewal, Sikh, of India and Arthur G. Hoover served as Time Monitors. Kedarnath Das Gupta of India opened the meetings with an ancient Sanskrit invocation and its English equivalent. The Prayers of Eleven Faiths were read aloud at each meeting by the audience. Soloists, choruses, orchestras and other musical numbers were provided for all the meetings by Dr. Archer Leslie Hood, director of the International Music Festival League. Charles Frederick Weller of Chicago presided at nine of the fourteen meetings.

A special feature of these supplementary sessions was a unique procession of people of all faiths, races and countries who marched in ceremonial robes and colourful dresses of many countries, on Sunday, May 13th from the Pennsylvania Railway Station to the Hotel New Yorker for a programme of characteristic songs and short speeches. John Haynes Holmes, minister of the Community Church, Miss Ruth St. Denis, international dancer, Kedarnath Das Gupta and Charles Frederick Weller, General Executives, headed the procession.

By request of the Committee of the World Fellowship of Faiths, many United States Governors proclaimed to observe May 18 as World Goodwill Day in churches, synagogues, schools and other public institutions.

The topics discussed in the round-table conferences of the afternoon sessions were, on May 12, "A New Spiritual Dynamic Needed." May 14, "How Prevent War?" May 15, "Overcoming Racial and Religious Prejudice." May 16, "How May Man Master Fear?" May 17, "Nationalism and Internationalism." May 18, "Needed; a New Spiritual World Code."

The subjects for the seven meetings were, on May 12, "Spiritual-Needs and Evils of Society." May 13, "Designs for Living in a Nobler World." May 14, "No More War." May 15, "How Faiths, in Fellowship, Can Save Civilization." May 16, "How May Man Manage His United World?" May 17, "Personal and World Spiritual Recovery." May 18, "For a New World Consciousness."

A banquet and reception to Sir Francis Younghusband was held on the evening of May 15th in the Grand Ballroom of Hotel New Yorker.

The following resolutions were unanimously and enthusiastically adopted on the last day of the Convention:—

"Sir Francis Younghusband, K. C. S. I., K. C. I. E., Chairman for Great Britain of our Threefold Movement, invited us to hold in London, in 1936, the second international convention of the World Fellowship of Faiths—the third World's Parliament of Religions.

"In grateful response to the invitation given through Sir Francis Younghusband, we, assembled in the fourteen New York City meeting of the First World Fellowship of Faiths, the Second World's Parliament of Religions, unanimously vote to recommend to our International President, His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda, that he and the International Committee should soon decide upon and undertake specific adequate preparations for our meetings in London in 1936."

"Assembled in the fourteen New York City meetings of the World Fellowship of Faiths, we are impressed with the value of this movement to every city in every country and we cordially recommend to the officers and members of the National Committee of Three Hundred and to the International President and Members of the International Committee that earnest efforts be made to develop local meetings and movements of the World Fellowship of Faiths in as many cities as possible throughout the world."

THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE.

(BY "OBSERVER.")

What bids fair to be one of the most interesting and important sessions of the International Labour Conference is now sitting in Geneva.

Three major questions are being discussed, all of vital importance on account of the continuing world economic depression. They are: 1. the "40-hour week;" 2. unemployment insurance; and 3. national and international "public works."

As regards hours of work, the Workers Group are strongly in favour of a Convention that would make universally obligatory a shorter working week than at present prevails. They claim it would alleviate unemployment, and also give to the workers a legitimate share of the increased productivity of mechanised industry. The Employers Group oppose, and state that far from reducing unemployment, shorter hours would increase it. The Governments are divided, and at least two Governments (Japan and Great Britain) have declared in advance that they are not prepared to work such a Convention. How the Conference will meet this dilemma remains to be seen.

The question of large-scale public works, designed to give employment and revive economic activity, by putting into circulation capital at present inactive, is to be discussed in the light of experience gained by various countries. It will be remembered that the late Albert Thomas was an enthusiast for international public works including great continental road systems, etc. Also that a year ago the I. L. O. urged the World Economic Conference to take up this matter amongst others. In view of the failure of the Economic Conference, it now looks as if the I. L. O. would contemplate some initiative on its own account.

The general debate on the Director's Report will certainly give opportunity for a frank exchange of views on the present economic situation. Mr. Harold Butler (the Director) had this year directed special attention to the social and economic dislocation resulting from the chaos of the exchanges. He has had the courage, moreover, to bring right out into the open the burning question of Japanese competition, the severity of which, he claims, results chiefly from Japan's inflationist policy for which she cannot be held wholly responsible, and not, as is commonly thought, from bad working conditions in the Japanese export industries. He is obviously trying to forestall possible acrimonious charges of "social dumping" being brought against Japan. So far Japan remains in the International Labour Organisation despite its resignation from the League; but a serious attack upon Japan in the Conference might make the Japanese Government withdraw from the I. L. O. to preserve 'face.'

Yet another matter of special interest is President Roosevelt's decision to send a strong delegation to the Conference as 'observer.' In fact the co-operation expected goes a long way beyond mere observation, but the question of the adhesion of the U. S. A. to the I. L. O. though not impossible, is distinctly problematical for the present.

CASTE AMONG BENGAL MUSLIMS.*

(BY J. M. DATTA.)

If untouchability is an evil, and if it has to be eradicated, it must be removed both from amongst those who are Hindus, and those who are Muhammadans. I shall try to prove the existence of untouchability among the Muhammadans of Bengal by quotations chiefly from official publications, like the District Gazetteers and the Census Reports, and from European authors of the eminence of Sir Herbert Risley.

Sir Herbert Risley in his Peoples of India makes the following observations:—

"In the sight of the God, and of His Prophet all followers of Islam are equal. In India, however, caste is in the air, its contagion has spread over to the Muhammadans; and we find its evolution proceeding on characteristically Hindu lines."

In another place he says:—

"Just as in the traditional Hindu system men of the higher groups could marry women of the lower group, while the converse process was vigorously condemned, so within the higher ranks of the Muhammadans a Saiyad will marry a Sheikh's daughter, but will not give his daughter in return."

With reference to Bengal, Sir Edward Gait says:—

"In some places.....a class, called Arzal, or 'lowest of all' is added. It consists of the very lowest castes, such as the Halat-khor, Lalbegi, Abdal and Bediya, with whom no other Muhammadan would associate, and who are forbidden to enter the Mosque, or to use the Public Burial Ground. [Bengal Census Report, 1901, p. 439.]

The Bengal Census Report of 1901, Chap. XI §813, etc., says:—

"A striking resemblance between the Muhammadan functional groups and Hindu castes is that they have the same system of caste management. The Jolahas, Kunjras, Kulus, Dais, Darzies, Dhunias, etc., all have the governing committees (k. e., panchayets).

"The panchayat takes cognizance of all breaches of caste customs in respect of trade, religion, or morality..... Among the social offences of which the panchayat takes cognizance may be mentioned the eating of forbidden food, divorce without due causes....., marrying women of other castes (whether of higher or lower rank is immaterial), eating with, or smoking from the hukka of outcastes, etc. The result is that these groups are often as strictly endogamous as Hindu castes."

About the rules and practice of commensality among the Muhammadans, Sir Edward Gait says:—

"An Ashraf—a man of high position—will not sit down to eat from the same dish, or in the same place, with a man who is distinctly his inferior. In the case of Ajlaf castes, the usual rule appears to be that each caste should eat alone."

Mr. Muddiman (afterwards Sir Alexander Muddiman, Governor of the United Provinces) with reference to the Bengali Muhammadans makes the following very pertinent observations:—

"With regard to the question of eating with outsiders, I have, after conversation with many Muhammadans of all classes, come to this conclusion. All Muhammadans are in actual practice more or less infected with the Hindu prejudice as to eating with

* India and the World.

realpatidar.com

outsiders. Curiously enough, educated Muhammadans, while denying that they have any prejudices on this point, probably infringe their own pronouncement more frequently than others. On the other hand, uneducated men freely protest that they will not eat with certain classes (e.g., Shekhs and Jolahas will not eat with the Muhammadan Teli or Dhobi), but in practice they often do so."

The Census Superintendent, Bengal, in his Report for 1921, observes at p. 439:—

"There is no caste recognised by the Muhammadan religion as by the Hindu, and although there certainly are certain divisions among the Muhammadan community, they are by no means the clear divisions of the Hindu caste system.....Yet the fact remains that a Sheikh will not marry a Kulu and in some parts one class of Muhammadan will not feed with another. In Tippera there are Muhammadan Beharas, who carry pakis, with whom the ordinary Muhammadan cultivator will not sit down to a meal."

Sir Edward Gait mentions about 55 Muhammadan castes. [Bengal Census Report, 1901, pp 443 et, seq.]

"The Abdals or Doklas are found in North Bengal, Purnea and Mymensingh. They form a true caste whose occupations are much the same as those of the Hindu Hari.....They are regarded as degraded and other Muhammadans will not eat with them. They may enter the Mosque, but are not permitted to worship in company with the better classes, nor are they allowed to be buried in the public cemetery." [Census of India, Part V. § 819.]

"Bediya is a generic term for gipsy in Bengal..... They are, however, far from orthodox. They are not allowed the use of mosque, or burial ground and regarded by the Muhammadans in much the same light as the Chamars by the Hindus." [Ibid., § 826.]

"The Chik and Kasai are butchers, but the former deals only in the meat of sheep and goats, while the latter sells beef; he also sometimes trades in hides. Both communities are strictly endogamous. They rank very low, and the more respectable classes will not associate or eat with them." [Ibid., § 837.]

"The Bansphors of Rajsahi.....can pledge their wives to other men; any children born, while they are so pledged, are divided equally between the pledger and the pledgee."

The Rajsahi "Abdals serve tobacco prepared in chillums to the people attending hats or markets. They do not go through a regular form of marriage and divorce..... Other Muhammadans do not eat with them, nor do they drink water touched by them."

In Jessore "the Chaklai Mussalmans.....are practically ostracised by other Mussalmans.....Whatever may have been the cause, other Mussalmans will not eat or drink with them, nor smoke the same hookha or pipe." They "live in complete isolation. They marry among themselves, and attend only their tribal ziyapats or feasts." [Jessore District Gazetteer.]

"The Chotabhaia Muchis are another small out-caste community. They remove night-soil and have been outcasted for so doing." [Ibid.]

In Bakarganj "there is a wandering gipsy tribe—Babajias—who profess Muhammadanism, but do not inter-mingle with other Muhammadans."

"The Defadar and Naliya are meat-making castes of Eastern Bengal. The Defadar is considered the more respectable of the two and will not eat or inter-marry with the Naliya.....Both form regular castes of the Hindu pattern. [Bengal Census Report, 1901, § 839.]

The Census Superintendent, Bengal for 1931, says in his report:—"Some of the (Muslim) groups actually found on the present occasion are shown below with brief notes: some are of doubtful orthodoxy and in some cases it is reported that other Muslims 'refuse to acknowledge' them socially."

The names of the groups referred to above are:—

"Badiya or Abdal, Bajadars, Chunia, Dal, Dhawa, Duffadi, Karindi, Kathihara, Culu, Kutti, Mahifarash, Manjhi, Mirshikari, Naliya, Pirkhodali, Punjhra, Rasna, Sanaidar, Sandar." [P. 428.]

It would be tiresome to multiply quotations. If there was caste divisions or mutual exclusiveness before, conversion to Islam has not done away with it. Mr. J. D. Anderson, I. C. S., in his Peoples of India observes:—

"In Eastern Bengal, the bulk of the population is Mussalman. In this region, the Muhammadans are recent converts from the lower aboriginal or Mongoloid Castes, whose Muhammadanism sits very lightly on their habits and consciences, and so far as my own experience goes (he was a Bengal Civilian and as such spent a large part of his life over here), there is little difference between the speech of the lower Mussalmans and their friends and cousins, the Chandals (now called Namasudras) and other indigenous castes."

The Bengal Provincial Gazetteer makes the following relevant observation:—

"The Muhammadans of Bengal are mostly, in name at least, Sunnis. But the great majority are of Hindu origin, and their knowledge of the faith they now profess seldom extends beyond the three cardinal doctrines of the Unity of God, the Mission of Muhammad, and the Truth of the Koran."

From the above two quotations, we can infer the origin of caste and untouchability among the Muhammadans. The feeling is so strong that in actual practice conversion to Islam, which is mostly nominal, has not been able to do away with it.

The problem of untouchability among the Muhammadans is the more acute, in as much as it persists in spite of the democratic and caste-less religion of Islam; in as much as it is more or less neglected in the popular belief that there is no such problem; in as much as the Muhammadans are the more ignorant section of the population; in as much as where it exists among the Muhammadans it is more intense than among the Hindus; for example, no Hindu, whether 'touchable' or untouchable, is refused the use of the burning ghat, when dead.

Mahatma Gandhi, who is respected alike by the Hindus and the Muhammadans, should be asked to devote a part of his attention to the problem of untouchability among the Muhammadans of Bengal, when he comes over here.

A RAMAYANA EPISODE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your fascinating review of Mr. Nadkarni's book you say, in reference to the mutilation of Surpanakha, "I cannot believe that a great soul like Rama was guilty of this cowardly assault on a woman." My remembrance of Ramayana is that Lakshmana (Rama's brother), not Rama himself, committed the assault, though Rama was responsible for it. For your readers' accurate understanding of the incident, I venture to quote the following from one of the books I have on the subject: "When Surpanakha made advances to Rama he referred her to Lakshmana, and Lakshmana in like manner sent her back to Rama. Enraged at this double rejection, she fell upon Sita, and Rama was obliged to interfere forcibly for the protection of his wife. He called out to Lakshmana to disfigure the violent Rakshasi, and Lakshmana cut off her nose and ears. She flew to her brother for revenge, and this brought on the war between Rama and Ravana."

THAT "CARLISLE" SYSTEM.*
(BY WILLIAM E. JOHNSON.)

In July, 1916, as a "war measure," the British Government "took over" the liquor business in Carlisle, England, operating the entire traffic as a government project. Some small drink shops that did not "pay" were closed. One or two "temperance restaurants" that were taken over by the government were turned into liquor shops because they did "pay." The former owners of these "temperance" houses made loud protests at the action, but that is all the good they got out of their opposition.

In order to make the drink shops more attractive, the government spent nearly Rs. 50,00,000 in improvements. Special inducements were offered for the patronage of "ladies," and little children were invited to come and "play," while their mothers soused themselves in an adjoining room. Suet-faced barmaids were on hand to make everybody happy.

After the war, the government continued the same system, peddling booze in "the interest of temperance." It is still being continued because it "pays."

The British "Blue Book" for 1933, giving licensing statistics for 1932, has just recently been printed. The "Blue Book" for 1934 will not be ready till fall. Therein is a vivid glimpse into what the "Carlisle System" is doing for "temperance."

Of the eighty-five county boroughs of England and Wales, sixty-three show a lower rate of drink arrests per 10,000 than does Carlisle. The arrests for drunkenness per 10,000 are greater than in twenty-two of the most drunken boroughs of the country, including such great resorts as Blackpool.

According to the same record, only nine of the eighty-five county boroughs had a worse record of convictions of drunkenness among women. Apparently a whole lot of matrons accepted the invitation.

When the sales of any given government drink shop show a drop in sales, the manager thereof is called on for an "explanation." For it is agin' the government policy to operate any gin mill at a loss.

All this may explain the conduct of every temperance organization in the Carlisle area in opposing the system. These obtuse people appear to think that this government system which results in three times the arrests for drunkenness as private grog shops is not "promoting temperance" very much.

This dubious record of Carlisle covering a period of eighteen years may explain why Lord D'Abernon, who founded the system, turned about and denounced it after observing its dubious results.

It was this same uncanny record that led David Lloyd George, "one of the original Carlisle champions," to turn against the system.

Lord Snowden, former chancellor of the exchequer and one of the original members of the Carlisle liquor control board, viewed the record of the institution with dismay and turned against it.

Because of this miserable Carlisle record, thirty-two Carlisle clergymen and ministers plus 170 local preachers of the locality signed a petition addressed to the Home Office, declaring the system to be a "failure."

Some years ago, the Temperance committee of the Church of Scotland made a personal investigation of the Carlisle System on the spot. The report was of the most damning character. Speaking of one of these Carlisle government drink establishments, the committee reported:

"On Saturday night at closing time 50 per cent of the men issuing from a house in a rough locality were drunk, and 75 per cent of the women from the women's bar. These figures were acquiesced in by constables on duty outside the house..... We cannot get behind the almost unanimous testimony of the clergy and business men that there has been an increase in drinking, especially among women and young people, and that it is due to this 'constructive temperance reform'."

Recently, the Carlisle Temperance League, with which are affiliated twenty-three churches and temperance bodies, unanimously passed the following resolution:

".....The Carlisle Scheme.....has proved a failure as a measure of temperance reform, and has in no way provided a solution for the drink problem. The League views with alarm.....the special women's drinking bars, and the familiarizing of children and young people with the common sale of drink."

The greatest industrial magnate of the Carlisle area is Sir George B. Hunter, K. B. E., D. Sc., the ship-builder at Newcastle on Tyne. In an interview that he had in the Daily Chronicle (London) May 4, 1925, after personally studying the Carlisle System, he said:

"There is more excessive drinking in Carlisle, under the system of state sale of liquor, than there is in similar towns under private sale. There is more drunkenness among women in Carlisle than in other towns. The reduction of drunkenness in Carlisle since the armistice has not been greater but less than in most other towns."

THE DRINK AND DRUG HABIT IN BIHAR.

In his presidential address at the annual meeting of the Indian Miners' Association, Jharia, Mr. Mrinal Kanti Bose said:

"The Royal Commission on Labour, speaking about the condition in 1928, said that the Dhanbad Sub-Division collieries, which employed 55,000 male workers, were responsible for the consumption of country spirit to the value of six lacs and seventy thousand. The licence fees on the consumption of country rice beer brought a revenue of Rs. 1,20,000. Besides there were ganja and other intoxicating drugs. The Commission estimated that the total expenditure incurred by these miserable colliery workers in drink and drug in 1928-29 was ten lacs of rupees. The Commission recommended that the drink and drug shops should be gradually closed in the interests of the industry and of the workers. But we find today that far from giving effect to the recommendation of the Commission, the Government has reduced the price of country spirits, so much so that one bottle of country liquor which was formerly sold at annas eight or annas ten, is being sold at annas two now. The result is that the drink evil has become more widespread. It is idle to say that the illicit distillation would supply the want, if the Government stopped or reduced the sale of liquor. In 1930, due to picketing for six months, the liquor and drug shops were closed but illicit distillation did not supply the demand. You may punish illicit distillation, but why pander to a vice by making the satisfaction of it incredibly cheap? Mahatma Gandhi could not stop the practice, the labour unions cannot. The evil could be brought under control only by State action—absolute prohibition.

"The large majority of the workers do not turn up on Monday for the effect of intoxication begun from Sunday. The collieries have, therefore, been forced to close on Monday. Even on Tuesday the attendance is poor. The effect continues till Wednesday. If anybody wants to see how human beings are systematically brutalized, let him come to coal areas. The workers cannot find the bare necessities of life, but drink and drug have been made cheap for them so that they may maintain an existence of forgetfulness. Can anybody expect the workers to be efficient in such condition? Can industry prosper with workers so debased?"

INDUSTRY AND THE WORKER.

The Eighteenth Session of the International Labour Organisation opened in Geneva on June 4, 1934. M. Justin Godart, French Government Delegate, was elected President.

The President, in expressing his thanks for the honour conferred on him, said he came to the Chair as the bearer of a French national and international tradition that Arthur Fontaine and Albert Thomas had carried on, and to their cherished memory he gladly paid the homage implicit in the choice just made by the Conference.

The increase of ratifications, he continued, showed that, in spite of all obstacles, and in however fragmentary and amorphous a fashion, there was being built up a real international labour code. Steadily and persistently, if not rapidly, the International Labour Organisation had made a contribution the value of which was incontestable to the pacific work of the League of Nations. Further, the system of supervision of the application of the 29 Conventions now in force was steadily being made more effective.

It may be said (the speaker went on) that these are matters of detail and that other considerations are more important at the present time. On the one hand, there is material progress constantly increased by the ingenuity of mankind but applied inconsiderately in the pursuit of gain, multiplied without a real basis by means of credit and perverted by speculation. On the other hand, the political authorities in many parts of the world have introduced sudden changes into the economic order and have substituted new forms of organisation. All this brings into being revolutions which are the more alarming since they do not resemble ordinary revolutions. Economic revolutions are entirely different from political revolutions. They are not set in motion by ideas and ideals but by material considerations.

Although, however, the material element can cause ruin and starvation and degradation, its scope of action is fortunately limited. The domain of ideas is infinite but that of matter has its limits. Whenever those limits are passed industry suffers from crises which should serve as a warning. If those warnings are disregarded, a sudden stoppage results. This is amply proved by the events of recent years. Where are we to find a means of establishing an equilibrium, or at any rate some of the main features of such an equilibrium, which is necessarily a complicated matter? To a large extent they can be found in Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles, which it is the privilege of the International Labour Organisation to translate into terms of international life.

Labour legislation was originally conceived as a system of protective measures. It provided an immediate remedy necessitated by the abuses to which Part XIII refers with justifiable severity. Part XIII affirms that the worker is not a mere economic unit, but first and foremost a human being. It inaugurated a new phase of civilisation, by subordinating the unbridled search for profit to the moral law.

But can it be said that all that is necessary will have been done when the system of labour legislation is complete, when really humane conditions of labour, in the narrow sense of conditions which safeguard the physical and mental well-being of the individual, are established and applied throughout the world? That is by no means the object of Part XIII. Neither its letter nor its spirit implies any such restriction. Its intention is that labour should enjoy full social justice. Social justice is of course established by protective measures, and by the intervention of the law in relations between employers and employed. But both employers and employed are dominated by other powers—those of finance and of the machine—whose unrestricted liberty impedes the rule of social justice. And in this sphere, even more than in that of protective legislation, it will be found that what benefits labour also benefits the employer, who suffers severely from the lack of organisation in industry and from the excessive keenness of competition.

Last year the Conference showed that it realised this aspect of its work, since it concerned itself with the 40-hour week, regarded not merely as a temporary remedy for the temporary evil of unemployment, but as a permanent method of allowing the workers to share in the benefit of technical progress. It is neither fair nor reasonable that technical progress, which was devised to increase production, should result in eliminating the human being as worker, and as a consequence eliminating him as a consumer too, though it was for the consumer that technical progress was originally introduced. Here again, salvation is to be found in humanitarian and moral considerations. It is to be found in progressively setting human beings free for their family, social and personal life; and that liberation, which is a matter of justice, will provide a necessary limit for production which, left to itself, uses the accumulated labour power of man and machines, and gives rise to the grave evils of unemployment and over-production.

The programme laid down by Part XIII is thus one of constructive development. By carrying out that programme, the International Labour Organisation will do increasingly good service to the organisation of production; and by endowing labour with an international system of law, which will safeguard national systems, it will continue its contribution towards establishing the reign of justice and of peace, which are the necessary conditions for the creation of wealth and general prosperity.

RURAL PRIMARY EDUCATION.

The Associated Press understands that the Rural Primary Education Act has been enforced in seven large districts of Bengal and that over 22,000 schools have been brought under the scheme recently introduced in those places.

According to the provisions of the Act, District School Boards have been set up in Mymensingh, Chittagong, Noakhali, Pabna, Dinajpur and Birbhum. For the first two terms of four years the District Magistrate will be the President of the Board and at the conclusion of this period a non-official will be elected. The Board will consist of District Magistrates, Sub-Divisional Officers, District Inspectors of Schools, Chairmen of District Boards, Vice-Chairmen of District Boards and Chairmen of Local Boards and as many members as there are sub-divisions will be elected by Members of District Boards and one member for each sub-division by members of Union Committees or panchayats. Teachers will be nominated and in some cases elected by primary schools. Besides, there will be several nominations by the Government.

The Board will first follow the policy of consolidation in regard to primary schools in the district concerned and then draw up a programme of expansion. The necessary provisions have been made in the budget. The cost of the scheme in the eight districts will exceed eight lakhs of rupees.

It is further understood that the Board for Bogra will soon be constituted.

The proposal for the extension of the scheme to Dacca is being considered by the Government. The magnitude of the undertaking will be realised from the fact that in Mymensingh alone, which is the largest district in the Province there are over 6,000 primary schools and Chittagong has almost a similar number.

THE POONA BOMB INCIDENT.

On the occasion of the presentation of the Municipal address at Poona to Mahatma Gandhi, a bomb was thrown at the car which, it is believed, the assailant thought carried Gandhiji. Gandhiji was not in the car. Seven persons were injured.

Gandhiji was due on Monday at the Municipal building at 7-30 p.m. At 7-23 p.m. a car drew up in front of the building and the boy scouts, thinking that it was Gandhiji's car, started playing the band. Almost simultaneously there was a loud explosion. People who had gathered there thought it was a cracker. They however realised their mistake when it became known that seven persons including Mr. Bhagavat, the Chief Officer of the Municipality, were injured. The injured persons were immediately sent to hospital.

At 7-30 p.m. Gandhiji arrived. He was then informed of the incident. He however agreed to the suggestion that the programme should be carried out. Accordingly the address was presented and Gandhiji left the Municipal Hall at 8-30 p.m.

The police had arrested five persons who were later released on their producing invitation cards to the function. An offer of Rs. 1,000 has been made by the police for information leading to the arrest of the culprit.

In a statement about the incident Gandhiji says :

"I have had so many narrow escapes in my life that this newest one does not surprise me. God be thanked that no one was fatally injured by the bomb and I hope that those who were more or less seriously injured will be soon discharged from the hospital.

"I cannot believe that any sane Sanatanist could ever encourage the insane act that was perpetrated this evening; but I would like Sanatanist friends to control the language that is being used by speakers and writers claiming to speak on their behalf. The sorrowful incident has undoubtedly advanced the Harijan cause.

"It is easy to see that causes prosper by the martyrdom of those who stand for them. I am not aching for martyrdom, but if it comes my way in the persecution of what I consider to be a supreme duty in defence of the faith that I hold in common with millions of Hindus, I shall have well earned it and it will be possible for the historian of the future to say that the vow I had taken before the Harijans that I would, if need be, die in the attempt to remove untouchability was literally fulfilled.

"Let those who grudge me what yet remains to me of this earthly existence know that it is the easiest thing to do away with my body. Why then put in jeopardy many innocent lives in order to take mine which they hold to be sinful?

"What would the world have said of us if the bomb had dropped on me and my party, which included my wife and three girls who are as dear to me as daughters and have been entrusted to me by their parents? I am sure that no harm to them could have been intended by the bomb thrower.

"I have nothing but deep pity for the unknown thrower of the bomb. If I had my way and if the bomb thrower was known I should certainly ask for his discharge even as I did in South Africa in the case of those who had successfully assaulted me.

"Let the reformers not be incensed against the bomb thrower or those who may be behind him. What I should like them to do is to redouble their effort to rid the country of the deadly evil of untouchability."

NOTES.

A Silly Forecast :—Some one who professes to know what is passing behind the scenes has made a discovery. It is that the British Government, faced with opposition in India and in England to the White Paper Scheme and, doubtful of their ability to get it accepted by Parliament without modifications which will deprive it of the support which it has received from Muslims and the Depressed classes intend, on the advice of Lord Willingdon who is now in London, to seek to mollify Indian sentiment by appointing some Indians as Governors of Provinces, one of them, being—of all persons—Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru! Apart from the affront to the intelligence of Indians and the integrity of the British Government, which this implies, Indian Governorships form an important part of the vested interests of the Indian Civil Service whose spokesmen here and in London are not likely to let such a transaction go unchallenged. So far as Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru is concerned, he is the most fiercely independent of our ex-politicians. The circumstances in which he left the Joint Parliamentary Committee, should have prevented an imputation of this sort being made about him. As the chief supporters among Indians of the White Paper scheme are Muslims, the Depressed Classes and Madras Justicites, the appointment of a Hindu and Brahmin will not conciliate any of the three classes. If political correspondents must invent—they ought to invent intelligently. And where is the vacancy?

No Province for Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru :—Bombay, Madras and the United Provinces have been pre-empted for the next five years. Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan is obviously the Indian who has the best claims to the Governorship of the Punjab. The European interest in Bengal will not allow an Indian to be nominated to the Governorship and no sensible Indian will be anxious to have the task of clearing up the mess which his predecessor will have left behind him in Bengal. The conditions which made it difficult for the first Indian Governor, Lord Sinha, to hold his own in Bihar, still exist and have been aggravated by the earthquake disaster. Assam is the land of tea planters most of whom are White men whose contact with India is through their coolies. Orissa and Sind as deficit provinces will be under the control of the Federal Government, and these, perhaps, are available for the purpose imagined by the forecaster. Sir Parsuram Patro for Orissa will be the Justicites' candidate. Sir Gulamhussein Hidayatulla has vacated the membership of the Government of Bombay but has accepted a nomination to the Council of State, so that though out of sight he will not be out of mind for the Sind Governorship, to which rumour designated him long ago. In his speeches at farewell parties he has been preaching against communal politics. Only a fool or a fanatic clings to a ladder after it has served its purpose. Sir K. V. Reddi read the burial service on the movement for an Andhra province in a recent speech at Ellore. Burma is as good as separated and no Indian has a chance of becoming its Governor.

Harijan Sevak Sangh Scholarships :—We print in another column the list of scholarships awarded by the Harijan Sevak Sangh in the current year. They are well selected and distributed and do not overlap the Government scheme, as Dr. Ambedkar is reported in the current Harijan to have told Gandhiji that they might. There is only one scholarship, though it is the largest in amount, for a girl. The Sangh may consider the desirability of increasing the number of scholarships for girls. There is something in Dr. Ambedkar's view that education benefits only individuals, so long as it is confined largely to men. Education of women, however, benefits not only the individual but her family and the whole community through the family. The Thiya community of Malabar, which falls in the category of untouchables, has rapidly raised itself in the social scale by devoting attention to the education of girls. An educated self-respecting womanhood is the hall-mark of social competence and compels respect for the community.

The German Crisis :—When the news of the arrests and shootings of prominent Nazi leaders first came in, the first thought was that some real one in high authority had gone mad and that his pranks would be over as soon as the Chancellor or the President of the Reich was appraised of the fact. Later news made it clear that Herr Hitler himself was directing these measures and that they had the approval of the venerated octogenarian President. Several of those shot were Hitler's closest comrades and had helped him to power. The reason given for their fate is hardly convincing. It seems that a confidential emissary of the Chancellor had been in Paris negotiating for French support to German rearmament in violation of the Treaty of Versailles; and that he had undertaken that the Nazi Storm Troops would be disbanded as the fee of French acceptance of Germany's scheme for raising her defensive equipment. France does not seem to have agreed. Nevertheless, the news of the conversations leaked out and the leaders of the Storm Troops prepared to resist their disbandment. Hitler got to know of their intention through his secret Police and forestalled them by taking action at once. So runs the history. Dolfuss started his campaign against Austrian Socialists in Vienna on his return from a visit to Mussolini. Hitler also had just returned from Venice where he had very cordial conversations with the Italian Dictator. Mussolini is a man of brains as well as action. Hitler has more brawn than brains. The drastic purging of his own party would seem to be connected with the visit to Venice rather than the conversations in Paris. Anyhow, the belief that was beginning to grow that Germany had at last found her true political centre of gravity, has been dispelled. It is difficult to think that the Hitler regime has strengthened itself by these arrests and shootings.

Debt Redemption in Bhavnagar:—The two greatest menaces to the well-being of the masses, the vast majority of whom are cultivators, in present-day India, are Drink and Debt. Of the two, Drink is the worst evil. It degrades man to the level of the brute. It is also a direct cause of Debt. Alone among the Provinces and States of India, Bhavnagar put into force several years ago the policy of total Prohibition and has stuck to it. The foreign liquor problem which has foiled some other attempts at Prohibition, was overcome by the persuasive tact of Sir Prabhaskar Pattani, the Prime Minister. This grave menace to the moral and material welfare of the people, has thus been removed in Bhavnagar. The veteran Minister has now set himself to grapple with the other great evil, Debt. For many years past Bhavnagar has allowed arrears of land revenue to run on. Sir Prabhaskar defended this policy against the criticism that, by not writing off arrears of considerable standing, the cultivator was kept in a constant state of dependence on government, on grounds which in normal times seemed valid for a state in the position of Bhavnagar. In addition to arrears due to the State, Bhavnagar cultivators, a recent enquiry showed, owed a much larger amount to the village money-lenders. Evidently they had been paying whatever they paid as land revenue by borrowing from sowcars. Between the arrears due to the State and the debt due to the sowcar, the cultivator could have little incentive to exert himself to improve his conditions. The prevalent agricultural depression brought into high relief the intolerable position of the peasantry. A scheme for relieving the double burden on the cultivator has been started. The State has paid off the ryots' debts to the sowcars (much reduced in amount), and has also written off the arrears due to itself. It is not clear what measures are proposed to check the tendency of the peasant who finds himself suddenly relieved, by a windfall, of his burden, to get into debt again. People accustomed all their lives to carry burdens on their backs do not enjoy being straight-backed for any length of time. Cultivation is a seasonal occupation and also a precarious one. The cultivator requires some individual or institution to help him to tide over periodical depressions whether arising from failure of crops or fall of prices. The State can be this easily in Bhavnagar, and the idea perhaps is that it should.

A Helpful Suggestion:—The Organising Secretary of the Indian Red Cross Society, in an illuminating review of the earthquake relief operations in Bihar makes among others a suggestion which deserves attention of Government and other relief organisations. She writes: "We learnt that women doctors, nurses and social workers should accompany such units. There is a tendency in India, when a crisis arises to shove the women behind closed doors and send men only for relief work. Such an idea is no doubt born of chivalry but let us face the issue practically. Most Indian women object to being ministered to by men in hospital or, for that matter, in their own homes. In Monghyr many women never came out and revealed their injuries until they heard that women had accompanied the St John Ambulance unit from Calcutta. Only when a women's ward was opened by these ladies could they be persuaded to enter the hospital for treatment."

Hindus and India:—Sir Govind Pradhan and others of his way of thinking do not seem to realise that their argument for the Hindu Mahasabha on the analogy of other communal bodies, rests on a complete misconception of and is derogatory to the position of Hindus in India. The Hindus are not a community settled in India. They are India. Without Hindus, India might be Arabia, Persia or Palestine but it will not certainly be India, Hindusthan. India is the motherland of Hindus in a unique sense. Indian tradition lends no countenance to the Occidental theory of an Aryan immigration through the North Western passes. From Vedic times India is the holy land of the Hindus. Benares was their sacred city when the remote ancestors of Romulus and Remus and the she-wolf which suckled them, were roaming the malarial swamp which centuries later blossomed into Rome. There are Muslim, Christian and Parsi patriots every whit as fervent and devoted as any Hindu. But there is a subtle difference between their feeling for India and that of the Hindu. The allegiance of the Hindu, spiritual and temporal, body and soul, are centred in this land. Maulana Mahomed Ali was a great patriot but when he died he wished his body to be buried in Jerusalem. Vithalbhai Patel was not much given to sentiment but when he died he wanted his dust to mix with India's dust. The official classification of Hindu electorates as General and that of special and separate electorals by distinctive names, accurately represents the historical position; and Hindus should be grateful for it. The interests of Hindus are co-extensive with India and cannot be circumscribed by communal limitations. The Hindu Mahasabha has plenty of opportunities of useful service. The earnestness, sincerity and patriotism of its leaders are not in question. But they should guard themselves against undermining the sense of identity of land and race, which permeates Hindu culture. Our learned contributor, Tatacharya, also refers to the religious basis of Hindu patriotism in his article which we publish today.

Miracle of Goodwill:—The Mody-Lees Pact is now ancient history but how it came about is related in some cryptic sentences in the report of the Privileges Committee the full text of which reached India last week. Mr. Mody went to London a deus ex machina at the psychological moment when the correspondence between Sir Samuel Hoare and a representative of the Lancashire industry had ended in stalemate, "A new chapter opens with a visit paid to England by Mr. H. P. Mody, Chairman of the Bombay Millowners' Association. Conversations had taken place in London between him and representatives of Lancashire during the last week of June. These conversations were resumed in July and continued at intervals down to July 21 in Lancashire. The keynote of the conversations and of the speeches that were delivered at a meeting in Manchester on July 21 was the desirability of improving relations between India and Lancashire by co-operation and goodwill. It was felt by the Lancashire representatives that Mr. Mody had put his case in such a way as to create an entirely new situation. The "policy of goodwill" began to make converts. Mr. Mody had, to use the words of the secretary to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, held out an olive branch—the first olive branch for many years from Indian opinion." The "policy of goodwill" is the great need of the hour all the world over, and the way in which Mr. Mody preached the gospel with such instantaneous effect to the hard-headed business men of Manchester, is well worth learning. The first olive branch for many years was held out by Mr. Mody, we are told. As Lancashire had all along been the aggressor, there is some discrepancy in describing an Indian as having held out an olive branch and that too when his country was in the throes of acute political unrest. An assured share of the Indian market is what Mr. Mody probably held out, which, of course, no one had done before. To call it an olive branch is a highly imaginative description.

The "Hindu":—Sir Frank Noyce, Member of the Government of India for Industry and Labour, opened the Calcutta Office of the Hindu on Monday. The growth and expansion of the Hindu in recent years has been very remarkable. "The Hindu" has a fully-equipped London Office in Fleet Street. In important European capitals too, like Berlin, Paris, Geneva and Prague, it has its own correspondents. In the capitals of the African Continent, in the Federated Malay States and in the United States of America, it has its own representatives. "The Hindu" has its own staffmen in most of the Provincial capitals and in Indian States. Mr. Sadanand of the Free Press Journal had conceived the idea of the Indian newspaper with a news and cable service of its own and editions published in several important centres. The Hindu has proceeded more cautiously. India is on the eve of further important developments in journalism.

Mysore and Prohibition:—We cannot help thinking that the unnecessarily and aggressively pragmatic declarations of Mysore Ministers in the Representative Assembly have more to do with the negotiations now going on for the retrocession of Bangalore than to the merits of the important questions to which they refer. We commented last week on the Prime Minister's obiter dicta about parliamentary democracy as he termed it. An even more glaring instance is the statement of the Excise Minister on the subject of Prohibition. In reply to an observation from a non-official member in favour of Prohibition, the Minister declared: "If the mover of the cut motion wanted that the Government should adopt a policy of total prohibition, all that I can say is that Government do not accept it. Total prohibition is a dead issue. We have absolutely no sympathy with such a policy of total prohibition as an immediate measure. I will be a little stronger and say that it would be a real social crime for Government to abolish this excise on liquor, without taking proper steps to see that drunkenness in the State does not increase."

idea a Committee was appointed to explore the possibility of finding a suitable country to which Indians may be expatriated. The majority of Indians, led by the redoubtable Manilal Gandhi, refused to co-operate with the Committee as they objected on principle to the very notion of expatriating South African born Indians. A minority followed the advice of the Agent General, Sir Maharaj Singh, in the hope that the Committee would find that there was no suitable country to which Indians can go. This hope has proved illusory like all other hopes entertained by Indian leaders in that country.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, JULY 7, 1934.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The Second Round Table Conference held at Cape Town two years ago was a dismal failure. This was clear to those who had followed the history of Indians in South Africa in their struggle to retain the rights solemnly guaranteed to them when their fathers and grandfathers were taken under indenture to work in the plantations of Natal. In order to mitigate the conditions of semi-slavery of the detestable indenture system, solemn assurances were given by the then British Government that, on the expiry of their indentures, Indians would be free citizens like the British who formed the bulk of the whites in Natal. One of the causes assigned for waging war with the Boers in the beginning of this century was their discrimination against Indians. Krueger had not taken Indians to South Africa. Neither had he given any undertaking regarding their treatment in his Republic. As a fact, though there was discrimination against Indians in the Transvaal, they were neither so serious nor so harshly administered as the policy adopted since South Africa came under the British Crown. Though Indian troops did not participate in the Boer War, Indians helped in non-combatant capacities. Gandhiji personally captained a company of Indian stretcher bearers, and he was thanked by Lord Roberts for having borne the General's mortally wounded son from the field of battle in circumstances of grave risk to life and limb. Almost, however, from the day South Africa came under the British flag, a policy of gradual attrition of Indians began. Gandhiji went to South Africa on a professional visit and remained there to help Indians to defend themselves against the deadset that was being made against them by the White people and the Government controlled by them. The battle then begun has not yet ceased. Gandhiji with the help of Gokhale who went to South Africa in the hope of persuading the Government to deal justly by its Indian citizens, was able to get a few minor grievances redressed but at a great price. As the price for removing the iniquitous three pound tax and for sparing Indians the indignity of having to affix their thumb marks to their licences, Gandhiji surrendered the right which Indians had enjoyed as British subjects to enter South Africa as freely as Englishmen. The South African Government grabbed at the concession instantly and put it on the statute book without protest from Indians in South Africa. The Indian people were committed by the Gandhi-Smuts Agreement and the Government of India merely looked on without lifting a little finger to save the indefeasible rights of the Indian people. One far-seeing Indian statesman alone raised his voice in vehement protest. When the news came of the Agreement, Sir Phirozshah Mehta bitterly remarked that they had

"sold the pass". He refused to preside over the public meeting held in the Town Hall to welcome Gokhale on his return from South Africa.

The hope that by allaying the fear of being swamped by Indians, South African whites could be persuaded to treat the Indian community domiciled in the Union with fairness and justice, has proved to be illusory. To come to a definite settlement with the Union Government, the first Cape Town Conference was held. The Indian delegation was led by Sir Mahomed Habibullah and the agreement they secured seemed to ensure permanently the status of Indians in South Africa as an integral part of the population to which the Union Government was bound by the same obligations as to the White population. It was agreed that the standard of life to be maintained in South Africa was that of Europeans, and Indians should be helped to conform to it. Those Indians who could not do this were to be assisted by an assisted scheme of voluntary repatriation to return to this country. There was one word in this clause which passed unnoticed by the Public but which did not escape the eagle eye of Gandhiji. It was the word "other." The Indians who could not conform to western standards were to be assisted to go to India or "other" countries where that standard was not obligatory. As the scheme was one of "repatriation" the significance of this little word passed unnoticed, but Gandhiji instantly point out the absurdity of "repatriating" Indians to foreign lands. Well, the assisted scheme was worked for all it was worth, and several thousands of Indians found their way back to this country, only to find that they could not fit into the social and economic life from which they had become estranged by their long absence from their native villages. The South African Government sent its own emissary to India and he reported that India could not absorb any more repatriates. At the Second Round Table Conference held at Cape Town, in conformity with the terms of the first Agreement to review its working, the Indian delegation was led by Sir Fazli Hussain. Unfortunately, Sir Fazli was ill during the greater of his sojourn in South Africa and the delegation was greatly handicapped by his beforced absence from the deliberations. The Union Government too went back on the assurance given at the first Conference that Indians who adopted the western standard of life would be an integral part of the population entitled to the help of the State to raise themselves in life in the same way as White citizens. The Union Government took advantage of the little word "other" in the first Agreement and the Indian delegation, we are sorry to have to say, weakly acquiesced in the proposal to find new avenues for the settlement of South African Indians, 80 per cent of whom were born in that country and have adopted the Western standard of life as far as their circumstances permitted. In pursuance of this

WAS THE BOMB MEANT FOR GANDHIJI?

The Subodh Patrika, in commenting on the bomb incident, doubted whether the person who threw it intended it for Gandhiji. Gandhiji is, perhaps, the most photographed male person in India and he is particularly well known in Poona. The Patrika suggested that, if the bomb thrower wished to harm Gandhiji, he could not have mistaken any one else for him. The Evening News published on Monday a message from Poona reporting a speech made by the local Congress leader, Mr. L. B. Bhopatkar at a public meeting called to congratulate him on his escape with slight injuries from the explosion. He said that the bomb exploded a foot away from his car and he was temporarily dazed. "Continuing he said that the reports published in the papers were not totally correct. The explosion took place at 7.17 p. m. and Mr. Gandhi arrived at 7.30. Owing to this lapse of time, Mr. Bhopatkar was of opinion that the bomb was neither thrown at nor intended for Mr. Gandhi." Neither the Patrika's argument nor Mr. Bhopatkar's, is conclusive in an incident of this kind. The persons to whom the shooting or bomb throwing is assigned (often immature lads with enthusiasm as their sole qualification) are apt to get flurried and to let go at the first opportunity without regard to time or person. That is how similar attempts have miscarried in several instances. We attach more importance to the mention, in the proclamation by the Inspector General of Police, of a reward for the detection of the offender to two other explosions which occurred. The Mahratta quotes the proclamation, thus: "A reward of Rs. 1,000 is offered for information leading to the detection and conviction of the person or persons responsible for throwing a bomb at Vishram Bagh at 19-15 hours on Monday 25th June 1934. This offer holds good for six months from date. This amount will be distributed at the discretion of the Police authorities. As this is the third such case recently, the assistance of Poona citizens is sought in detecting this and the previous cases for which also this reward holds goods on the same conditions." It would appear from the Proclamation that the Police regard the incident as one of a series.

The opinion is gaining ground that the act was not inspired by Sanatanists. Herr Kurt Butow, a German admirer of Gandhiji, who accompanied him in his recent Harijan tours, questioned by a representative of Hindustan Times, observed: "How am I to believe that the Sanatanists whom I saw in all my tours with Mahatma Gandhi could be bold and strong enough to throw a bomb at him? I have seen their little black flags. They made no impression on me. The little boys whom they hired, generally threw down the flags as Gandhiji approached, and shouted 'Mahatma Gandhi-ki-Jai.' These people could not have thrown the bomb. I see everybody condemning the Sanatanists for this business and giving them importance, but why don't you think that there may be other interested parties at work who want to take advantage of the opportunity offered by Sanatanist demonstrations?" While the responsibility for the offence is still very much in doubt, a high Police official in Karachi informed the Associated Press that, in view of the expected visit of Gandhiji, the movement of suspicious-looking Sanatanist there was being subject to strict surveillance.

A SOUL'S AGONY.

"My Life as German and Jew" by Jacob Wassermann* is the story of a soul's agony. The anti-semitic feeling in Germany has assumed the form of open hostility under the Hitler regime. But it has existed not only in Germany but in most of Europe ever since the Jews found their way to that continent. In Germany it seems to have been specially acute, perhaps because German environment proved most favourable to the development, among Jews settled in that country, of qualities in which the native German was conspicuously lacking. England has been most tolerant, but except for Disraeli, who was after all nothing more than a successful politician, no English Jew has attained the world position of Einstein or Bergson. The English atmosphere seems to sterilise the Hebrew genius. Nearly all the most distinguished names among European Jews were German. There have been some French, Bergson being the best-known. All great European Jews must have experienced the inward agonies which Wassermann did. But they did not think it worth while to brood on them, much less to leave a record of them for posterity. They took it all as part of the environment in which they had to live and found an escape in devoting themselves to philosophy, science, literature, art, or even finance. Wassermann too did the same. "I should have been lost," he writes, "I should ultimately have had to give up all hope, had not two saving phenomena entered into my life: the landscape and the written word." From the agony of soul, he found relief, and even happiness, in the contemplation of landscape and the delight of pouring out his soul in his books.

The Jew who believes in his faith, feels an exaltation in suffering on account of it. When he ceased to believe in it, he often became a convert to Christianity as many German Jews did from worldly motives. Wassermann's trouble was that he had ceased to believe in his ancestral religion, but his racial pride revolted at the thought of perverting to another faith. He was out of sympathy with his fellow Jews whom, indeed, he despised as much as Germans did. He longed to be a German, to be recognised by his countrymen as one of themselves. So far as he was concerned, he had none of the physical or behaviour peculiarities associated in the popular mind with his race. "My nose was straight, my demeanour quiet and unassuming," he says. He was not harassed by the discriminations made against Jews in places where he was not known. He easily passed for a German. But the moment it became known that he was a Jew, he found a sudden chilliness in the social atmosphere. He obtained a post in another town for which he had applied in response to an advertisement, enclosing his photograph. His employer appreciated his work and one Sunday he invited him in a friendly way to go to church with him. Wassermann had to tell him that he was a Jew. His employer reproached him for not having stated his creed in his application and in a few days dismissed him. Several other incidents are described in painful detail of the anti-Jewish feeling which confronted him at every turn. His experience during his year of military training was no exception. Life in the army is supposed to promote comradeship. Wassermann found that this was not the case. The officers were indifferent and inappreciative. To his surprise the attitude of the men was even more distressing. "For the first time I encountered that dull, rigid, almost inarticulate hatred that has permeated the national organism."

Wassermann says more than once that the Jews by their behaviour largely merited the contempt and hatred in which they were held but that only added to his distress. Except for his birth, he was as far apart from his fellow Jews as any one can be. Even his home life under the parental roof was intensely unhappy. His father wanted him to become a prosperous business man and to redeem the family fortunes but he had no ambition that way. A stepmother aggravated the domestic incompatibilities. The boy had often to go without food and to endure personal humiliation. The position was a terrible one for a sensitive mind vaguely conscious of its power of literary creation. Disraeli faced the prejudice against his race in England with a studied insolence which he cultivated from his early years and which became a part of his nature. Karl Marx in Germany reacted against it with volcanic energy and in his fury planned to uproot the system which had anti-Semitism as one of its organic elements. Wassermann had neither the ambition of Disraeli nor the capacity of meeting hatred by hatred of Karl Marx. "I needed fellowship, human influence, social experience, a foothold, an encircling bond. Instead I found myself rejected and isolated in a trebly difficult position: as a man of letters, as a German without social standing, as a Jew detached from my community." Even his books, now recognised as among the best written in the German tongue, had to bear the stigma of his race. Many Germans wrote to him in high praise of his books, but did nothing more.

In his epilogue, in which he looks back with some detachment on his experiences (he was deported by the Nazis and died in a foreign land) he catches a glimpse of the philosophy which would have saved him from his agony. But he deliberately rejects it as alien to him even as the European rejects the Jew as an alien. "At the time of the first Crusades," he writes, "a single monk succeeded in bringing about the massacre or suicide of sixteen thousand Jews in the Rhenish provinces. Why can a single individual work so much evil, while one man alone can accomplish so little good? This is true in great things and in small alike; it destroys our courage. Evil is much more active by nature; this may be the reason; indeed, most of what we call action stands on the border line between good and evil. Perhaps that explains why the wisdom of Buddha is so profound and the Buddhist ideal the farthest removed from action." This is a conventional European idea like anti-Semitism and as unreasoning. Buddha's own life repudiates it. The activities of his missionaries during the next thousand years were as great as those of the Crusaders but never destructive and ever peaceful. What Wassermann attributes to Buddha, is not Buddhism but how Europe has understood Buddhism. But he will not even look at it. He dismisses it as of no use to him. "But I am not an Indian," he writes, "I am a European, full to the brim with my European destiny, moulded by the European spirit." Anti-Semitism is part of that spirit and it must be accepted as the climate, landscape, language and environment have to be accepted. Wassermann groans in spirit. But he rejects the specific which will bring balm to his wounded soul because he is European though he and his kind are rejected of Europe, and notwithstanding their existence in Europe for two thousand years, they are regarded as alien to that continent. And what is "European destiny" and what is "the European spirit"?

The position of the Jew in Germany even before the Nazi revolution has a superficial resemblance to that of the untouchables in this country. But it is only on the surface. The Jew was not untouchable. He had money power. At the worst, he could emigrate to the United States or South Africa which are closed to Indians. In these respects he was better off than the antyajas in our country. But in other respects he was worse. The most frequent gibe against the Jew is that he is a man without a country. The Harijan has a country. The Jew is liable to be expelled, or even massacred, his home life broken up whenever a national misfortune demands a scapegoat. The aversion from antyajas is not racial or religious but social. Panchamas have become saints and are revered as such by caste Hindus. Every intelligent Hindu admits that the antyajas should be raised in the social and economic scale, though he may not admit that their present condition is the result of deliberate lapses on his part. On the balance, the position of antyajas in this country can not be said to compare unfavourably with that of the Jews in Germany as described by Wassermann. The real analogue of Wassermann among us is the Indian who has completely divested himself of all vestiges of his birth and upbringing in order to pass for an Englishman, and finds himself rejected by the latter. Anglo-Indians are perhaps the nearest approach to the Wassermans.

SNAKE IN PRISON.

Last year Mr. L. B. Bhopatkar, the Poona Congress leader who was wounded by the bomb thrown at the Municipal Hall reception was a prisoner in Yeravda Jail. One evening when he raised his eyes from the book he was reading in his cell, he beheld a cobra with hood outspread at the foot of his trundle bed. Snakes not only see but also hear with their eyes. The slightest movement or sound would have alarmed the reptile into striking at him. With great presence of mind the Congress leader sat still for about twenty minutes when a warder happening to look in, called for help and killed the snake. Last week in Dehra Dun jail Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru had a similar experience. The Associated Press account says that, while sitting on a chair in the verandah of his cell during the day, he saw a snake lying close to his feet. The Allahabad correspondent of Tribune reports that the snake was found while the Pandit was resting in his cell at night. The report continues: "The snake began to move on seeing the Pandit and meanwhile a warder came to the spot and delivered a lathi blow on the snake. Pandit Jawaharlal, however, had the snake captured and put in a bottle, but it died soon after." Indian prisons should be made snake-proof without delay.

Sanatanists and the Poona Outrage:—

A public meeting of Orthodox Sanatanists held at Benares last night under the presidency of Swami Dayanand passed resolutions expressing strong condemnation of the attempted bomb outrage on Mr. Gandhi and characterising the deed as against the teaching of Sanatan Dharma. Similar meetings have been held in all parts of the country by Orthodox Hindus and resolutions adopted condemning the attempt on Gandhiji's life as an outrage on Hinduism.

ADAPTABILITY OF HINDU SOCIAL STRUCTURE.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

In this short essay it is attempted to show how the Vedic Hindu society was with three classes triangular at its start, became with an additional one quadrangular later and is bound to take a pentagonal shape in the near future, and lastly to go on increasing its sides as other races and creeds attempt to get in notwithstanding that Manu (10.4) and others in his wake told us that there was no fifth caste. For under the benign auspices of the Mahatma, his 'Harijans' have bid fair to become the fifth caste now, with all the duties and dharmas of the graded castes. But originally we knew only three castes and three asramas as we left the arctic home and moved on towards the heart of India. We knew only three Vedas, Rik, Yajur, and Sama. We took notice of three worlds only the Bhu (earth), Bhuvā, (moon) and Swar (sun); and men passed from this to our ancestors' world en route to the heavenly abode of the gods ever greeting the warm sun-god. And the mystic syllable 'aum' or pranava resolved into corresponding three sound-elements only. Purusharthas also were reckoned as three, in Dharma, Artha, and Kama. When the fourth caste of Sudras, born of the holy feet of Vishnu even as the holy Ganges, was added, it came in with its Dravidian (or Buddhist?) principle of (Nirvana? or) Moksha, the fourth Purushartha sung high by the fourth Veda in the Upanishads for the realisation in the fourth asrama of the exalted world of Vaikuntha or Kaivalya by fixing the mind on the Sardha-tri-matra or resonant elongation of the nasal termination of the mystic syllable. The Panchamas or Harijans will hereafter represent the Atharva Veda as the fifth caste, with its goal or fifth Purushartha of human happiness here below, the greatest happiness of the greatest number of Souls, hailing with the humming sound of the turning Charka and remind the higher castes including the Brahmins that they are no inferior to them in name or end and aim of life.

Now, what is it that has been so charming about the Hindus and their ages-old yet youthful vigour of life as a corporate community, as to invite all else to admire and enter it? It is its highly elastic and accommodating nature and character, with the visible shape as of a pyramid, with a broad bottom and sloping to a lofty pinnacle of the Vedas. From its summit the Vedic light sheds its unique and unaffected lustre, as it from a powerful searchlight, throughout its whole broad-bottomed body. The principles that keep up the light ever burning are now to engage our attention. We know that peoples and nations from the Egyptians down to the Greeks and Romans have perished, leaving the imprint of their name and glory on their dead language and literature or art or history in eloquent or captivating stones and metals. But our story that began at the region of the Aurora Borealis and expanded into a world-wide cultural dominion over which the sun never set, continues to this day to relate itself to the wondering, stalwart though bickering nations of the globe from within the snow-walls and sea-trenches of Bharata Varsha. The reason for this unique phenomenon is to be found again in the fact or fiction rigorously maintained to this day that the Hindu society is ever governed by the pyramidal body of laws found in the Vedas, Sastras, Acharas (or good and valid customs) and conscientious election or satisfaction of the soul (Manu 2.6). Though the Vedas may be said to be infinite and man infinitesimal to a pin-point in the scheme of Creation, yet for the present purpose on hand, we see the Vedic pinnacle shedding its guiding rays of light of Dharma through the Smritis and Sishtacharas down to the vast field of freedom of thought, word and deed constituting our daily karmas. The Acharas or customs themselves are also pyramidal in shape and consist of Desachara, Jatiachara, Kulachara, and Kutumbachara, that is, the customs of the Locality, Caste, calling and family, in other words. And we have had our individual freedom so regulated for good in social, religious, legal and spiritual fields at once, all these four yugas of converging duration of time, by the four divisions of Smriti-writers. They added to the originally three Asramas a fourth one called the Sannyasa or Mokshasrama for the attainment of the new Purushartha. The Brahmacharis minded the Dharma of Vedic study, the married Grihastas cared for the acquisition of Artha or wealth for yajnyas and support of the rest of the people, and the Vanaprasthas or anchorites in forests longed after the Kama-loka or Swarga by penances of various kinds. To aim at and attain the Nishkamya-loka of Vaikuntha the new order of Yatis and Sannyasins wholly devoted their attention. But now we already see the strange spectacle of this order of men, not content with their specified duty of shunning human company and silently meditating God, boldly or in ambition entering on a new fifth asrama or field of public service (once exclusively confined to Grihastas) of acquiring a large clientele of Vedantic chelas and as kings of old eagerly directing the erring people at large toward the path of Dharma. So that our society is now pentangular in every way and the Harijans form the fifth or bottom stratum of the pyramid, which, when definitely solidified and crystallised, would present a five-sided appearance.

Time was when intermarriage among all classes of Hindu society, at least in the anuloma form, made of it a homogeneous people with a tendency on the part of the lower classes to aspire to fusion with the higher by sheer effort on Dharmic lines or by marriage of their girls or adoption of their boys into the higher castes. After the advent of Buddhism at any rate, large classes of the lower strata had to be perforce ranked as a-sat or unfit to be mixed with and a whole body of new rules and regulations came into existence that accounts for the rigorous exclusion of those people, even after reconversion to Hinduism, from all association with the higher castes. For who could say that a Buddhist who recognised no caste belonged to the higher or lower caste? So purity was attempted to be maintained at the enormous cost of homogeneity and consolidation of the nation. Now the same story is to be repeated once over again in the case of the Harijans. Hence arises the necessity for the hide-bound compartment for the fifth caste. The fourth caste would be the last to freely mix and fuse with the new aspirants. And homogeneity is further away from our vision and on this account we have to look for other living and binding principles of consolidation of our society that have stood the test of time and time-worn service. For, such service has been the label of persistent life with all institutions of the world. Careless or popular handling may often make them deteriorate or assume a new or unforeseen form or figure, but conscious attempt at reform or slow and unnoticed process of perfection may effect the desired end. Some of the processes and principles at work all these ages we shall now proceed to enumerate and detail, rather in a general outline, showing old ideas and institutions living side by side with new ones, though not in the same spheres as before.

Marriage in Brahma form having gained ground tolerates Asura form among the lowest classes and finds Gandharva among romantic intercaste or inter-racial alliances and Rakshasa and Paisacha forms among criminal offenders charged with abduction and kidnapping by force, fraud or drug or doping. Post-puberty marriage once universal was latterly driven to the corner of Swayamvaras and thanks to the Sarda Act is now brought back even as the Ganges by Bhagiratha to all people in general. Impartibility of ancestral property fled after partition was allowed and finds its home among large estates, zamindaris, and native states or kingdoms. Gift of entire property originally valid was next condemned and confined to royal Aswamedha or Viswajit sacrifices. The arbitrary disposal of property and unequal division of ancestral estate among sons by the father is now to be found in the modern wills in respect of his separate property. In fact partition was originally unknown and next forbidden; but later on we find it allowed, regulated and even extolled. So, too, gift or sale of boys and girls was looked upon with horror by Apastamba but the sale of girls in marriage was, in Arsha form, regarded as but a fiction or innocent form to be gone through for giving legal validity to the marriage of the bridal pair; and the gift in adoption of a boy has now come to stay notwithstanding the prohibition which has now been held to apply to the adoption of an only son. We know also, conversely, that customs originally respected or suffered to live were gradually disapproved, condemned and finally abolished, such as Niyoga, widow-marriage, son by a Sudra-wife, etc. Unyielding customs were marked out for social ostracism, even as recalcitrant individuals were. We know how the share of the Sudra-wife's son, step by step, decreased among all the regenerate classes until it disappeared leaving only a faint trace in a pittance of maintenance to him. Again life-long virginhood, that we note as history opened, has now travelled through various stages on to our modern perpetual widowhood. Various prayaschittams or purifying ceremonies for erring women were made easier in days and places of Moslem and other degradations until they were abolished so that fallen women are now tabooed and discarded for good. There is evidence to show that marriage ceremonies in certain cases lasted for days, weeks, months and even a whole year for the purpose of getting specially gifted sons by the marriage, whereas owing mainly to financial stringency (which, by the way, may also have partly contributed to widow-marriage disappearing) we see marriages celebrated before our eyes in one day or less than half an hour in out-of-the-way places away from our homes. "Ghataprahara" has disappeared and social boycott has mildly taken its place and that only in rare cases. Foreign travel held in horror, except among certain classes in North India, has now become so common throughout India that reception with Poornakumbham and Vedic chant and music is given to a distinguished England-returned person. Jail-life that was ever dreaded for its consequences in social circles is now courted by the politically-minded, knowing full well that there is no more the sort of stigma attached to it. The minimum ten Samskaras for the twice-born are now but a farce and denied to women and Sudras except in mere form without mantras. The computation of age for religious purposes started from the time of conception in the womb, while that for legal purposes ran from the time of birth. Where two or more different observances prevailed all were held valid provided they were not contrary to the Vedas. Family yajnyas are now practically replaced by temple-worship which replaced occasional open-air communal or group sacrifices of yore. Flesh-dishes once regulated for the Sraddhas have now disappeared from them. Cleaning of teeth as an institution came with historical times and is put in abeyance even now on Sraddha days. Guests could hardly claim attention at nights originally, perhaps due to some curfew order of those days on account of the uncertain, dangerous and chaotic conditions then prevailing. And Varna-sankarya, which kept down with great effort, was at the same time predicted to re-appear in this Kaliyuga. Along with it the promiscuous inter-dining, that is, eating and drinking in promiscuous company that was never countenanced all these ages, has rapidly come to us in all At Homes and tea-parties, in the wake of the present national awakening. Finally "Darma-desa" that was defined to comprise the land encircled by the Yamuna and the Ganges now includes the whole of India, by a process of slow and gradual amendment of the definition. With the world-awakening of mankind being a world-community, the whole globe will be well termed a 'Darma-desa,' or "Karmabumi," over which Hindu culture will again spread its wings and sing the Mahatma's favourite song of "Vishnujanake," to his lofty tune of non-violence, universal uplift of the down-trodden, and a common hobby for all in their own domestic charka.

From the fairly long list of instances quoted above, one may be able to see through various living principles and fundamentals that have ceaselessly governed the Hindu Society all those thousands of years. If some of them met with a deadly blow in some quarter they did so only to lift the head phoenix-like in certain other fields. Time and necessity changed the tenor of their application, or the rigour thereof, so as to allow the society to have an even career along difficult roads of development and progress as unexpected situations arose in the country. But the principles were there all the same and all the time. Like the tortoise in its shell, the Hindus came out and walked about though, snail-like, slowly and cautiously when there was all peace and safety around but retired into the shell otherwise in self-protection. When it comes out again it may proceed in the same line of path or change its course from its original stand. But the process of development is clearly visible all through, so that he who runs may read. Nothing is new to Hinduism and nothing old or worn-out. It is self-sufficient, self-contained. And therefore it has lived to this day and it will live for ages to come. Its peculiar vitality serves to bear all the onslaughts coolly and patiently only to rise again with redoubled vigour. It was so when Buddhism ruled and left the land for good, and it will be so when Gandhism leaves a purer, nobler and stronger country in Mother India, for whom the Mahatma works so devotedly hard and spends himself out in the task.

A JAPANESE MYSTIC.

(BY N. LAKSHMANAN.)

Victor Hugo, in his Les Misérables, depicts the character of an ever hospitable Bishop, justly named Welcome. A convict guest robbed the noble divine of all his silver vessels. "I was wrong to keep that silver," said the Bishop. "It was not mine; it belonged to the poor. Now we will have wooden spoons and forks." All through the history of human race is replete with such instances of voluntary poverty. Men and women of such a type, even though unknown to newspaper fame, are the very salt of the earth. These musings arise from a perusal of Mr. William Axling's interesting narrative of the life-story of a Japanese Mystic.*

The humble origin of this social martyr is soon told. Toyohiko Kagawa was born in Kobe, July 10, 1888. Son of an unregenerate father, born out of wedlock, the unsought offspring of a dancing girl, Kagawa's soul in the earliest dawn of its conscious life developed a passion for purity. We are told that Kagawa took his friends by sudden surprise when at the age of twenty-one he took a straight leader into the depths of the Shinkawa slums. The picture (facing page 41) of the six-by-six hut where for fifteen years Kagawa laid siege to the slums and won is full of human interest; is indeed a romance of social service. In his Meditations, Kagawa says, "I am fond of men. The worst, most fear-inspiring, demonized murderer, somewhere in his make-up has that which is irresistible. Plagued by them, I flee often. I left the slums of Shinkawa for a season because bullies made life a torture for me. Yet I did not abandon those rogues of the slums."

Reading of Canon Barnett, an Oxford graduate, living in the slums, Kagawa eagerly dedicated himself to a life of poverty and in 1914 he set sail for America. During the more than two years that he was absent from Japan, studying at Princeton University and investigating social service institutions in America, three of the girls in his Sunday school, whom he had baptized, were sold to houses of prostitution. Kagawa turned the slum into a great laboratory for social research. "Out of this study was born Kagawa the Christian Socialist, the champion of the under-privileged classes, the daring labour leader and the consistent and persistent critic and foe of the present capitalistic acquisitive social and economic order." He soon discovered that poverty was the handmaid of the prostitution that polluted the slum. He traced the source of prostitution, both public and private, back to the villages of Japan. A contemporary says that if Mr. Bunji Suzuki is the father of the labour movement in Japan, Kagawa is the mother—a wise mother. "Social and labour movements tend to be rough and turbulent, lacking in delicacy, and eliminating the finer side of life. This labour leader, however, was first of all an idealist. He was an artist and a poet, both in spirit and in temperament. He opposed class conflict, direct action and violence..... He strove not only for the betterment of the labourer's lot but of the labourer himself" (pp 68-69).

In 1921 a group of peasants met in Kagawa's hut in Shinkawa and organized the first peasant union in Japan. Kagawa felt that there was no hope for the nation if its rural life went on the rocks. (p. 79) Thus the early days which he spent in building castles on the sand dunes of the Yoshino river at Awa were not spent in vain. He is aware of man's affinity for the soil and says: "I want to live close to the soil; the scent of the soil heals me." A magazine was started, entitled The Soil and Freedom.

In the great earthquake of 1923, one hundred thousand lives were lost and property destroyed to the value of £ 1,100,000,000,000. The cabinet, feeling that it could not cope with the situation alone, set up an Imperial Economic Commission to assist the Government in the titanic work of reconstruction. One hundred and eighty of the nation's ablest men in official life were invited to serve on this commission. The Premier himself acted as its chairman. Kagawa alone was chosen from the ranks.

Kagawa is not only a social engineer, but also a "fighting pacifist." As a result of reading Tolstoy he became an ardent believer in non-violence, when the Russo-Japanese war was at its most critical stage. His was the only Japanese name which appeared on the manifesto against military conscriptions presented to the League of Nations, which bore the signatures of Tagore, Gandhi, Einstein, Romain Rolland, and other eminent leaders in the war on war. Kagawa has discovered the moral equivalent of war. He makes frontal attacks on disease, drinking, smoking, and sexual vice because he yearns "that the young shall be morally and physically virile and valiant."

Kagawa owns himself to be a scientific mystic. "The more scientific I am, the more I feel that I am penetrating deeply into God's world...Through life I discover a purpose even in a mechanical world. Science is the mystery of mysteries. It is the divine revelation of revelations." Mr. William Axling of Tokyo well says that out of the mystic, mature East with its awakening consciousness of social solidarity, there flames a light which the West sorely needs. Even so, the sage of Shinkawa is the messenger of light to East and West alike.

A JOURNALISTIC SCARE.

The Evening News of India of Friday the 29th June bore on its front page in block letters the five column heading "Fresh Attempt on Gandhi." Below was printed the following:—

Following closely on the heels of the unsuccessful attempt on Mr. Gandhi's life at the Poona City Municipal Hall on June 25, comes the news of still another unsuccessful attempt to derail his train at the Kamshet station.

From an authentic source, it is learnt that two iron chairs, (a sort of bracket) used for keeping the rails in position, were, placed at the "diamond" cross lines on both the up and down lines just outside the yard. Fortunately, the patrolman detected the obstruction, and thus a serious derailment, which would have caused considerable damage to the railing stock, in addition to terrible loss of life, was averted in the nick of time.

Mr. Gandhi was on the train. The 24 up-train from Bombay was also due at the same time and narrowly escaped derailment, as both the lines were tampered with.

The river Indrani runs very close to the railway line at Kamshet and if a derailment had occurred, the consequences would have been extremely tragic.

The Railway police are making inquiries.

This was repeated in the Times of India next morning as from its own correspondent with the heading "Attempt to derail Gandhi's Train" in ordinary heading type. The morning paper affects a sober manner while the evening paper is allowed to indulge in sensational journalism.

The same day the Railway authorities issued the following contradiction which was published in the Sunday Chronicle and Free Press Journal but we have searched Monday's Times of India for it with either a justification of, or expression of regret for, making out that it was another attempt on Gandhiji. The Associated Press was informed by the G. I. P. Railway the next day that they do not attach any significance to the incident. It appears that a patrol trolley passing the crossing did not discover anything but later a patrolman discovered the obstruction and removed it. The authorities point out that the obstruction would have been seen by the engine driver as flash lights extend over 800 yards and there was enough time to pull up the train. It is further pointed out that it is a common occurrence. It may be mentioned that the train by which Gandhiji travelled was one of the ordinary trains and not a special train chartered for him.

THE "SUBODH PATRIKA" ON THE ATTEMPT ON GANDHIJL

The Subodh Patrika, the organ of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj, while condemning in severe terms the attempt on Gandhiji's life, says that it is not sure that the missile was thrown by a sanatanist at all. "The sanatanist may abuse, curse, show black flags, hate from the bottom of his heart and misrepresent, but he will not, we still feel it, murder or kill by bomb throwing," it observes. The Prarthana Samaj, which is the Bombay branch of the Brahmo Samaj, is no apologist for sanatanists with whom it has had bitter controversies. "Until the whole matter is thoroughly sifted by the Police and the culprit is discovered and the charge is brought home completely, let us refrain from running down and swearing at the sanatanist as guilty of the act." It thinks that, whoever did the act, was a terrorist and "he must have thought that doing the thing on such an occasion will naturally lead to fathering the crime on the sanatanist." The Depressed Classes Mission Society was started in Bombay twenty-five years ago under the auspices of the Prarthana Samaj by Mr. Shinde who was then its Missionary. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar was its President and took a close interest in its development. Referring to the exhortation to refrain from violent language, the Subodh Patrika suggests that it is needed by both sides. "The failure of satyagraha," it writes, "is due as much to this lack of discipline in thought, speech and action as to the inherent impossibility of using it as a political weapon." It is highly creditable to this organ of Protestant Hinduism when some nationalist papers completely lost their bearings in commenting on this deplorable incident that it should come forward to demand fairplay to orthodox Hinduism which has sometimes regarded it as its bitter enemy. The Samaj from the first set its face against untouchability, and antyajas sit along with people of other castes at its services.

A MODERN ABRAHAM.

The Evening News of India of 30th June published a message from Bhagalpur stating that Sheikh Hanif, who sacrificed his four-year-old son in a Mosque, has been sentenced to transportation for life on a charge of murder. Bhagalpur is the headquarters of the district of that name in Bihar and Orissa. It is a growing town with a population at the last census of over 83,000 inhabitants of whom over 24,000 are Muslims. The Searchlight, Patna, (June 29, 1934) gives the following particulars:—The trial of a sensational sessions case has just been concluded by Mr. Beevor, District and Sessions Judge, in which one Sheikh Hanif, resident of village Shaharsa, P. S. Bangaon is charged under Section 302 I. P. C. for killing his 6 years' old son. The facts of the case are as follows:—The prosecution case is that on February 23, 1934 at about 8 a. m. the accused, Hanif, took his son aged 6 years to the mosque of village Shaharsa, Sub-Division Madhipura, and cut his neck with a butcher's knife, saying, that he was giving "Kurbani" of his son in the name of 'Allah.' As a result of this the child died then and there. The accused came out of the mosque, besmeared with blood in his hands and clothes, and shouted to the passersby proclaiming that he had murdered his son and asking them to bury the dead body. Some of the villagers assembled there and the accused was secured and information was sent to the village Chowkidar who came to the spot at once. The Chowkidar, after seeing the slaughtered child, went to the Dafadar and informed him and then went to the Thana and lodged information. The accused confessed having murdered his son. The accused was committed to sessions by Rai Hardatta Prasad, S. D. O., Madhipura. In the sessions trial, the accused said in his statement: "Beta ko kurbani kis, kurbani dia malik ke rah men, malik jab lone ko taiyar hua to ham dene ko taiyar hua."

The defence case was that the accused was insane. The two assessors out of 3 have given the verdict of guilty.

THE NEED FOR TEMPLE-ENTRY AGITATION.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The following sentence appears in the leading article in the Indian Social Reformer of June 30th 1934: "Untouchability will be removed not by admitting them (Harijans) into temples but to the homes of caste Hindus on the same footing as members of other Hindu castes."

This reminds me of a short interview we had with Mahatmaji on March 9th when he was in Hyderabad, Deccan. A Christian friend in our company put to him exactly the same question.

Mahatmaji's reply was, if I remember it exactly, "My friend, you do not seem to understand the significance of a temple to a Hindu. He would most willingly vacate his house at a moment's notice, but he would not for his life relinquish a temple which he uses for worship."

No doubt a temple is a more sacred place than a house to a Hindu, but by admitting Harijans into temples the personal interests of any one individual are not at stake and Society cannot take steps against any individual, and the confidence that Society may be with him in suffering, if there is any, is there. Allowing Harijans into homes may or may not be very difficult at present. But as with a public place and a private house, it is easier for such a reform to start with temples, where a Harijan goes with the definite purpose of worshipping, than with homes where there may not present an occasion to bring Harijans in and even if they are brought in it may look like a show. And people may have personal scruples too, specially where personal interests prevail and fear of Society yawns. In gaining entry into temples lies the attainment of a higher step by easier means.

Starting with the temples the reform may easily find its way into homes which have got to be penetrated for the attainment of real social equality. Once temple entry is an accomplished fact personal interest and fear of Society gradually wane and quick follows their admission into homes whenever occasion arises. To start with temple entry certainly looks like one of the easiest and surest first steps to reform untouchability.

Sir,

In my article in your issue of the 23rd inst., in the last paragraph, two sentences in the middle are mutilated in the printing. They should read as follows:—
'Not that Aurangzeb had no virtues of any sort; he had some. Rama too had his virtues, which are not overlooked in my study of his character.'

Also in the same paragraph, for 'the ancient traditional' read 'the ancient tradition's'.

RAMAKRISHNA ASHRAM IN KARACHI.

The opening ceremony of the Ramakrishna Ashram took place yesterday in presence of about 75 earnest admirers of the Ramakrishna Mission, in a rented bungalow behind the Sind Tile Factory in the Garden Quarter, reports the Sind Observer.

The programme of the day was divided into two parts viz., the religious observances in the morning from 8 a. m. to 9 a. m. accompanied by Bhajan and Pujah, etc., and public lectures by leading citizens of Karachi in the evening at the Theosophical Hall.

After devotional songs sung by one of the monks of the Ashram, proceedings were opened by Mr. F. J. Ginwalla of Bombay in a short speech, in which he recounted how within the space of 11 years the Ramakrishna Ashram started in Bombay had grown with fine buildings of their own for a library, dispensary, guest house, etc. He also stated that his wish of establishing a branch of the Ashram in Karachi had been fulfilled owing to the generosity of a few philanthropic citizens of the City.

He was followed by Principal Gokhale who in welcoming the Swamis of the Mission, said that the Mission had spread far and wide and the very fact that Miss Mayo deemed it necessary to vilify Hindu culture went to indicate the strength of the movement for the spread of Hindu culture in America, credit for which was in no small measure due to the efforts of the Ramakrishna Mission. He appealed to the citizens of Karachi, especially the younger generation, to take full advantage of the presence of the Swamis in our midst.

Principal Butani was the next speaker of the evening. He said that he first made acquaintance of the Mission in Brindaban and Rishikesh when he found a few stalwart and tall Swamis engaged in the work of affording relief to the cholera and flood stricken people in those parts. The fact that he found the Swamis beaming with smiles while occupied in that serious work indicated that they were not only successful in their mission but that they were spreading happiness and peace wherever they went. Referring to the universality of Ramakrishna Paramhansa's religion and his love of God he felt that an Ashram started under such auspices would not fail to radiate love, happiness and bliss in this city.

Professor Junnarkar in a telling and nice little speech referred to an incident in the life of Sadhu Hiranand in which the Sadhu while still a young man ran to Calcutta when he heard that Shri Ramakrishna was lying ill on his death-bed. Sadhu Hiranand had two interviews with the Paramhansa in one of which, as an unsophisticated child that he was, he desired to visit the country of Sadhu Hiranand. Although it was not possible for the Paramhansa to visit Sind when on this earth, he was glad that it had been possible after the lapse of about 50 years to have amongst us his emissaries to fulfill the great wish of the Master before he passed into Samadhi.

Swami Sharvanand on rising to speak seemed to have been touched by the various references made to his Mission. He said: To the Mission Shri Ramakrishna Paramhansa is not merely a personality but a principle. In this land God has from time to time sent Teachers who not only preached the eternal verities but showed by their example how to realise them in their lives. The fact that such Teachers have taken birth in India from time to time shows that our country is not dead as an entity although it has become a subject nation for centuries. India has still a mission to give to the world. The West has no doubt conquered the East by brute force and has sought to master and domineer it but India has also her conquests to make but her conquests are those of the brute in man. To-day the world needs the teachings of India and that is why great minds of the West like Max Muller, Romain Rolland and others have not failed to appreciate our spiritual heritage. In this task of spreading India's cultural and spiritual mission over the world the Brotherhood associated with the name of Shri Ramakrishna has played a part and at present the Brotherhood is 600 strong with about 120 centres in almost all parts of the world. The great ideal which the Mission has placed before itself is the upliftment of the brute in man to the divine in man.

Proceeding, the Swami said that when last time he came to Karachi, certain gentlemen impressed upon him the necessity of establishing a branch of the Mission. Realising therefore, that it was as much important to look after the work outside India as it was to meet the call from the country itself, he undertook to start an Ashram in Karachi and in his efforts he was very much assisted by the co-operation and self-sacrifice of a few friends who were good enough to contribute financially for the upkeep of the Ashram. He assured the citizens of Karachi and of the province that the Ashram would be only too glad to render any assistance and service to them whenever called upon to do so.

HINDU MAHASABHA AND RESCUE WORK.

Dr. M. B. Velkar was 'At Home' on Thursday 21st to Dr. Moonje, the President of the Hindu Mahasabha Sessions, just closed in Bombay. Nearly all the leading Mahasabbites, including Mr. M. R. Jayakar, Mr. M. S. Aney, Dr. G. V. Deshmukh and Pundit Jagat Narain graced the occasion with their presence, in the Hall of Dr. Velkar, which was tastefully decorated, says Sun.

Two little girls, Miss Usha Velkar and Miss Shrinanda Pradhan, sang the prayer-song and the welcome-song respectively.

Dr. Velkar introduced Dr. Moonje to the assembly as a patriot, serving his country and his religion incessantly for the last 35 years, and added that he had become first acquainted with him, when he was a student, at the Surat sessions of the Indian National Congress.

Dr. Moonje, stoutly disclaimed the charge made in certain quarters against some Nagpur people that they were instrumental in the throwing of the shoe at the President of the Congress. With regard to the Hindu Mahasabha, he repeated the verse of Ramdas that all the Hindus should be collected to form their unity. He said with emphasis that he declined to recite on the occasion the next line of Ramdas, viz., "even death should be welcomed in the pursuit of one's religion."

Dr. Savarkar said the Hindu Mahasabha should do its duty for the country as heretofore. He said nearly 70,000 were Hindus out of the 80,000 in all who went to jail in connection with the Civil Disobedience movement, which, he added, showed the numerical superiority of the Hindus in suffering for their country's cause.

Mr. Navre and Pundit Jagat Narain also addressed the meeting.

Mr. Aney said that the Hindu Mahasabha should concentrate its attention on securing the solidarity and unity in the Hindu fold itself, keeping the Moslem question out of the picture. He argued that the Moslems were so few in numbers that they must needs be appealing to the Hindus for succour, once they were disillusioned about Government favours. He held that the Mahomedans would automatically came to the Hindus when they would see that on account of their own weakness in point of the numerical strength they were not able to fight alone their country's fight in politics.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar, in a stirring speech said: "One of the best activities of the Hindu Mahasabha which was being carried on in the City of Bombay is the maintenance of the Matunga Rescue Home for the Hindu Women and Children. Such a Home is necessary every-where throughout the country, as the Moslems have been chiefly converting Hindu women. According to figures in my possession, I can say that on an average nearly 30 Hindu women are daily converted to Islam throughout the year. Only during the last fortnight, about 11 cases have occurred of Hindu women being kidnapped. Hindu widows easily become converted to Islam for various reasons. It is the duty of the Hindus to take them back. There is testimony available that a number of Hindu women frequently appear before the Bombay Magistrate to admit that they have become Mahomedans of their free will. Under these circumstances, Rescue Homes are absolutely necessary. Our Rescue Home is carried on in a quiet way. Therefore, it is not receiving the attention and the pecuniary support of the Hindus to the extent it deserves.

"The Hindu Mahasabha cannot help being interested in promoting the cause of India from the communal point of view, as the Moslem brothers are working on that very basis. At this moment, when the White Paper is being considered by British statesmen, so far as the question of the 'Communal Award' is concerned, some very influential Mahomedan gentlemen, both nationalist and others, have made their residence in London in order to be handy for consultation by British statesmen on that point, and, therefore, we hear so much of the pressure, being brought to bear on British statesmen to retain the 'Communal Award' in the new administrative scheme of Indian Reforms. I am quite sure, if there were some Hindu exponents of India's political cause present there, they would have placed their own case before those British statesmen, and would never have allowed the pleadings of the Moslem brethren to make any headway."

German Jewish Settlement in Palestine:—Dr. Weizmann has made public the first report on the activities of the Commission for the settlement of German Jewish refugees in Palestine during 1933. The refugees are distributed as follows: 1,000 in Jerusalem, 1,000 in Haifa, 5,000 in Tel Aviv, 2,000 in the smaller towns and villages. Together with German Jews who settled in Palestine before the advent of Hitler, there are today 11,000 German Jews in Palestine. Dr. Weizmann's commission declares that from the outset it was fully realized that Palestine cannot provide a solution for the entire German-Jewish problem. Referring to Dr. Ruppin's calculation that 250,000 refugees will leave Germany within the next decade the report said that one-third, 80,000 to 90,000, should be absorbed in countries other than Palestine.—Jewish Era.

A Tiger Incident:—Accounts of the floods in Assam, show that several whole villages have been carried away. The following incident is reported from Nowgong: The terrible experience of a distressed family, floating in the river on a raft in company with a tiger is reported from Singmari. It is stated that the tiger, apparently caught in the flood, made a dash for the raft as it drifted with the current. The people who were on it were too terrified to make any attempt to drive it away and the animal made itself comfortable for some time and later leapt on to a tree trunk.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A Cobra Incident:—The Hyderabad correspondent of The Times of India writes:—A cobra was found to be inhabiting a club house occupied by tapedars at Khairpur Nathan Shah, the taluka headquarters station in Dadu district, a few miles from Sita Road Railway Station, on the right bank of the Indus. The snake was a huge creature and was a source of great danger to the inmates of the club. All attempts to turn it out proved unsuccessful, it even ignored guns. So a Brahmin, who was reputed to be a great snake-charmer in the neighbourhood, was called to drive away the cobra. The Brahmin succeeded in bringing the cobra out of its lair and capturing it. Elated at his success, he commenced to make a display of his power over snakes, and went about from place to place with the cobra, a close prisoner in his hands, and soon got it, as he thought, tame. The Brahmin then took the cobra to another village a few miles away, where there was a Siva temple, and there, coiling that cobra around his neck, commenced a Siva dance before the deity's shrine. The loud blowing of the conch, and the liberty taken with the cobra in the course of the dance, appear to have injured the reptile's dignity for it turned round furiously on the Brahmin, giving him several sharp bites. He had to be taken, in a precarious condition, to Lakana, where he is now being treated in hospital.

Indian Fascist Party:—'Socialism does not recognise the limitations of a country and in its highest form preaches class-war. Both of these things are utterly unsuited for India in its present condition,' states Babu Narain Prasad Arora, president of the so-called Fascist party, in a statement to the press. He continues:—'Hence, to counteract these two harmful items of socialism the necessity of forming a party on purely nationalist lines, has arisen, call it Fascism or anything else. Its object is "Nation first and above all." Indian Fascism will be free from all the hideousness it connotes in its Italian or German garb. It will preach spiritual interpretation of history, respect for tradition, social solidarity and individual personality. Our Fascism will not be a tool either in the hands of capitalist or pseudo-labourites. It will guard the interests of both and will try to produce the greatest good of the nation by their mutual co-operation and goodwill.'

Mr. Kodandaram to Study Race Relations in U. S. A.:—Mr. P. Kodandaram, Secretary of the Servants of India Society, is shortly leaving for America via Italy, Geneva and London to spend a year in Yale University for studying Race Relations. He will join a post-graduate school of the University which specialises in the study of cultural contacts of different races.

NOTES

Mysore in Mourning:—The Maharani-Dowager of Mysore died last Saturday after a prolonged illness. She had been living in complete retirement since she handed over the administration to her son, the present Maharajah, thirty years ago. During her regency of eight years the State undertook several progressive measures and it was recognised that she had proved herself to be a capable and strong minded ruler. John Stuart Mill who was for many years in charge of the department of Indian States in the India Office in London, wrote in one of his letters that from his personal knowledge the best administered states in India were those governed by Indian Princesses. Her Highness the late Maharani should be counted among these rulers. Lord Curzon, speaking at the time of the Maharajah's succession, paid a warm tribute to her wise and beneficent administration. "As the head of the Government of India," said Lord Curzon, "I have pleasure in stating that the smooth progress of events during the minority has been largely due to the unflinching tact and discretion of Her Highness. If I may be allowed to say so, she has set an example of public and domestic virtue which has been of equal value to her people and to her family and which has earned for her the admiration and respect of all." Her Highness was seventy years old when she died. Her body was taken in a gold palanquin to the cremation ground escorted by the useful paraphernalia of state processions. Their Highnesses the Maharajah and Yuvaraj walked at the head of the procession with faces covered. The late Maharani was a strictly orthodox Hindu lady and the last rites were conducted by the Palace priests in the traditional manner.

The Problem of the States:—We publish elsewhere the correspondence which has passed between Mr. N. C. Kelkar and Mahatma Gandhi on the subject of the Congress actively interesting itself in securing the recognition of popular rights in the proposed Federation. Mr. Kelkar points out that the Congress has already committed itself in general terms to the support of Indian States' subjects in their claims for constitutional reform. He now asks that these general assurances should be implemented in respect of the representation of the States in the Federation and other matters of current importance. From our limited knowledge of the States' people's desires we may say that they are most of them ardent Congressmen and Gandhites though their immediate ends may not, many of them, tally with the principles of the Congress. For instance, they or many of them want the Government of India to interfere and exercise closer control over the States' administration even in what would be normally domestic affairs. Some of them even want British officers to replace Indian Ministers. A few others would even like to be annexed to British India. Congress policy is to become independent: the States' people, while sympathising with this policy and even subscribing to the creed, have for their immediate objective the strengthening of British control over their States. They would view with alarm the withdrawal of the existing control, capricious as it often is. They contemplate independence only after the level of administration in their States has been brought up to that of British India, and not before. They want the help of British Indian politicians to get this done. Co-operationists can quite consistently help in this direction. But non-co-operators may find some difficulty in doing so. But we are all co-operators now, some willingly and by conviction, others unwillingly and by force of circumstance. There was good reason for the Congress and other political bodies in British India observing an attitude of neutrality before Federation was thought of. But it is upon us now, and the old aloofness has become impossible. The situation demands that, if need be, the pace of constitutional progress should rather be moderated in order to give the States time to come up with British India. British Indians are under the same necessity with regard to the grievances of Indians Overseas. It is only as British subjects and citizens that we are demanding British intervention to protect Indian interests. We can support Federation because if the States are not with us they will be obliged to be against British India. Their being with us, however, will have no meaning if their people who are one in blood and race and religion with us continue to enjoy an inferior status even after they have joined their political fortunes to ours.

The Services and Religion :—The Government of India have issued a resolution laying down certain proportions for the distribution of jobs in the Public Services. One third of the total number is reserved for minority communities. Muslims are assured of 22 per cent. of this ratio. The remaining nine per cent is earmarked for other minorities. These also are to be assigned to Muslims if candidates from other minorities are not forthcoming. In addition to this, all minorities, including Muslims, are entitled to compete for the unallotted proportion of jobs. Here, of course, they will have to stand on their merits. In the case of the assigned posts, demerits will be no disqualification : a knowledge of two R's with a fair speed in typewriting, will be sufficient, particularly if the candidate can claim some relationship or friendship with influential political leaders of their own or other communities. In addition to the one-third thus allotted, 9 per cent of posts in Railways, Telegraphs and Postal Services are reserved for Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans on the ground that they are now holding that proportion of those services and it would dislocate their economic condition if pure Indians are allowed the opportunity of competing with them for it. It would appear from an advertisement for the Assistant Auditor for the South Indian Railway that Indian Christians are for Railway appointment purposes classed with Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. The advertisement calls for applications from Anglo-Indians, Indian Christians and persons of non-Asiatic origin. The last is intended to mean not Africans, Australians, or Americans, but persons born and domiciled in India, both of whose parents and grandparents were White persons, as distinguished from Anglo-Indians who are sons of mixed parentage. In the natural course, men and women of mixed parentage will, under the operation of Mendel's law, become absorbed in the white and brown populations but Government evidently do not like the prospect of a single one of India's problem minorities ceasing to exist. The common factor for all the three railway communities, is Christianity. To think that Christ died upon the cross to enable his Indian followers to become candidates for an Assistant Auditorship in the South Indian Railway!

Bombay Y. M. C. A. :—At the meeting of the Bombay Municipal Corporation on Monday a motion to renew the annual grant to the Bombay Young Men's Christian Association was rejected at the instance of Mr. K. F. Nariman, the nationalist leader, who urged that some of the Association officials had been proselytising and that the Corporation should not, therefore, continue its grant. Those who supported the motion including the Municipal Commissioner, Mr. Taunton, did not deny Mr. Nariman's allegation which was supported by other members including the representative of the Depressed Classes, Dr. Solanki. We had been under the impression that the Y. M. C. A. was opposed to proselytism and was intended to work on different lines from the generality of Christian Missions to make Christianity understood in this country. The principle for which Mr. Nariman and his friends opposed the grant was perfectly sound. There is no sense in spending money collected largely from Hindus, Mussulmans and Parsis on an agency which seeks to wean away young men from their ancestral faiths. But in view of the fact that this principle had been ignored by previous Corporations it would have been fair to have postponed consideration of the motion in order to give an opportunity to the officials of the Association to explain their exact position. While on the subject, we may refer to a matter which has been in our mind for many years. The Bombay Y. M. C. A., unlike every other of its kind in the country, maintains separate branches for Indians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans, which has always seemed to us to contravene one of the fundamental purposes of the institution. As there are various communal organisations doing similar work in Bombay, this feature of the local Y. M. C. A., detracts from its necessity here.

Parodying the Gita :—The suspicion that Congress leaders feel that, they have swallowed more than they can chew, is strengthened by the extravagant claims with they put forward for the miraculous effects of Congress candidature. "Give me your worst man," cried Rajagopalacharya at a Gujarati social gathering in Madras, "make him a member of the Congress; let him work with us; he will become as good as Mahatma or any one of us." The tinted glasses which he affects would have prevented his audience from seeing the twinkle in his eye as he paraphrased in these staccato sentences the declaration of Sri Krishna in the Gita: "Api chet sudhuracharo bhajate mam ananya bhak, sadhureva cha mantavyah samyak vyavasitohi saha; kshipram bhavati dhar-matma." Even if the very wicked worship Me, with devotion to none else, he should be regarded as good, for he has rightly resolved, translates Swami Swarupananda. Audacity is the soul of politics. "Be bold; be bold; ever more be old," But the circumspect politician should not overlook the motto on the last entrance to the ancient academy: "Be not too bold." Parodying the Gita on the hustings is carrying audacity a bit too far. China Bazar Road is not Kurukshetra; Lalita Bhavan is not exactly a chariot; nor Rajagopala, the incarnate

Supreme. Mr. Satyamurthi was certainly, no Arjun who had flung his Gandiva on the ground when the embattled hosts of Congressites and Justicites were on the point of closing in a death-grapple with Samuel Hoare and Gandhiji inscribed on their banners.

Indians in Zanzibar:—Our leading article today relates to the Report of the Committee appointed by the South African Government to investigate the possibilities of settling South African Indians in some derelict territory remote from that country. In another part of Africa measures have been passed which, it is feared, are likely to be detrimental to the interests of Indian merchants. When Vasco De Gama visited Zanzibar Indians were established as the principal trading community in the Island. At a public meeting convened by the Indian Merchants' Chamber on Tuesday to protest against these measures, it was stated that Indians were in Zanzibar even before the Arabs. The trading connections of India with Zanzibar are thus of great antiquity. When the British came on the scene in the last century Indians helped them greatly. Mr. Winston Churchill in his book on his travels in East Africa made a handsome acknowledgment of their services and declared that it would be iniquitous to seek to oust them from their position of advantage in Africa. Zanzibar is the principle clove growing area, 85 per cent of the world's supply being exported from that island and Pemba both of which constitute the present Sultanate. The Sultan, however, is a figure-head and the actual head of the Government is the British Resident who is also President of the Administrative Council. The Zanzibar Government has issued five decrees recently, two of which at least are obviously injurious to Indians. One of them prohibits the transfer of land to non-Arabs and non-Africans. As Indians are the only other resident community, the decree is clearly directed against them. Another decree levies a license fee for the export of cloves which is almost entirely in Indian hands. The amount of the fee is Rs. 5,000 and apparently it will have to be paid every year when the license is renewed. The Imperial Indian Citizenship Association has been in communication with the Government of India who, strange to say, are absolutely in the dark about the happenings in Zanzibar. There has been for some time a proposal to have a special Department to deal with questions affecting Indians Overseas, and the Zanzibar incident emphasizes the need for it. The Imperial Indian Citizenship Association has requested the Government of India to depute one of their officials to make enquiries in Zanzibar and help the Indians to place their case before the Resident and the British Colonial Office which is the final authority in the matter.

The Hindusthan Review:—We are glad that the Hindusthan Review will be reappearing as a monthly from this month. Mr. Sachchidananda

Sinha in an interesting retrospect remarks that "it falls to the lot of few publicists to survey after a lapse of thirty-five years the record of periodicals founded by them." In the case of Mr. Sinha, however, the record is a continuous one. There have been no breaks of any importance, except one of five years when he was a member of the Executive Council of the Governor of Bihar and Orissa. The Hindusthan Review, it is understood, still enjoyed the benefit of his direction though he had officially ceased to be its editor. The periodical press has a distinct position of its own which is not sometimes sufficiently appreciated. Two such eminent Indian publicists as Mr. Chintamani and Mr. Kelkar have stated that the periodical press has no place in Indian journalism. As a matter of fact, however, several well-conducted weekly newspapers have come into existence during the last few years. The daily newspaper all over the world, though to a somewhat less extent in India, have become exclusively newspapers while the public have come to rely on weekly journals and monthly reviews for carefully considered opinions on topics of the day. One who has experience of writing for the daily and the weekly press knows that it is a comparatively lighter task to write for the former than for the latter. Articles which would pass as brilliant in a daily paper would cut a poor appearance in a weekly or monthly journal. The Hindusthan Review is one of the very few Indian monthlies of standing and we are sure it has a long career of usefulness before it under the guidance of Mr. Sinha. We hope Mr. Sinha will not take it amiss if we suggest that the yellow cover may be replaced by a more sober tinted one. The volume is numbered LVXI, perhaps it should be LXVI.

Rowdyism at a Liberal Meeting:—On Wednesday a public meeting convened by the Liberal Party to inaugurate their election campaign was broken up by some unruly individuals who shouted Congress slogans. We are sure that responsible Congress leaders would severely disapprove of the repetition of the scenes which disgraced Bombay several years ago when Dr. Besant and Srinivasa Sastry were prevented from speaking. The Liberal Party will not in the least suffer in the estimation of the public owing to the misbehaviour of a few hooligans. Sir Cowasji Jehangir, who was the principal speaker at the meeting, represents Bombay in the Legislative Assembly and, perhaps, the demonstrators intended to show that they disapproved of him. They might have said so in a dignified way at the close of his address instead of resorting to noisy and obstructive interruptions. Sir Cowasji is the last man to resent opposition.

Gandhiji's Fast:—We publish in another column the statement of Gandhiji announcing his resolve to fast for seven days from the 7th August in expiation of the violence offered to a Sanatanist leader who had attended the reception given at Ajmere to Gandhiji in order to oppose the Harijan movement. We trust that the objects with which he has made this resolve will be fulfilled.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, JULY 14, 1934.

THE INDIAN COLONIZATION INQUIRY.

The South African Indian Colonization Committee have in their Report neatly turned the tables on the Government of India. According to the terms of the second Cape Town Conference, the Government of India, it was stated, "will co-operate with the Union Government in exploring the possibilities of a colonization scheme for settling Indians, both from India and South Africa, in other countries." The South African Indian Congress, in a resolution offering its co-operation to the two Governments added that it did so to "ascertain whether there exist any good opportunities for South African Indians in the countries explored," totally repudiating the idea that Indians were to be reduced to a minimum population in South Africa. The Colonization Committee conclude from this that the scheme was to be primarily an Indian one undertaken for the benefit of India's surplus millions, in which South African Indians could take part, and they are particularly anxious to make it clear that the initiative was with the Government of India. The reason for this emerges from Mr. Heaton Nicholls' cross-examination of Sir Maharaj Singh, Agent-General to the Government of India in South Africa:

Mr. H. Nicholls.—We are considering a scheme proposed by the Indian Government itself for the purpose of settling the surplus population?

Sir Maharaj Singh.—I do not know of any attempt made by the Government of India to further a scheme at the present moment.

Mr. H. Nicholls.—You know that it is embodied in the Round Table Conference Agreement?

Sir Maharaj Singh.—Yes.

Mr. H. Nicholls.—The Government of India would co-operate with the Union Government in exploring colonization both from India and South Africa in other countries?

Sir Maharaj Singh.—Yes.

Mr. H. Nicholls.—Now if Indians are settled from India in other countries, surely that would be the financial responsibility of India?

Apparently the Union Government desire to limit their financial commitment in any joint colonization scheme with the Government of India to their liability under the old repatriation system. That, however, is a matter for congratulation to the South African Indian. The Government of India is not financially in a position to start on any large colonization enterprise and, even if it were, it is scarcely likely to spend its money in that manner. If the Union waits for India to act, matters will rest where they are today. It is surprising, nevertheless, that the Union Colonization Committee should have seized on the words, "from India" which most Indians regarded as a sop to our South African countrymen, and sought to fix the responsibility on the Government of India. We trust that representatives of that Government will profit by this second instance of South African astuteness and weigh their words more carefully, in framing future agreements.

With the reassuring feeling that the colonization scheme will not be put into operation on financial grounds, it is possible to read the rest of the Report dispassionately. The Committee describes four types of colonization—assisted emigration, labour colonization, the settlement on land of a large number of people under an organization specially set up by the Governments of India and South Africa, and the creation of an Indian colony overseas which would be chiefly developed by Indian enterprise. Under the first two schemes the Indian colonists will lay themselves open to the same dangers they are now facing in South Africa as soon as the purpose of the earlier colonists in the new country is served. The last type, a colony based on individual enterprise, requires a certain measure of active Government support which exists today in Japan but not in India. The third, therefore, is the only colonization contemplated under the Agreement. The words, "land colonization," in the Cape Town Agreement, as the Committee point out, does not mean that only agriculturists would be acceptable as colonists. They are used there in opposition to the hateful labour colonization.

We now come to the most interesting part of the Report. Chapter III deals with 'Possible Spheres of Colonization.' The Committee in their chapter of recommendations suggest three places for "further investigation," British North Borneo, British New Guinea and British Guiana. The second of these belongs to Australia which has acquired it for "strategic reasons" and it is closed to Asiatic colonization. "Consequently it cannot under existing circumstances be considered in connection with any scheme of Indian colonization." Of the last the Committee observe, "Before any settlement on the unoccupied coastal lands or in the interior can be effected, it will be necessary to take measures to institute adequate medical facilities and sanitary control and in the coastal belt to provide a supply of pure drinking water.....The land in the coastal belt has to be previously prepared for cultivation by drainage, empoldering and irrigation." British North Borneo, the only place left, is hailed as an excellent opportunity for the "larger type of Indian colonization." The territory is governed by the British North Borneo Chartered Company whose £1 shares are quoted, as the Committee frankly observe, at 3s. 6d. on the Exchange. The Company has failed to pay dividend for years and has sought to hand over administration of the territory to the Crown or the Raja of Sarawak. Main drawbacks, malaria and head-hunters. If the Raja of Sarawak has hesitated to take over the territory, it should be a warning to the Government of India not to step in. The South African Indian, so far as the Colonization Report goes, has no place to move to. In the circumstances it is merely a vast of valuable time and money for a joint Commission to consider the question further.

POLITICS IN TAMIL LAND.

That an eminent lawyer like Mr. Bhulabhai Desai would receive an uproarious welcome in Tamil Nadu was certain. And he did. He spoke in Madras, Trichinopoly, Madura and Coimbatore, great centres of civic life. Unlike this Presidency where Bombay is everything and the district towns nothing, in the South, the moffusil has a well-developed public life of its own. Most of the leaders of Madras are men from the districts where their homes are. These four towns are four of the most important centres of public life in the Tamil country. Trichinopoly is Raja Bahadur Krishnama Charya's home constituency. The Tanjore and Trichinopoly area contains some of the most famous and wealthiest temples in South India including Srirangam from whose hoary towers Ramanuja proclaimed his gospel of qualified Monism. The Temple entry question is a burning one here. A Congress candidate who made Temple entry, his principal electoral issue, would have small chance of success. The eminent Bombay lawyer sensed the danger. Temple entry was adroitly flung overboard. "This item of work," Mr. Desai declared, "is an integral part of the Congress programme; but this and other constructive items of work have not been brought under the Congress election campaign because it is considered right and proper to concentrate on the two main issues in order to prevent any misinterpretation of the result of the elections." This is Counsel speaking to a brief not a statesman leading his party. What would the Congress member do in the Assembly if a Temple Entry Bill is reintroduced? Would the Party whip be put on it or not? Would a Congress member be free to vote against it and would he not be told that as Temple entry is an integral part of the Congress, he should support it, although it had been deliberately kept out of sight during the elections? Raja Krishnamacharya is dead against legislation for this reform. So is the Justice Party judging from the declaration of the Development Minister of the Madras Government on a recent occasion. Liberals like Mr. Venkatrama Sastry are against legislation. So is the Congress leader Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu is opposed to the Harijans' cause being isolated from the general good. The Congress Parliamentary Party cannot run away from the issue. It cannot hoodwink the electorate by saying that Temple entry is not included in the electoral issue. The issue is there. It is not for this or that party to select what suits it best. After all that Gandhiji is doing to make Temple entry a vital issue it is rather cool of Mr. Desai to waive it aside. The South Indian is not easily carried away by claptrap. He will insist on the Congress candidate, telling him whether he is for or against Temple entry by legislation: Yes or no? And there is Dr. Ambedkar. In passing, Mr. Satyamurthi should brush up his knowledge of Indian geography. Sri Krishna was born in Muttra which is not Gujarat. He cannot, therefore, be described as a fellow Gujarati with Mr. Bhulabhai Desai. Mr. Satyamurthi may as well claim to be a compatriot of his ancient fellow Saiva Saint, Ravana.

But Temple entry is not the only question on which the Congress Parliamentist—to use a term which a modern German writer finds more concise and convenient—will have to satisfy the Tamil Nadu electors. Mr. Desai went on to define the two main political issues on which the country will be asked by his Board to give its verdict. "As I have been emphasising in my speeches," he said "the only question before the people in this contest is the disapproval of the policy of the Government as to the future Government and of their policy and measures in suppressing the Congress." The policy of suppressing the Congress was from the Government point of view the direct outcome of the policy of Civil Disobedience on the part of the Congress. The two therefore hang together. To condemn the one without saying anything about the other, would be inconsistent with the present policy of the Congress itself abjuring Civil Disobedience. Does Mr. Desai think that the suspension of Civil Disobedience was a mistake? Is Mr. Desai prepared to take the verdict of the country on Civil Disobedience along with its verdict on Government's measures for repressing it? The Tamil Nadu man does not understand how Congress which formally banned Civil Disobedience (the exception in Gandhiji's case may be left out of consideration for the moment) in order to enable Government to lift the ban on itself, and even grumbled when there was some delay in the response from Government, can with decency utilise the hard purchased freedom to condemn the Government policy which it admitted to be justified when it formally relinquished Civil Disobedience which called it forth. If the Congress had not made its submission, it would have the clearest right to appeal to the country against the repressive policy of Government. Gandhiji liberated from prison before the expiry of his sentence considers himself a prisoner until the actual date when his sentence would expire. The Congress liberated from the ban on it, talks of fighting Government which liberated it. The Tamil man wonders if it can be serious.

There is little space left to comment on the first electoral issue as enunciated by Mr. Bhulabhai, namely, the future Government of India. Whether one likes it or not there is the White Paper Scheme. Holding the Round Table Conference in London was a great mistake. The Reformer protested against it as it deprecated Gandhiji's acquiescing in it by attending the Second R. T. C. It is too late now to wish it had not been held. Congress, the Muslims, the non-Brahmins, the Depressed Classes (Harijan sounds satirical as a name for a people whom God would seem to have forgotten), Princes, were all there. They were all participants in the proceedings. Gandhiji made several suggestions some of which have been embodied in the White Paper. The Communal Award was invited by all the delegates including the Congress leader. It was modified at the request and suggestion of Gandhiji, Malaviyaji and other Congress leaders who were not then in prison as also by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Mr. Jayakar and Pandit Hridayanath Kunzru on behalf of the co-operationists. If you want to make the Scheme an issue in the elections, you must place your alternative plan before the electors. You can not ask for a blank cheque and the Tamil Nadu at least will not give you one seeing that your experiments with the political fortunes of the country, have totally failed as you yourselves have been obliged to acknowledge. Once bit, twice shy. You had a good scheme—the Nehru scheme. You scrapped it at the first show of opposition from Sikhs and Muslims. What have you got now? The resolutions of Lahore and Karachi Congresses which have been modified beyond recognition by Gandhiji's inspired oracles from time to time and the Working and All-India Committees? The country does not wish to be made the victim of another experiment. Congress men may be angels without wings but, for God's sake, let us follow men who, if they had not made Himalayan pretensions, have not made Himalayan failures either.

THE CHASTENING ROLE OF HINDU PRINCIPLE OF GIFT.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

The much-maligned Brahmin has not escaped the scathing remarks of eminent scholars and legal luminaries like Mayne, who have been chiefly responsible for lesser men slinging mud at the poor fellow. One feels certain that they must have taken their cue from the low and pitiable depths of his present fall. Mayne says in Article 434 of his valuable book on Hindu Law and Usage, 'Gifts for religious and charitable purposes were naturally favoured by the Brahmins, as they are everywhere by the priestly class.' In Article 435 'It is probable that as Brahmanical acuteness favoured family partition as a means of multiplying family ceremonies, so it fostered the testamentary power as a mode of directing property to religious uses, at a time when the owner was becoming indifferent to its secular application.' Again in article 376, 'Gifts have been always favoured by the Brahmin lawyers, for the obvious reason that they were generally made to Brahmins.' This is typical enough. We shall presently see how grievously they have all gone wrong in their estimate of the part played by the Brahmin in his services to the society in which he moved and had his being ever since the body of laws governing us to-day first came into existence.

To go straight to the matter at once, it was the unique conception of the principle of gift that is, gift for gift's sake, that has been responsible, more than any other legal conception or idea, for the chastened and perfected system of Hindu Jurisprudence. Let us take the field of Marriage and note how chaotic the condition was when eight forms of marriage were prevalent somewhere or other in the body-politic before an attempt at reform comes to be thought of and uniformity viewed on the highest and soundest line of Kanya-dana, most agreeable to the genius of the people. The Paisacha and Rakshasa forms were first penalised, Asura condemned, and Gandharva discouraged, while Arsha, Prajapatya, and Daiva gave in before the advancing Brahma type. All the kinds of marriage ultimately ended in a formal samskara with homa, etc., if only for the purpose of legitimising the issue to be born, but they differed from one another in the contractual or other origin of the relationship between the bridegroom and bride's party involving different degrees of consent. Paisacha that began by silent rape on a sleeping or doped girl was the worst and ended in wedlock at the point of social compulsion if only in defence of her honour and future. It was the worst kind as involving no consent and no knowledge at the first act. Rakshasa started by kidnapping or abduction under force or duress and ended in forced marriage. Here we see knowledge but no consent. Asura was nothing short of a purchase of the bride by the highest bidder in bribing off her parents' consent. Gandharva usually originates when the girl in her blind or overpowering love elopes with her lover and thinks of her parents' formal consent for the marriage, as Sakuntala did, for legalising the possible issue. The Asura was attempted to be reformed by the introduction of the Arsha wherein the mere form of sale was gone through by passing a couple of cows or cloths of nominal value to the bride's party as in the Roman Mancipio, when the Sudra bride married into the higher caste. The Prajapatya was the form of marriage with a condition tacked on that man and wife should ever invariably join in all acts of Dharma, temporal and spiritual, a condition which was very irksome but secured the parents' consent and satisfaction. Daiva was practically in token of gratitude for or consideration of the bridegroom's services at the sacrifice, as a part of the dakshina or fees due for his pains of officiating at which he received the bride. But the Brahma form involves all love and no consideration inferior to love pure and simple. It is a gift for gift's sake of a beloved daughter in marriage to a worthy lover for living in the midst of an ocean (viz., children) of love. The latter four kinds of approved forms were offered in the place of the other lower and condemned types for the purpose of redeeming the people to a higher social level of civilization. Should the Brahmin be damned for this herculean effort? One easily sees how the principle of gift was implemented in the sacred cause.

Let us next take the field of adoption or representative sonship for our survey. There were a dozen ways in which a sonless man or a man who wanted more sons than any born of his loins could think of getting secondary sons. For our present purpose the son bought and the son given in love in adoption will do. The one stood very high in the list and the other very low. Apastamba's cry against both was in wilderness, as was his cry in favour of re-admission of Patitas' and Panchamas' children soon after they could be separated from their parents. No doubt the son bought slowly went down the list of preferable heirs. But he did not apparently disappear except along with the rest before the onward and upward march of the son given, who today stands in the shoes of the son born in lawful wedlock practically all alone. But it must be admitted that the principle of the redeeming and chastening gift has had in rigorous application both an intended and an unforeseen result. Both the girl "given" in marriage and the boy "given" in adoption, after undergoing the respective and necessary samskara with homa etc., and taking the new gotra of the family entered by the marriage or adoption, once for all ceases to be subject to the original dominion of their (natural) parents who cannot again give them in a second adoption, or marriage. And Manu (9'47) says that partition, gift in marriage, and all promises are with the ideally good people done only once and are not backed out of. Moreover the samskara homa creates an irrevocable status out of the previously existing contractual relationship which becomes merged and extinguished in the birth of the new status. Hence widow-marriage or remarriage has been an unforeseen impossibility. And Yagnyavalkya (2'178) and Vasishtha (15'3 & 4) condemn the gift of son and wife, especially eldest or only son. And this applies to born and adopted sons as well. Hence the married girl's and the adopted boy's position in the family is unalterable after the event, unless there be law or custom to the contrary. Subject to this aspect, the principle of gift in the field of secondary sonship has worked marvellously well, at the hands of the penniless and ever-needy Brahmin. What had he to gain in such gifts?

Then let us examine the Charitable Endowments, that are, along with most of the Religious Endowments, termed with the technical expression "Poortas" or leading to moksha as opposed to "Lhta" or purely religious and leading to Swarga and comprising Yagas and Yajnyas. The former class includes gifts for public use of tanks, wells, hostels, hospitals, dispensaries, gardens, rest-houses, choultries, libraries, playgrounds, etc. This includes also funds for the periodical repairs, replenishments, and sustained upkeep of the same charities. This includes again secular trusts for schools, and religious trusts for temples or mutts. It is clear that in all 'Poortas' not the Brahmin alone but all castes and in fact all humanity is entitled to share the benefit. Even in temples it is common knowledge that all classes of Hindus including the Harijans participate in the benefits and in (running them for) the stipulated or established or usual emoluments for various services rendered in and out of the temples, in which emoluments and wages the lions' share of the annual income is consumed. What is left for the Brahmin archakas, and Veda-patakas and 'naivedyam' or food offered to the deity and distributed among Brahmins and the rest in Goshti or audience is practically insignificant and may not amount to four or five per cent of the annual expenditure. Again, gifts for renovation of the above religious and charitable endowments, called Jirnoddhara, share the character of the endowments renovated. But if Veda-pathasalas were endowed, Brahmins alone no doubt benefit by prescription of the Sastras. How are they otherwise benefited by the innumerable endowments to the exclusion of other classes of people?

Lastly we come to the class of Gifts that again fall into two groups, Brahmic and Younic, that is to say, higher and lower. The lower are various private or petty charities to the poor, blind, sick, distressed, incapacitated, destitute, hungry and thirsty people, comprising all classes and kinds relating to the relief of the lower self or natural defects, and needs. The higher or Brahmic kinds relate to the promotion of actual devotion to spiritual advancement and religious worship of Brahmins in their own independent or individual capacity; such as gift of Saligrams and idols, pilgrim's fare, samskara expenses, including upanayana and marriage expenses, sradda and funeral expense, yaga and yajnya expenses, in fact such as would be inevitably incurred in preparing the Brahmin for his prescribed duties in life and in society. This Brahmic gift alone of all others is extolled to the skies as being most disinterested and conducive to special and general welfare. Even here the Brahmin does not materially benefit but only spiritually as does the society too through him, because the money for the expenses is consumed in the samskara of other actual purpose concerned. At best the Brahmin can be understood to gain materially when he is given land, or house, and cows and gold or other money, but this is a tithe of one per cent or two of the donor's estate, which he donates not under pressure or wily or dishonest suggestion of the Brahmin but mostly out of his own innate faith in the efficacy of the gift, or inward satisfaction of his soul.

There is a class of gift standing alone by themselves for which the heart of Hinduism ever throbs with unique strength and partiality. They are refuge or protection of life offered to a man in instant danger from his enemy and release from bondage or slavery or constraint of debts on the one hand; and on the other the offer of means of instant or ultimate Moksha or realisation of Godhead or 'Bhara-nyasa' or 'Prapatti' as it is commonly known, and offer of all fruit of Karma, good, bad, and indifferent to God himself or to one's own foe or friend through God.

Gifts were divided into three groups, Satvic, Rajasic, and Tamasic according to prescribed quality and effect in the next birth; or superior, medium, and inferior according to the subject-matter of the gift; or permanent, recurring, occasional, and specifically prescribed according as gifts are dedicated to public use, disinterested or dependants' use, auspicious or rare occasions, and desired or courted objects. There is also an essentially Hindu classification into four groups according as the donee is sought after, invited, expected to beg, or rewarded for some service in return before gift is actually made, as being characteristic of the four yugas,

A gift implies six things :—donor, donee, intention, subject-matter of gift, time and place of gift. A donor should not be a minor, insane, intoxicated, mistaken or defrauded, or incompetent to alienate. If given in anger, fear, hate, anguish, extreme illness, or under the influence of any vice or distress, old age or dotage, joke or sport, or under pressure of bribes, duress, force, fraud or deceit, or an irrelevant gift, all these are ab initio null and void (Narada, Chapter 7-9-10; Manu, 8:163-165, & 168). How is, then, Mayne justified in his charge of unscrupulousness against Brahmin donees and Brahmin lawyers when they have to steer clear of so many vitiating circumstances?

A donee in a Brahmic gift is required to be well-versed in Vedic lore, and bent on doing penance and other austerities of religious and spiritual nature and taking his firm stand on high character and conduct. This rule we find on every page of all Rishis who have anything to say on gift to Brahmins, who are also at the same time forbidden to receive any gifts lest their Brahmic storage should wane away and asked to do prayaschittam or rigorous penance for receiving anything of the nature of gifts, and in one place they are asked to preferably starve for three days together before thinking of receiving any gifts to the extent of sustaining them for more than the day only. They finally lay it down that poverty and non-receipt of gifts weigh more with good Brahmins than the whole empire's resources as and for gift, as the former generates contentment and happiness, and the latter only mixed feelings of care, worry, discontent, and what not.

Intention for gift may be pure and simple and may be to benefit oneself, or the donee, or disinterested and in simple obedience to Sastras, and to please God and none else. This is the highest type of sentiment associated with gift which is unique in Hindu society. And the subject-matter again should never be entire property while family to support exists, and wife or son could not be gifted away, nor property over which there is no ownership or power of disposition. (Nar. 7-4-5).

Certain places of pilgrimage or holy shrines are supposed to enhance the merit of gifts and certain days of the year or occasions are ear-marked for such gifts such as solar or lunar eclipses, New year days, etc., as being holy with the gods or ancestral manes. Here it is a question of faith, means, and circumstances that determine the gift and not the wily persuasion or unscrupulousness of the Brahmin that is responsible for the same.

Now then, on a full clear consideration of the whole matter one may see how undeserved the reproach of the Brahmin is when there are ample grounds to believe that they are eminently to be thanked for the restraint upon themselves and for the real and outstanding services by precept and example to the society in which they moved and for the spirit in which they worked for the general uplift of the masses at an eminent sacrifice and in all sincerity of higher purpose in this life and life to come. We also see how this institution of gift even when ear-marked as mainstay of life for Brahmins, was the mother of reform and cradle of progress all these two or three thousands of years in the history of India. If there was a tendency on the part of joint Hindu families to disintegrate in the wake of a universal evolution towards individualistic citizenship in the place of family-corporations as units of a political state, why of all places in the world it should in India be laid at the door of the priestly class of Brahmins that they were responsible for multiplying family partitions, passes the comprehension of an ordinary student of social and political institutions of the world, with special reference to India. It is nothing but deep prejudice or contagion thereof that blinds the true eye for real facts, however eminent one may be for learning and other attainments. An original and independent study and anxious research at the original sources of knowledge will help a great deal in the dispassionate weighing of all available materials on hand and lead to a balanced and correct estimate and conclusions. Scholars are after all human beings with human failings and no useful purposes is served by passing current their own prejudice and coloured visions or versions as true history. We have much to learn from Europeans, no doubt, but we have also much to unlearn in our own eternal interests. Or else we shall soon cease to be true to our forefathers and lose our own independent identity as a race or a nation.

PROHIBITION REPEAL A FAILURE.

What has Repeal accomplished to date? Has it destroyed the bootleggers, as the "wets" promised? asks "Unity" (Chicago). Not if the United States Government knows anything about it, for Washington has recently announced "a nationwide campaign" for the elimination of bootleggers and illicit distillers, and Joseph H. Choate, Jr., Federal Alcohol Control Director, confessed his horror at the "enormous growth" of the lawless traffic. Has it wiped out the speak-easies and night clubs? Not according to Police Commissioner O'Ryan, of New York City, who has declared that he proposes to make war on the speak-easies just as soon as the licensing business is straightened out. Has it kept the saloon closed, as was agreed by everybody, "wet" and "dry" alike? Not if the newspaper reporters can be trusted, for they join in testifying "how enthusiastically the old time open saloon has come back in New York," and similarly in other places. Has it cut down drunkenness and fostered temperance? It is the report of every honest observer, and especially of a rapidly increasing number of frightened city and town officials, that drunkenness is increasing by leaps and bounds. We can testify that we have seen more "drunks" in the last six months than in the preceding twelve years. Has it achieved that most disgusting and disgraceful boon, the filling of the government tills with revenue from the liquor traffic? In New York State it has just been announced that the revenue from this poisoned source is less than one-half of what was estimated; and the result is attributed to the continuing consumption of lawless booze. In a few swift months, Repeal has proved itself to be a complete and perfect failure, as everybody who remembered the old days well knew in advance. Compared with what is going on today, Prohibition was never "a noble experiment" at all, but a triumphant demonstration. Already local voters are voting their territories "dry." Thus shall we live over again our history, until Prohibition is once more re-enacted.

Caste Leaders and the Sarda Act :—At a meeting of the barbers of Mohiri Taluk, the caste-heads of four Muthas have resigned their Beharaship on the ground that they cannot be heads of a community that indulges in violation of the Sarda Act. So far, none has dared to come forward to accept the posts now lying vacant. "Sundies," a toddy-sellers' community, held a conference at Ichapur and passed a resolution opposing the performance of child marriages and requesting their caste-heads not to accord sanction to such marriages.

INDIAN COLONISATION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

(BY V. S. SRINIVASA SASTRI.)

The Committee whose report has just been published, included an Indian of undoubted public spirit and patriotism, Mr. S. R. Naidu, and he has signed it along with others. We may therefore expect the report to state the facts fairly and to make recommendations favourable to the Indian community. This expectation is fulfilled in a great measure. The Committee state expressly what is commonly ignored, namely, that investigation of (likely) countries is to be jointly by the Government of India and the Union Government and that the resulting scheme, if any, should be for the benefit of Indians alike from this country and from South Africa. To put it in another and perhaps clearer way, the scheme as conceived by the Round Table Conference of 1932 is for the two countries together and not for South Africa only.

The Committee likewise admit that the Indian community are in acute economic distress accentuated by the White Labour policy now in vogue in the Union. Are the Government of India now in a position to join in a large inquiry into the conditions obtaining in North Borneo, New Guinea and other countries mentioned in the report? Is it possible for them to encourage and foster the large colonisation scheme for their nationals? Is public opinion likely to favour a novel project of this nature? Is the financial condition of the country such as to justify any considerable outlay in this direction? None of these vital questions can be answered in the affirmative. I cannot think that the Government of India is likely to take their part in the issue of a Joint Committee of Inquiry. If so, the inquiry and the resulting scheme could be undertaken only by the Union Government acting on their own.

If they decide to pursue the matter by themselves what should the Indian community do? It is a tremendous responsibility to give advice in hypothetical conditions. It must be remembered that when the Preliminary Committee that has just reported was first appointed, the South African Indian Congress gave its co-operation only because in decisive stages of the matter the India Government were also to take their full share. If, owing to the peculiar conjunction of circumstances in this country, our Government find themselves unable to fulfil their original undertaking, our countrymen there will be fully justified in completely revising their attitude. Above all, they must consider the nature of the colonisation scheme and the irreducible requirements thereof. These are adequate financial assistance to intending immigrants and the ability and willingness of their Government to look after them and their welfare in new lands which they colonised. The position is accepted in this report that the present Indian population is eighty per cent colonial born. If the Union Government having the interests of this community at heart promote the scheme of colonisation abroad for them, they must be prepared not only to provide intending emigrants with initial capital but to watch their progress anxiously and step in at every stage to solve their difficulties and relieve their suffering by advice, exercise of diplomatic influence and other such steps. Is it conceivable that the Union Government would take up this attitude of fatherly protection? If they were likely to do so in the least, they would not be anxious to get rid of them, and we should not have heard of this Committee or of its report. It does not seem to me to be probable that even if the Union Government seriously contemplated the scheme of colonisation, the Indian community would look upon it with any favour. In the result, the Union Government, baulked in this attempt, may fall back on their old policy, which has kept alive for so many years the feeling of animosity between the races. The two Governments will once more have to consult together and explore afresh whatever avenues there may be of reconciliation. The prospects are by no means bright.

Two circumstances, somewhat germane to the subject, may finally be mentioned, one favourable and the other unfavourable. Mr. Hoffmeyer, the present Minister of the Interior in the Union Government, has given proof of courage and magnanimity in his treatment of the Indian question and his influence is likely to be exerted on the side of fair play. On the other hand, the present India Office, which seems to be tightening its hold on the Government of India, has not shown itself over-friendly to the Indian cause. We have not had time to forget that it has seriously proposed to deny in the new Constitution the right of retaliation to the Government of India when they find their nationals not well-treated in other parts of the Empire.

II.

(BY SIR KURMA REDDI.)

The possibility of land settlement for South African Indians in foreign lands was contemplated even in the Cape Town Agreement of 1927. Nothing, however, materialised during the next five years. The question naturally cropped up at the Conference of 1932 and representatives of the two Governments agreed to a joint investigation of the possibilities of a colonisation scheme. A perusal of the present report leaves the impression that its authors are of opinion that the said investigation was primarily intended for settling Indians from India. This is a mistake. It was intended equally, for the benefit of South African Indians; secondly what was intended was an investigation, jointly by both Governments. The present report is the result of what is called a preliminary investigation by the nominees of the Union Government only. It is a matter for gratification that one of the members of the Committee is an Indian gentleman of high character of Peter Maritzburg in Natal. The Committee, no doubt, took great pains and did their best but, here, in India, our countrymen naturally feel that if they are to accept any colonisation scheme, it must be the result of an investigation made by the Government of India. The time when such an investigation is to be made will have to be determined by that Government, in view of their financial condition and pressure of other and more important calls on their time and energies. They alone can judge as to when this country can take advantage of any colonisation scheme that may be decided upon their own enquiries. They will, I am sure, co-operate with the Union Government, if the latter insists upon India joining them in such an enquiry, but the present is undoubtedly not the time for that enquiry considering that great constitutional changes are impending and the depression, which has been passing over the country, shows yet no signs of lifting. If, however, a joint investigation is decided upon and a scheme results therefrom, which might be agreeable to both the Governments, one would honestly advise our people in South Africa not to view the scheme with any suspicion but to consider it on its merits.

I think I can make bold to assure them that India will never consent to any scheme which has any implication that South African Indians are undesirable. We, at this end, feel on that point as strongly as they at the other but our people in South Africa ought not to ignore their economic conditions. It is a fact that hundreds of Indians are turned out of Government, Railway and municipal employments in order to give effect to the Poor White policy and it is a fact too that Indians are sent out of sugar and other plantations and coal mines and that Bantus are taking their place and consequent unemployment of Indians will have to be faced. These measures are unjust and every endeavour will be made by the Government of India and the Indian public to reduce if not remove these economic disabilities of Indians in South Africa. Even if we met with some success in these endeavours, the problem of providing opportunities for their talents and ambitions will not have been solved. If they want a fuller life and room for their activities and scope for exercising their abilities, fresh fields and pastures green must be found. It is with this idea in our minds that we agreed in Cape Town to a joint investigation. We also prescribed that any emigration to those "fresh fields" should be absolutely voluntary and that there should be no coercion of any kind.

I must say that India will not accept as an eternal truth the dictum of the Committee that "it is too late in the day for India to become a competitor in colonisation with western powers in more settled parts of the world and therefore the appropriate field for Indian colonisation must be sought in countries which to a great extent, are still in a primitive stage." The old theory of "first come, first served" is fast giving place to the new policy "to each nation according to its needs." There are many countries whose people have no breathing space and, on the other hand, there are vast expanses in other countries which required development and which cannot be developed except with cheap labour from other countries. It will be the endeavour of mankind to eradicate racial frontiers and make them realise that there can be only one race, the human race, on the surface of this earth of ours.

Nor can India consent to allow the lot of her people to be cast amidst savages. India claims, and the claim cannot be disputed, a very high standard of culture and civilisation. Granting that the labouring classes are below the standard of western civilisation, the contact with civilised nations will not bring down the latter but will lift the former. The aim of humanity will be to lift the whole human race and the process of evolution will always help in achieving that aim.

INTERNATIONAL BUDDHIST UNIVERSITY ASSOCIATION.

The Working Committee of the University Association met for the first time on June 6, 1934. Mr. Justice M. N. Mukerji presided. Lists of members of the Governing Body, numbering 108, and of Fellows of the International Buddhist Academy attached to the Association, numbering 75, were drawn up and adopted. Particular care was taken in making these lists as comprehensive as possible, the object of the Association being the consolidation of all available resources for the purpose of building up an International University. The Association also drew up a list of Patrons. Letters will now be officially sent to these persons, requesting them to co-operate with the University Association. The General Secretary, Anagarika Govinda (Ernst L. Hoffmann) having gone to Ceylon it was decided that Mr. Sri C. Sen, M.A., be requested to officiate as a Secretary in place of Mr. Devapriya till his return from Japan. Two Sub-Committees were appointed for considering the ways and means of raising funds, and for preparing a questionnaire—Maha-Bodhi.

WHAT THE INDIAN STATES' PEOPLE WANT.

realpatidar.com

A deputation of workers in the Indian States' People's movement, headed by Mr. N. C. Kelkar, President of the All-India States' People's Conference, waited upon Mahatma Gandhi at Poona on 19th June, placing him in possession of the views which the States' people hold both in regard to their movement in general and the constitutional reforms proposals in particular. In the course of the conversation the Mahatma promised to communicate in writing his individual views on any questions that the deputation may refer to him. Thereupon Mr. N. C. Kelkar and the other members wrote the following letter to Gandhiji on June 22, 1934:—

MR. KELKAR'S LETTER.

The people in the Indian States desire to ascertain your individual opinion on certain matters affecting themselves, so that we may move the Congress to consider, in the light of your opinion, the desirability of defining its policy on certain questions more precisely than at present and modifying it somewhat on certain others.

The first question that we would bring to your notice in this connexion is the necessity of the Congress taking up for solution problems pertaining to the States. The Congress has now given up its traditional policy of "keeping itself unspotted" from the States. It recruits members in the States and brings them under the control of its district and provincial committees. The accession of strength that it has thus received from the States is by no means negligible; nor are these members sleeping partners in the Congress activities, although these activities concern mostly British India alone. On the other hand, even in such movements as civil disobedience, they have proved good comrades-in-arms and have cheerfully borne their share of the burden, realising that British India and Indian India are essentially one and indivisible and that the concerns of one are necessarily the concerns of the other also.

We think that time has now arrived for the Congress to respond to this spirit of good comradeship exhibited by the States' people by putting all its weight and prestige behind their efforts at self-emancipation. At the Madras (1927) and Calcutta (1928) sessions the Congress no doubt pleaded for the establishment of democratic Swaraj in the Indian States and extended its sympathy to the inhabitants thereof. The Calcutta resolution is well worth quoting here in extenso:

"This Congress urges on the ruling princes of the Indian States to introduce responsible government based on representative institutions in the States, and to issue immediately proclamations or enact laws guaranteeing elementary and fundamental rights of citizenship, such as rights of association, free speech, free press and security of person and property.

"This Congress further assures the people of the Indian States of its sympathy with and support in their legitimate and peaceful struggle for the attainment of full responsible government in the States."

We make no doubt that a similar resolution will be reiterated at the sessions that will be held hereafter, but may we not hope that the Congressmen in British India will lend active help to the people in the Indian States in achieving political freedom even as the Congressmen in Indian India gave a measure of help to British Indians in their attempts to realise their destiny? Of the two, British Indians are much the more advanced, but in fact help has flown far more from the States' people to British Indians than from British Indians to the States' people. Do you not think it desirable to advise British Indians, in the name of the Congress, to support actively, even by undergoing suffering if necessary, all legitimate movements for the establishment of popular government in the Indian States under the aegis of their rulers? Such comradeship shown on both sides, it appears to us, will cement the two Indias far more firmly than any formal federation can.

Another question, of even greater urgency, on which the Congress must determine its policy is its attitude towards those parts of the White Paper scheme which relate to the Indian States. The authorities of the Congress have declared the scheme to be unacceptable because it does not satisfy the aspirations of the Indian people. May we say that the provisions concerning the States are far from acceptable to the States' people and may we hope that the actual acceptance or otherwise of these provisions will be made to depend upon their wishes? The future constitution of India which, according to the Congress intentions, is to take the place of the White Paper constitution, will be based upon the principle of self-determination given effect to by a Constituent Assembly. Is it implied that the federal scheme that will be evolved by this Assembly will be the result of an agreement between the people in British India on the one hand and those in the Indian States on the other?

While on this subject it would be well to refer to the apprehensions that have arisen in the mind of the Indian States' people by some passages in your speeches at the Round Table Conference. You pleaded earnestly in this Conference with the rulers of the Indian States for allowing the States' representatives in the federal legislature to be chosen by election and for allowing the fundamental rights of the States' people to be written into the federal constitution and placed under the protection of the federal court. But your pleadings on this occasion have given rise to an impression that if the Princes did not agree, as they did not and they do not agree, you would accept a constitution in which provisions of the kind that you suggested did not find a place. If this impression is well-founded, we cannot help saying, and saying it straight out, that you have done a grave wrong to the States' people. If you think that nomination by the Princes, for instance, must be acquiesced in, if necessary, in the existing circumstances, we will only beg you to refer the matter to the States' people themselves in order to ascertain what their wishes are in this respect. The right of self-determination of the Indian States' people is no less sacred than that of British Indians.

But it has been explained to us that in expressing your views in favour of the election of the States' representatives and the protection of the fundamental rights of the States' people in the way you did, you wished it to be understood by the rulers of the States that if they did not agree to do what you urged upon them you would not admit them into the federation. You meant these to be essential conditions of federation, but you did not express yourself in this categorical manner only because, at the time you spoke, federation was still shrouded in uncertainty. If this be your meaning, we would entreat you to make it clear beyond the possibility of doubt, for we know that the rulers of the States are putting a different interpretation upon what you said. They are representing that you are ready to put up with nomination by the Princes, for instance, for an indefinite length of time. It is necessary that your meaning should be made plain, for the Swarajist Conference at Ranchi made it known that their party (which is now only a wing of the Congress) would follow the lines of your speeches in framing the future constitution. Since, in the final determination of the Congress policy on these points your personal view plays such a decisive part, we are anxious to know whether election of the States' people and a Declaration of Rights in their interest are, in your opinion, merely desirable features of a federation or essential conditions thereof. There are various other matters connected with the federal constitution which require careful consideration on the part of the Congress, but we do not wish to trouble you with them at the present moment. We would only beg you to give us an unequivocal statement of your views on the point raised in this letter.

GANDHIJI'S REPLY.

Gandhiji sent the following reply to the deputationists :—

The unusual demand upon my time is my excuse for delay in replying to your letter of 22nd June last.

Instead of dealing directly with the points raised by you I propose to define my own policy regarding the Indian States.

The policy of non-interference in the affairs of the States that the Congress has followed is wise and sound.

The States are independent entities under the British law. That part of India which is described as British has no more power to shape the policy of the States than it has (say) that of Afghanistan or Ceylon.

I wish it were otherwise, but I recognise my impotence in the matter. India of the States is undoubtedly an integral part of geographical India. But that carries us no further than where we stand today. Portuguese and French India are also an integral part of geographical India, but we are powerless to shape the course of events there.

We enrol members from the States in the Congress. We receive considerable assistance from them. It is not want of appreciation or will that compels our non-interference. It is our helplessness.

It is my conviction that any attempt on the part of the Congress at interference can only damage the cause of the people in the States.

But there is nothing to prevent us from urging the States to adopt a certain policy.

I am of opinion that whatever we are able to accomplish in British India is bound to affect the States. I would like the States to grant autonomy to their subjects and would like the Princes to regard themselves and be in fact trustees for the people over whom they rule, drawing for themselves only a small and definite percentage of the income. I have certainly not lost hope that the princes will deem it a pride to become real trustees of their people. I do not seek to destroy their status. I believe in the conversion of individuals and societies.

What I said at the Round Table was in the nature of an appeal made to the Princes. It certainly did not imply that whether they listened to the appeal or not, the Congress would enter the federation. I had no authority to bind the Congress to any such thing. The Congress entering the federation had to depend upon many other circumstances beyond the attitude of the Princes. If ever federation comes it will surely depend upon mutual adjustment.

I hope I have answered all the points you have raised. If I have not, please write to me again. I have written this under great pressure of work.

SOME NOTABLE PRONOUNCEMENTS.

The Sermon on the Mount:—The "Ashram Quarterly" (which was till last month the Christa Seva Sangh Review) opens with an article on "Living the Cross" by the Rev. Ronald Freeman. Mr. Freeman begins by maintaining that the "Sermon on the Mount" is not the central teaching of Christianity. He writes: "In these days when so much is said and written by popular writers and social teachers and others about the 'Sermon on the Mount' it is as well to remember that St. Paul in his letters never once mentions it directly or indirectly, nor is it specifically referred to by St. John or any other New Testament writer outside the Gospels. The early Church was not interested in the ethics or the social teaching of Jesus, but rather in the sacrifice of Calvary; thus St. Paul is always referring to 'Jesus Christ and Him Crucified.' The redemptive death of the Christ followed by his glorious resurrection, is the central fact on which early Christian experience was based, and this was prior to that theologising, rationalising tendency which brought 'the Faith' into being as a dogmatic system."

The Harijan Movement:—Mrs. Sarojini Naidu speaking at a public meeting last week end, revealed that she did not approve of the Harijan movement as at present conducted. She said, according to report in Bombay Chronicle, that she did not believe in sectional service because she believed the more universal the treatment the more easier the service. That was why, she said, she was opposed to Gandhiji wishing to isolate and label Harijans as a class by themselves, needing special protection. In her opinion the Harijans should be included in a general economic regeneration, because after all the problem of the Harijans was an economic problem. Service, she said, could have no preferences, no exclusions. Harijans were an integral part of the Indian problem.

Hindi and the Vernaculars:—Jay Chandra Vidya-sankar writes in the Tribune: "There is no responsible person amongst the promoters of the Hindi movement either in the Punjab or elsewhere, who expects Hindi to supplant the provincial languages of India even in the distant future. The development of Hindi literature is indissolubly bound up with the growth of the other vernacular literatures of India: Bengali, Gujarati, Marathi, etc. We want Hindi to blossom as the sole literary language only in the provinces in which it is the language of the people, while in the provinces with other languages we want it to be studied and understood as the Rashtra Bhasha or the national language of India. By Rashtra Bhasha here is meant something more than a mere lingua franca. As Sir George Grierson has explained, a lingua franca is an hybrid speech used as an international language, while Hindi, though used as an interprovincial language, is not an hybrid."

Education of Depressed Classes:—It is understood that the U. P. Government have appointed Mr. M. L. Agrawala, Inspector of Schools U. P. educational service, on special duty in the office of the Director of Public Instruction to report on the education of depressed classes and recommend means by the which their education can more speedily and economically be advanced. It is further learnt with particular reference that the officer will make recommendations on the resolutions of the depressed classes conference held at Bareilly in September 1933 and suggest the best means of utilising funds placed at the disposal of the Government to give effect to these resolutions.

A PENITENTIAL FAST.

While an enthusiastic crowd of nearly 30,000 men and women gathered at Anasagar Bund in Ajmer on the evening of July 5, despite heavy rains, to hear Gandhiji, an unfortunate clash between Sanatanists and Reformists marred the pleasantness of the function. Some Sanatanists led by Pandit Lalnath made a black flag demonstration and ultimately clashed with the Reformists with the result that Pandit Lalnath received a nasty cut on his head. Gandhiji arrived later and when informed about the clash, he directed that Pandit Lalnath be brought before him. Introducing the Pandit to the audience, Gandhiji expressed profound sorrow for what had happened. Gandhiji condemned the behaviour of the public and the volunteers who by using violence had injured the cause of Harijans. Gandhiji then announced that he would have to do penance on account of this use of violence, but did not know what form it would take.

In a statement to the press, Gandhi says:—

"An inquiry made by me into the unfortunate incident at Ajmer, resulting in a cut received by Pandit Lalnath on the head, shows that the blackflag demonstration enraged those who saw the processionists and, according to Pandit Lalnath, the public, which included the volunteers, seized the flags and trampled them underfoot. A scuffle ensued, in which Pandit Lalnath received the injury mentioned. Happily none of the other demonstrators received injuries worth the name. But the guilt is enhanced by the fact that those in charge of the volunteers had specific instructions to see that the blackflag demonstrators were fully protected from molestation by the public.

"It is no defence to say that Pandit Lalnath and his party came in advance of the time appointed. In my opinion, responsible men should have been posted at all points to afford protection to the demonstrators, and notices should have been put up all over the meeting ground warning the public against interfering with them in any shape or form.

"That precaution was not taken, and the pledge given to Pandit Lalnath that he and his party would be free from molestation when they made a demonstration was broken. The pledge was given by me in full faith that the captain of the volunteers was willing and able to carry it out. I have no doubt that he was a willing partner to the pledge. That he was unable to redeem the pledge is quite clear. But there can be no doubt that the final responsibility rests with me.

"Indeed, no pledge was necessary. In a movement claimed to be purely religious, non-violence on the part of the public sympathising with the movement must be presumed. If I mentioned the pledge I have done so to enhance the magnitude of the guilt and to demonstrate the greater necessity for public penance on my part.

"Pandit Lalnath always warned me that my persistence in the movement must result in widespread violence on the part of the sympathising public. I did not share his fear, nor do I share it now, in spite of his ability to show stray cases of violence done to black flag demonstrators. But it is necessary for me to emphasise the fact that a movement purely religious admits of no violence on the part of reformers, even in spite of provocation. The movement can succeed only by appealing to reason and by touching the hearts of opponents. This is possible only through the purity and penance of reformers.

"After much searching of heart, therefore, I have decided to impose upon myself a fast for seven days, to commence on Tuesday noon, August 7, that is two days after my reaching Wardha, which I expect to do on August 5, next. This is the least penance that I owe to Pandit Lalnath and those Sanatanists whom he represents.

"God willing the Harijan Tour will finish at Benares on August 2 next. It is perhaps a fitting end, and will be signalled by a penitential fast. May it cover all errors of omission and commission, committed consciously or unconsciously by me and my co-workers.

"The movement will not end with the fast. Let it open a new and cleaner chapter in this struggle for the emancipation of nearly fifty million human beings from the thralldom imposed in the sacred name of religion.

"Let it also be a warning to those who are in or will join the movement, that they must approach it with clean hands and hearts, free from untruth and violence in thought, word and deed.

"I hope that no one will feel tempted to imitate the fast. The cause will be best served by greater dedication."

BRITAIN AND CHINA.

The following extract from Chinese Affairs, the fortnightly organ of the International Relations Committee (Nanking, China), dated February 28th 1934, explains "the cynical complaisance of the British Foreign Office towards Japanese aggression in China":—

"British soldiers are illegally engaged in mining operations in the Panhung district along the Yunnan border, ignoring persistently orders of Yunnan provincial authorities, recent reports aver. Clashes between Britishers and natives of Panhung have made the situation very tense, alarming. Revival of the long outstanding Sino-British dispute over the Yunnan-Burma boundary is feared because of the present conflict. Territorial loss by China is apt to be the outcome of such controversy, unless the situation is properly handled by the Chinese Government. Britain's past aggressiveness in Yunnan justifies the foregoing assertion.

"Since Britain annexed Burma in 1886, the boundary line between Yunnan and Burma has been undetermined. The unsettled situation has given occasion for repeated British encroachments upon Yunnan. The recent reported transgression over Panhung is but one of a series of British attempts at territorial expansion beyond the Yunnan-Burma line into the former's territory.

"The first British usurpation by force of Yunnan land took place in 1892 when the alleged killing of an English officer by natives of the border regions gave rise to a dispute that lasted over two years, until finally an agreement was reached by China and Britain regarding the disputed boundary. Unfortunately, the demarcation agreed upon was incomplete in that the northern and southern boundaries were not definitely declared.

"In the spring of 1900 further encroachments were effected by British troops that crossed the Kao Li Kung Shan (mountain) and occupied border districts. They were withdrawn six years later. Again, in the winter of 1910, about two thousand British soldiers went into Pien Ma, a district well into the region of the Yunnan side of the boundary, built barracks and fortifications. The 'campaign' ended at the outbreak of the World War.

"Once more Britishers are trying to exploit mines in Panhung situated in Yunnan area. British troops have built garrisons, radio stations and aerodromes along the Yunnan border, latest reports indicate. Such activities are indicative of preparedness for military action belying the apparent mere intent of mining developments.

"This military gesture is nothing short of a guilty admission that the intruders are poaching on questionable grounds and that their land-grabbing is to be protected at the point of guns against just and righteous protests or objections of those whose property they are so wilfully and wantonly encroaching. In the light of recent events, steps must be taken by China to attain prompt amicable settlement of the long standing dispute and conclusively determine the Yunnan-Burma boundary once for all. Immediate action to avert more serious international complications is imperative. Procrastination will be suicidal to territorial interests of Panhung and other border regions."

SELECTIONS FROM THE PESHWAS' DAFTAR.

Another volume of the "Selections from the Peshwas' Daftar" which is the 40th of the series edited by Rao Saheb G. S. Sardesai has been published by the Government Central Press. It is entitled "Miscellaneous Papers of Peshwa Balajirao". This Selection brings together a number of important papers which came to light after the previous Selections had been arranged and sent to the Press. It contains 152 papers which refer to the various events with which the regime of Peshwa Balajirao is so full—the conquest of the Karnatak, the early history of Ramraja and his struggle for power and the pilgrimage of the Peshwa's mother, Kashibai. The rivalry that long existed between the Peshwa and Babuji Naik Joshi for the possession of the Karnatak, a subject which has already been dealt with in Selection No. 25, will be found further elucidated in the papers reproduced in this Selection, viz, Nos. 28, 33-35, 45, 48, 52 and 83. No. 28 in particular, being a sanad granted to Bapuji by king Shahu, seems to point to the origin of the dispute. A few papers of the previous regime are also included as they threw light on the conquest of the northern Konkan as far as Jawhar and Ramnagar first projected by Bajirao in 1724 and completed as late as 1759. The letters of Krishnarao Ghaskar, Balajirao's maternal uncle, who was for a time entrusted with the task, will be found full of interest. Nos. 79 and 86 show how the Peshwa and Tulaj Angria gradually came to a clash. Nos. 129 and 132 throw light on the preparations made by the Peshwa for resisting the Abdali, a task for which Raghunathrao was already appointed and which at the last moment came to be entrusted to Sadashivrao at the famous meeting at Patdur. Although these papers are styled Miscellaneous, they are by no means less important historically.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

No Parties to Officials:—H. H. the Maharaja Gaskwar has passed orders deprecating the tendency of people to flatter officers by giving them addresses, parties, etc., instead of thanking Government for helping them by gracious acts of public utility and welfare. It is undesirable, observes His Highness, that people should ask for concessions on one side and spend as above whereas this money can better be utilised for the amelioration of village life. He further advises state officers in the order not to encourage the people in such actions.

NOTES

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru:—The Secretary of State for India stated in the House of Commons on Monday that it was impossible to consider remission of sentence in the case of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru as the Pandit was sentenced not for an offence connected with Civil Disobedience but for three seditious inflammatory speeches. This certainly is making a distinction without a difference. The Pandit during the same visit to Calcutta made, if we remember, another speech condemning political murders in language stronger than any used by a Congress leader not excluding Gandhiji. The seditious speeches, therefore, could be called inflammatory only in the sense that they advocated Civil Disobedience. Such speeches are in our opinion really a manifestation of the spirit of Civil Disobedience and cannot be distinguished from it. We take it that Government in lifting the ban on Congress wished that it should function in all its parts and not lopsidedly. Pandit Jawaharlal represents a side of Congress mentality different from that of Gandhiji. The Congress view cannot, therefore, be completely expressed unless he is free. We trust that Government will reconsider their decision in the light of these circumstances, which do not seem to have been present to their minds.

Lawyer and Statesman:—Mr. K. M. Munshi contributes an article in the Harijan on the proposed legislation for admission of antyajias into Hindu temples. Mr. Munshi at the outset argues that the Hindu sovereign enjoyed the right to legislate on socio-religious matters and that the British Government, as his successor, stands in his shoes and inherits his right. He writes: "The conceptions of the Hindu State and Kingship were permeated by religious ideas and the Hindu king, though not the head, was at least the protector of religion" and exercised the right of controlling religious matters. The royal toleration did not extend to overt practices. The conscientious objector was not permitted to allege his conscience as a justification for acts disapproved on principle by Government! Modern Hindu kings, like the Gaekwar of Baroda and the Maharaja of Travancore, exercise similar jurisdiction. The king in Malabar exercises the prerogative, known as Malkoima, to alter the mode of worship in temples and modify ancient religious usages. This was recently illustrated, when the Chakkala Nairs were admitted into the temples, roads in the vicinity of temples were thrown open to the Avarnas and the Devadasi System and animal sacrifices were prohibited. Strictly speaking, from the point of view of the Hindu theory, therefore, the right of Government to enact these bills stands unchallengeable." The Hindu sovereign in theory had no right to legislate. Where this right was exercised, it was either sanctioned by local custom or was merely acquiesced in helplessly as under Muslim rule. The Maharaja of Travancore's right in temple matters is represented by the one half of one vote which he is allowed in the committee of eight-and-a-half in which the religious endowments are vested. Mr. V. Nagam Aiyar writes of Sri Padmanabha Swami Pagoda in Trivandrum, in the "Travancore State Manual," "This temple is under the management of a committee known as 'Ettarayogam' (literally, an assembly of eight and a half) composed of eight Brahmin Jennies with one vote each and the Maharaja who has but half a vote." The temple is of great antiquity and held in the highest veneration. It is first in importance in Travancore because the State is a theocracy dedicated to Sri Padmanabha and the Maharajah rules as his vicegerent. The argument that the British Government of India inherits the rights of the Hindu Sovereign, is even more grotesque. It exercised many powers which never belonged to the Hindu Sovereign, for example, in the laws of marriage and succession, and it has voluntarily renounced the right to exercise some which he exercised. No Hindu ruler had need to issue a "queen's proclamation" disclaiming alike the right and desire to interfere in matters of religious belief or ancient customs. We are, of course, not questioning the power of the modern representative legislature to legislate on social questions. We are merely pointing out that

King George cannot by any stretch of legal ingenuity be made out to be the lineal successor of Chandragupta or Sri Harsha.

A Servants of India Pronouncement.—Our attention is called to an article in the Servant of India on Mr. Ranga Iyer's Temple Entry Bill. It argues, that as the Bill is only permissive in its operation and as it gives the right of deciding in each case to the Hindus of the locality, it should be passed. These reasons would justify the Bill being extended to Mahomedan mosques, Christian churches, Parsi and Jain temples, Sikh Gurudwaras and Jewish synagogues. Why not pass a general law permitting worshippers in every religious shrine to decide by a majority all questions pertaining to worship in it? One has only to put the question, to see that the arguments of the Servant of India at once break down. Religion is not politics, nor social reform. It is a matter largely of inherited belief unanswerable to secular reason. In all religions, dissenters have the right to set up their own places of worship if they felt conscientious objections to continue to worship in the old churches or temples. We are told that only Hindu members should vote on the Bill. We know one Hindu member who derides religion and considers it a curse and not a blessing. There are others who do not go to temples and who regard the question from a purely political point of view. How are their votes more relevant than those of devout Muslims or Christians? We are totally opposed to the exclusion of members of the Assembly on account of their creed from exercising their right to debate and vote on every measure brought before that body. Members of other creeds and non-temple-worshipping Hindus may voluntarily abstain from voting on any question, but no one has a right to dictate to them.

Abduction of Hindu Girls.—Within the last few weeks the cry that Hindu girls and women are being abducted by Muslims, has been raised in several parts of the country. For some years past there has been a general complaint to this effect in Bengal. It is a pity that the Government of that Province thought that there was no case for an enquiry. Impressions in such cases are often corrected by a study of facts and an enquiry might have shown that the number of cases of abduction are not so numerous as is generally believed or that what are regarded as abductions were really voluntary on the part of the women. Recently complaints of this kind have been made by responsible men in Bombay and also found expression in the open letter handed to Gandhiji on behalf of a Hindu Youth Organisation at Lahore. Nothing is more calculated to embitter the feelings between the two communities than that an impression of this kind should be allowed to spread if, as we are inclined to think, it is greatly exaggerated owing to the political differences between Hindus and Muslims. If, on the other hand, the belief has a basis in fact, it is the duty of Government to devise measures to check the crime. If women of adult age and intelligence voluntarily adopt Islam or Christianity, there is no help for it and it behoves Hindu leaders to find out and remove any avoidable hardships which may estrange women from their ancestral faith. In the great majority of such cases, we fancy the reason is dissatisfaction with the conditions of home life or quarrels with relatives. It is also probable that the abductions have no religious motive behind them, and are incidents in the nefarious trade which has a far-flung organisation. Complaints of this kind are not confined to Hindus.

Elections to the Assembly.—Dewan Bahadur A. Ramaswami Mudaliar, leader of the Justice Party in Madras, opened the election campaign in that city with a lengthy and well-considered address in which with great courtesy, moderation and good humour he dealt with several of the claims made for the Congress Party by Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar and Mr. Satyamurthi during the former's tour in Madras Presidency. While Congressmen have been contemptuous of the candidates from other parties, the Dewan Bahadur declared that the best men irrespective of party should be sent to the Assembly in view of the important questions that are likely to come up before it. He drew a sharp line of distinction between the conditions prevalent in the provincial Legislative Councils and those in the Legislative Assembly. In the provinces where Diarchy prevails a ministerial party is a necessity. "But in the Central Legislature there is no such thing," he said, "as a Government party. There ought to be no such party. If the right type of men are chosen; if men are chosen for their knowledge, for their character, for their political honesty, they are bound to belong to only one party, whatever labels they may have outside,—the party which opposes Government, the party which tries to criticise every repressive measure of the Government, the party which tries to look at things from the broad point of view of the greatest good of the greatest number. There is, therefore, this fundamental distinction that while in Provincial Councils, Ministerial Parties and Anti-Ministerial Parties may be formed, so far as the Assembly is concerned, under the present constitution, there can only be one party of decent men, the party that opposes the Government or tries to criticise its measures." It should be added that, while the Congress means to do nothing but oppose in the Legislative Assembly, non-Congress members, although in opposition, will be free to introduce and support such measures as are in line with the national programme not contained within the four corners of the Congress programme. While Congressmen will be rightly loyal to Congress inhibitions, the loyalty of non-Congress members will be to nothing less than the country as a whole. "Country before Congress" will be their motto.

Choose the Best Men :—We reproduced some time back from the Leader the statement that Dewan Bahadur M. Ramachandra Row and Mr. Venkatarama Sastry will be candidates for the Legislative Assembly at the forthcoming elections and will have the support of the Justice Party, though they are both leading members of the Liberal Party. Dewan Bahadur Ramaswami Mudaliar's observations lend countenance to the report. He spoke in friendly appreciation of the work of the Liberal leaders at the Round Table Conference and defended them against the attacks made on them. He declared: "I have pleaded on more than one occasion and I have pleaded on my own behalf and not for my party, perhaps with the disapproval of some of my colleagues—that so far as the elections to the Legislative Assembly are concerned, knowing the position of the various parties that will inevitably get into the Assembly, I have pleaded that the best men of the various parties should be sent. If you are solely thinking of the interest of the country, if you want to see your country advance politically, if you want the best constitution for your country, if you want to utilise every opportunity that is given to you under the existing constitution, if you want to improve your political status, enhance your economic interests, if you want to make your selves better equipped for the further fights that have to be fought before we can attain Dominion Status, send the best men to your Assembly. I am personally convinced of it. I am prepared to appeal to any Party leaders to accept that position in the highest interest of the country and in spite of the irresistible temptation to enhance purely the prestige of the party by trying to capture as many seats as possible for party candidates."

Hindu Colonisation in Borneo:—The current number of the Indian Review contains an interesting article on "Early Hindu Colonisation in Borneo" by Dr. R. C. Majumdar which is of interest in view of the recommendation of the South African Colonisation Committee. Four inscriptions were discovered in 1879 in the district of Koti at Muara Kaman on the Mahakam river. The inscriptions are engraved on stone pillars of about a man's height. They refer to the gifts made by the king of Borneo to Brahmins. The inscriptions have been referred to about 400 A. D. It would seem, therefore, that by the fourth century A. D. the Hindus had established kingdoms in the eastern part of Borneo. As the inscriptions, says Dr. Majumdar, leave no doubt about the thorough-going nature of the Brahmanical religion in that locality, the Brahmins evidently formed an important element of the population and the Brahmanical rites and ceremonies were in great favour at the Court. In addition to these antiquities, remains of ancient Hindu culture have also been formed in other localities in east Borneo. Writes Mr. Majumdar. "The most notable among these is the cave of Kombeng, which has yielded a large number of interesting articles. Kombeng is situated considerably to the north of Muara Kaman and to the east of the upper course of the Telen river. The cave consists of two chambers. In the back chamber were found twelve sandstone images, pieces of carved stone and a few half decayed iron-wood beams. All these may be taken as the remains of a temple which were hurriedly secreted in the dark chamber of a cave, apparently for safety. That the images were brought from elsewhere is clearly indicated by the fact that most of them have a pin under the pedestal evidently for fixing them in a niche. The images included those of Ganesa, Nandi Vishnu, Brahma, Skand and Mahakala. Three Siva images were formerly removed from this place to the Batavia Museum. The preponderance of the images of Siva and Sivaite gods—there being two images of Ganesa—seems to indicate that the prevailing religion in that quarter was Saiva." Hindu civilisation in Borneo seems to have come direct from India and not from Java.

Ellore Follows Bombay:—The Indian Express of Madras publishes a statement issued by Mr. A. Govindachary, who is in charge of the Congress Election Campaign in Ellore, in which he condemns rowdism at public meetings. We reproduce his remarks below as they have a bearing on incidents in Bombay on which we commented last week: "It pains me very much to have to condemn once again the improper conduct and the hooliganism that is being continuously resorted to at the three consecutive Congress Meetings by some sitting Municipal Councillors, contractors and their supporters. When the Town Hall was lawfully in the possession of the Congress Election Committee and while the Congress meeting was lawfully going on, as it was previously announced through previously printed handbills, I am at a loss to understand the legal or moral rights of those that have organised a disturbance of the election propaganda meeting. If they can approach the electorate with confidence, they may do so by organising separate meetings instead of trying to usurp the Congress platform by all these questionable means. I once again appeal, as I have been doing all through to those of the other party, to their good sense to employ fair play and give a straight fight to the Congress."

Gambling:—It is high time that the law relating to gambling in British India was placed on an intelligible basis. Gambling is illegal but some forms of it, notably at horse races, is legal. Some time back a man was convicted for having the tickets of a lottery on sale. A few days later the names of the winners of prizes in the same lottery were published in the papers. How did these men get their tickets? The present state of the law is extremely confusing and a trap to the unwary; blackmailing thrives on legal uncertainty.

BOMBAY, JULY 21, 1934.

GANDHIJI'S HARIJAN TOUR.

Now that Gandhiji's Harijan tour is drawing to a close, it is a fitting opportunity to review its results and to weigh the worth of the method typified by it to effect changes in a social and religious institution. For this purpose, it is necessary to start with a brief retrospect. Although, the in-equity of untouchability in Hindu society has for many years been conspicuous to Gandhiji's mind as to that of other thinking men, it is only two years ago that the Harijan movement, as it has come to be known, came into existence. A glance at the events which preceded it, is necessary in order to see it in its true perspective. At the Second Round Table Conference which Gandhiji attended, the question of the representation of the depressed classes in the Legislative Councils under the proposed reforms, came up for consideration. Gandhiji took up the position which surprised many people in this country, that he, on behalf of the National Congress, would oppose any arrangement which, either in the shape of separate electorates or reservation of seats, recognised the existence of the depressed classes as distinct from the general body of Hindus. He returned to India early in 1932 and was almost immediately arrested. About the middle of 1933, the British Government gave what is known as the Communal Award. In it, separate electorates were provided for the depressed classes, along with some other minority communities. Gandhiji declared a "fast unto death" if this provision was not changed. This was in accord with his declaration at the Round Table Conference that he would resist unto death such an arrangement. Gandhiji's life became at once the central issue, and a settlement was embodied in what is known as the Poona Pact which, besides the allocation of seats, included a general undertaking to start and carry on a vigorous movement to remove untouchability. The Bombay Conference of Hindu leaders passed the resolution which is printed on the front page of the Harijan every week. There was a reference to facilitating the admission of the depressed classes into Hindu temples, along with the removal of other disabilities in this resolution.

Mr. Kelappan stepped in at this point and began a "fast unto death" to get antyajas admitted into the temple at Guruvayur in Malabar. Gandhiji was appealed to. He persuaded Mr. Kelappan to drop his fast on himself undertaking to see that the reform was carried out. He asked and obtained from Government permission to conduct from Yeravada prison a campaign for the admission of untouchables into Hindu temples. It was found in the course of the discussions that there were certain legal difficulties in the way of Trustees opening their temples to untouchables, even if they wished and were supported by a large body of worshippers. As Guruvayur was in the Madras Presidency, a Bill was drafted for introduction in the Madras Legislative Council by Dr. Subbaroyan to overcome the legal difficulties. As, however, its subject-matter trenchanted upon religion, the previous sanction of the Government of India had to be obtained before it could be introduced in a Provincial or the Central legislature. The Government of Madras too recommended that, as the matter concerned the whole of India, legislation should preferably be undertaken in the Central Legislature. Mr. S. Ranga Iyer, thereupon, applied for leave to introduce Dr. Subbaroyan's Bill with necessary adaptations in the Legislative Assembly. The Governor-General in giving his sanction made it clear that the attitude of Government to it would depend on its obtaining the support of the Hindu community. As there was some delay in securing the Governor-General's sanction, Gandhiji again went on a fast and was released as his condition became serious. The present tour was undertaken to awaken public opinion and get public support, financial and moral, for removing untouchability, including the removal of the ban on Temple entry.

From the personal point of view, the tour has been perhaps the most arduous undertaken by any Indian Missionary since the days of Dirghatamas whose lament from the bottom of a deep well, into which he had been cast by the aboriginal inhabitants whom he went to civilize, is recorded in the Rig Veda. The season of the year added considerably to the physical fatigue of the journey. But Gandhiji has stood the ordeal admirably, thanks to his wiry Kathiawadi constitution, his iron will, abstemious life and his implicit faith in Divine Providence. During the last few days, however, he seems to have felt the strain. We are sure a few days' complete rest will restore him to his normal health. The tour has been a great success on the financial side. It has brought nearly seven lakhs of rupees to the Harijan Fund. This is a considerable amount, having regard to the economic depression and the heavy calls for Bihar Earthquake relief. During the tour Gandhiji has forcefully pleaded that the removal of untouchability was a reform which involved the very existence of Hindus as a people and of Hinduism as a religion. The reformer has to be emphatic. The trumpet should give forth no uncertain sound. The removal of the ban on the remarriage of Hindu widows, the abolition of child marriage, and even the restriction on sea-voyage, were all advocated in nearly the same terms and with the same uncton. Our intrepid contributor, Mr. C. Tejpal, is convinced that, unless the Hindu dead are carried to the funeral pyre on hearses instead of on biers borne on men's shoulders, Hindus will soon become as extinct as the mastodon. The Indian public are by now accustomed to make allowances for the language of propaganda. The great majority of educated Indians, even before this memorable tour, was convinced that untouchability was an anachronism, and Gandhiji's plea has impressed them with the urgency of its removal from the Hindu social system. But they do not accept his theory that caste Hindus have deliberately reduced antyajas to and kept them down in their present degraded position, for which, indeed, there is no historical basis. Untouchability would seem to have originated in a difference of social habits. The Gita refers to antyajas as Svapakas or dog-eaters, and declares that the man of religious insight regards them and Brahmins with an equal eye. Said Jesus: "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man." Several castes have within living memory raised themselves in the social scale by adopting the habits, not all of them wholesome, of the higher castes. The antyajas, too, will do the same, now that they have awakened to their duty to themselves. To help them to do this, is the best service other Hindus can do them.

How far do the crowds which welcomed Gandhiji and the amount of money which he has collected, represent a change of heart in Hindu men and women, which is what could really remove untouchability? Gandhiji has more than once remarked that the majority of Hindus are on the side of the reformers. This is rather surprising considering that even all reformers do not altogether approve of legislation for temple entry, and some even think that, by isolating the problem of the untouchables, injustice is being done to other communities who, though not untouchables, are in a scarcely better position economically and educationally. The learned Tatacharya in one of his articles, published in the Reformer, pointed out that what Gandhiji's movement is leading to, is the formation of a fifth caste of Hindus, which, in his opinion, is the way in which Hindu society in the past has assimilated alien elements. But will this satisfy the Harijan leaders? Will even the suggestion of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association in their representation, published elsewhere, that Harijans should be allowed to enter temples up to the same limits as Sudras, satisfy them? Will it satisfy the Sudras? Why should the custom of demarcating the limits to which the several castes may approach the inner shrine, be perpetuated, when the most important restriction of all—that on the admission of untouchables—is being given up? Our own view, as repeated again and again, is that outcastes are a necessary incident of the caste system. So long as there are castes, there will be outcastes. The removal of untouchability, therefore, can be effected only by a complete overhauling of the caste system which is the view held by all Hindu social reformers. The rich Hindus who contribute liberally to the Harijan Fund, however, have no intention of renouncing by a jot their caste exclusiveness. As for the masses, the Hindu castes immediately above the Harijans, wonder why, when so much fuss is made about the Harijans, no one seems to think of their plight which is often much worse than that of the Harijans?

We hope that Gandhiji, when he is refreshed after a few days' rest, will review the movement. More particularly, he should consider whether direct action in social reform is likely to succeed more than in politics. The seat of authority in Indian politics is six thousand miles away. In social matters, it is in each one of us, that is, distributed among 220 millions of Hindus. In such matters, it is well to turn for guidance to ancient lights. The Gita lays down two precepts, one negative and the other positive, which are applicable to social reform. The first is, do not prematurely agitate the mind of the masses. The second is, that the masses follow in their behaviour the example set by the men of light and leading in the community. The Reformer has from the first maintained that the practical example of leaders is what counts in social reform. Gandhiji seems to think that giving money is the best proof of a man's acceptance of a reform. He is right so far as the poor are concerned. The widow's mite truly indicates the depth of her faith. A rich man, however, may give away a few thousand rupees without missing the amount. But in social reform, it is the man himself we want more than his money.

LORD CURZON.

The literature on the War, the peace and the statesmen who at one stage or another had a hand in them, does not show signs of exhaustion. We have looked into several of them. When we get a book of this class, we first turn up the index to see if India or Indian occurs anywhere in it. As a rule, it does not. When the Indian troops first landed in France, the newspapers were loud in their acknowledgment of the great achievement. Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister in mentioning India's contribution in men and money and material, to a war with which she had no concern, broke down and wept. But all that is forgotten. The international insignificance of India is brought home to one by the complete silence or very casual references to this country in the vast literature of the war. One of the few exceptions is the life of Lord Curzon by Lord Ronaldshay and the recently published "Lord Curzon—the last phase" by Harold Nicholson.* Even here India comes in only in an incidental way. The duel between Montagu and Curzon in the Cabinet over Turkey ended in the discomfiture of the former and his disappearance from public life. Montagu, as Secretary of State for India, was anxious about the effect on Indian Moslem feeling of British aggression against Turkey. Curzon, on the other hand, believed that the time had come to turn the Turk bag and baggage out of Europe. Harold Nicholson who, on the whole, is an admirer and apologist of Curzon, though he notes some of the personal failings of his subject, describes the antagonism between Montagu and Curzon thus: "Curzon, from the point of view of that India which he had served, desired to deal a final blow at pan-Islamism. Montagu, again from the Indian aspect, wished to conciliate pan-Islamic apprehensions. The former wished to eject the Turk from Constantinople. The latter wished us to maintain the Caliph with undiminished prestige." The Indian National Congress under Mr. Gandhi's leadership was at one with Mr. Montagu. Gokhale in his presidential address to the Benares Congress, in 1906, had compared Curzon to Aurangzeb for his pro-Muslim policy. If Curzon did intend to favour Indian Muslims by his Bengal Partition, it was not from love of Islam but from fear of Indian nationalism.

In the early stages, Montagu's opinion prevailed with the majority of the Cabinet against the opposition not only of Curzon but also of the Prime Minister, Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour. Curzon was furious. He recorded his earnest and emphatic dissent from the decision of the Cabinet. "In order to avoid trouble in India, largely manufactured and in any case ephemeral," he wrote, "we are losing an opportunity for which Europe has waited nearly five centuries, and which may not recur." Montagu's fall later was due to his having spiked Curzon's gun in his anti-Turkish intrigues. Writes Mr. Nicholson: "The Khilafat Committee in India spread the rumour that the British Government were about to furnish the Greeks with the sinews of a fresh campaign. The Viceroy (Lord Reading) telegraphed to Mr. Montagu, Secretary of State for India, asking for permission to publish a repudiation of this rumour in a form which expressed strong sympathy for Turkish aspirations. Without consulting the Cabinet Mr. Montagu gave his consent." Curzon completely lost his temper. "If the policy of His Majesty's Government," he wrote, "is the policy of the Viceroy and Montagu then let Montagu go to Paris in my place and fight to obtain Adrianople and the Holy Places for his beloved Turks." Mr. Lloyd George's position as Prime Minister in the Coalition Cabinet was very shaky, and he wanted to conciliate Curzon who was a more influential colleague than Montagu. So Montagu was thrown overboard. The Reformer commenting on the incident at the time expressed surprise that the Viceroy continued to remain while the Secretary of State was dismissed for complying with his request. The surprise is intensified by the facts which have since come to light. The explanation probably is that Lord Reading was the intimate personal friend of Mr. Lloyd George. Nicholson entirely upholds Curzon. Lord Ronaldshay, writing with closer knowledge of the Indian situation, is more judicial. "Whatever the lack of judgment he (Montagu) displayed in assuming responsibility for the publication of so confidential a Despatch," he observes, "his action did have a very marked effect in allaying what, from the comfortable distance of Whitehall, Lord Curzon characterised as 'a factitious agitation,' but which, to those in India who were called upon to cope with it, had all the appearance of a movement fraught with the possibility of very real trouble." It was in connection with this incident that Curzon described the Government of India as a subordinate branch of the British Government. But when the British Government refused his claim when he was Viceroy to have a voice in negotiations with Russia, he indignantly protested. They were ignoring, he said, the great change, which he believed he had himself done much to accelerate: "the lifting of India from the level of a Dependency to the position which is bound one day to be hers, if it is not so already, namely, that of the greatest partner in the Empire."

Curzon was the complete egoist. All his talents were devoted to sustain his own greatness. This is also the explanation for his contradictions. Seven centuries of aristocrat descent had weakened his backbone. But they only aggravated the domineering nature of the man. His normal attitude towards his fellows was overbearing. When he met his match, however, he simply collapsed. Kitchener, Poincare, Chicherin, were more than a match for him. Harold Nicholson records that he bolted abruptly from an interview with the "little Frenchman"—and wept. There was another occasion when Curzon wept. Bonar Law was dead. The King's secretary had telegraphed to Curzon on Monday evening to be in London the next day. Curzon, rightly regarding this as a preliminary to Premiership, came to town full of hope. After the telegram was sent, the King had changed his mind on the representation of the Labour opposition that a Prime Minister in the House of Lords would be highly inconvenient to it. Balfour had also advised that Curzon's temperament unfitted him for the Premiership. The next day the King's secretary called to tell him that Baldwin had been sent for. Then Curzon wept—wept like a child. Curzon could get on with the "people". It is the "higher middle classes" with whom, he confessed, he could not get on. He was quite sincere in his professions of concern for the men at the plough in India. But he disliked educated Indians. There was some speculation as to the origin of his Universalities reform. Sir Sankaran Nair, while member for Education, rummaging amidst old files, came across a note by Curzon. In it, he had argued that the revolutionary movement in Tsarist Russia was the work of students, and they ought to guard against the danger in India by bringing universities under Government control. Curzon lived to see the Soviet Republic established on the ruins of Tsardom by a people whom tyranny had driven to desperation. The best part of Harold Nicholson's book is his epilogue. He calls it "Terminal Essay." In it he develops the idea that statesmen and diplomatists are generally creatures of circumstance and not its creators as is often supposed. "There is," he writes, "a tendency to ascribe to individual statesmen and diplomatists a greater degree of volition than they in fact possess." Such men are exceptional. "Most statesmen and most diplomatists are not in the least exceptional. They may possess certain theories; certain prejudices; certain ideals and certain desires. The interaction of these elements may, again, lead to a certain attitude of mind. Yet that attitude is mainly governed by the momentarily expedient—by what, in other words, constitutes the lines of least resistance both at home and abroad." The exceptional man when he succeeds, is acclaimed as a genius; when he does not, he is voted an "idealist." The man who follows the lines of least resistance, does not incur any odium by failure. He often really gets a reputation for foresight which he does not possess. Lord Irwin was the former. His successor, the latter.

Munis Renounce Holy Orders :—A Sensation has been caused in Jain circles by the renunciation, by three prominent Jain religious leaders, of all symbols of sectarianism. Before a gathering of Jain and non-Jains of Beawar, Jain Muni Chundilaji Chaitanya, his father, and his guru, Kalyanswami and Laxminisih, alias Sewapriya, renounced their symbols. In a statement made on the occasion, they said that they had not abandoned Jainism but purged themselves of the sectarianism that had penetrated the faith. All the three munis will henceforth call themselves Jain Brahmins and devote themselves to the service of the country.

INDIANS IN ZANZIBAR.

The history of Indian trade relations with Zanzibar goes back to the first century A. D. if not earlier. The Hilton Young Commission on the Closer Union of the Dependencies in Eastern and Central Africa remark in their report that "several references in the Puranas show that the ancient Hindus had a fairly accurate idea of the locality and its peoples" and Dr. Radhakumud Mukherjee cites the 'Periplus of the Erythraean Sea' a marine book of 100 A.D. as evidence of India's ancient trade with East Africa. The Arabs arrived much later on the scene and the Europeans were the last comers. Captain Smee of the East India Company (1811), Colonel Rigby (1860) and Sir John Kirk (1910) have borne testimony to the importance of Indian trade in Zanzibar. Sir John acknowledged that British influence in Zanzibar was the outcome of the presence of Indian merchants who had captured the trade of the island. Of the five acts objected to by the Indian community in Zanzibar, two discriminate against the Indian in favour of the African and the Arab—the Moneylenders' Decree forbidding goods being sold on credit to Arabs or Africans, and the Alienation of Land Decree preventing Arabs and Africans from alienating their land outside the limits of towns except to Arabs or Africans. The Arab apparently is treated as a native of Zanzibar with rights to State protection even greater than the African as he figures first in the various decrees. It would be a mistake to suppose that the special treatment awarded him is a concession to the Sultan. The same supplement to the Zanzibar Government Gazette carries a Decree reducing the penalty under the Native Liquor Regulation Decree from "one year" to "six months" and from "Rs. 1,000" to "Rs. 500"—a measure which as a devout Muslim the Sultan surely cannot approve of. We do not grudge the Arab the advantages he enjoys to-day under the British Protectorate nor do we ask for special treatment from the British in view of the pioneer work of the ancient Hindu traders. But the two great communities in Zanzibar are entitled to equal treatment instead of being played off against each other.

The discriminating decrees fall into two groups—the first in regulation of general trade and the second relating to the clove industry, the principal product of Zanzibar. There are two decrees in the first category and four in the second. The first two are the Moneylenders Amending Decree and the Restriction of Land Alienation Decree. The new clause added to the Moneylenders Decree prevents the sale of goods on credit to an Arab or African, by bringing such a transaction under "moneylending." The Land Alienation Decree controls the transfer of land belonging to an Arab or African outside the limits of towns. Under this Decree the Arab or African is prevented from permanently alienating his land unless the party taking it over is an Arab or an African, without the sanction of the British Resident. Temporary transfers for periods of twenty or less than twenty years are alone permissible when the purchasing party is non-Arab or African, and even in these cases the tendency under the decree is to make the mortgage a usufructuary one. After the twenty-year period, the land reverts to the original holder unencumbered and the debt is extinguished. A mortgage without possession has also been provided for, but under the decree, if the African or Arab mortgagor fails to pay principal or interest according to his contract, then on application the mortgagees will be placed in possession for a term not exceeding twenty years and the mortgage will be treated as a usufructuary mortgage. The mortgagor is at liberty to redeem his land at any time during the mortgage although a condition is permitted by which the time of the agricultural year at which a mortgagor may resume possession of his land on redemption may be agreed on by the contracting parties. There is no personal liability and no interest can accrue while the mortgagee is in possession of land or in receipt of rent other than that fixed by the official, Mr B. H. Wiggins, a lawyer of twenty-eight years' experience in Zanzibar, remarked in the Zanzibar Legislative Council, "It seems to me not only unfair but unjust to compel an investor to change his security to usufructuary mortgage. It would mean that the investor would become a sort of trustee having to manage the estate and keep accounts of perhaps twenty years without getting back his money unless things improve in the future. This would be sheer speculation. The Arab and African will get back his property at the end of the stated period free of debt whether it has been paid off out of produce or not. I am certain no Indian moneylender or any other investor will advance money upon usufructuary mortgage." Another important provision of the Decree is the declaration of a moratorium of one year in respect of Court decrees or orders for sale of land of Arab or African in settlement of debts incurred prior to this enactment. These then are the two measures for protecting the African or the Arab from, what it ultimately amounts to, his own improvidence. Apart from British obligations to Indians in Zanzibar, there is the peculiar position of three communities, starting presumably equal, two of whom have gone hopelessly in debt and all of them hard hit by the world depression and in particular the break in prices of cloves and copra, and the Government devises measure to protect the improvident communities at the expense of the only one which has held its own! It is not unlikely that the Zanzibar Indian will look out for better investments than lending his money under these restrictions to African or Arab, with detriment to the natives of Zanzibar.

So much for the two decrees enacted for the "protection of the natives." The measures regulating the clove trade which has hitherto been almost exclusively in the hands of Indians are four—the Clove Growers Association Decree, the Agricultural Produce Export Decree, the Adulteration of Produce Decree, and the Clove Exporters Decree. Under these enactments an association called the Clove Growers Association is formed which will be controlled by a Board of management of seven members nominated by the British Resident. The Association is exempted from stamp duty, registration fee or other charges. Advances can be made only to persons who are agricultural producers. Members of the Board can receive advances from the Association. The funds of the Association are mainly to be drawn from a levy on all cloves produced in and exported from the Protectorate. Inspectors are empowered by the Adulteration of Produce Decree to enter at all reasonable times any premises on which there is or is believed to be produce for sale or export, and to seize any adulterated produce. No action can be profitably brought against them on account of the broad provisions of the Decree. The Agricultural Produce Export Decree provides for official grading and inspection of the produce and grants immunity to the officials and the Government for any loss sustained by the merchants during the detention on Government premises. Under the Clove Exporters Decree licences are to be issued to exporters at a cost of Rs. 5,000 per licence per annum, the funds thus raised going to the Clove Growers Association. This in brief is the purport of the clove regulations. "The 'Statements of Objects and Reasons' attached to the enactments are not illuminating. They merely state that similar provisions exist in neighbouring territories in East Africa. The Zanzibar Indians have protested against all the clove decrees. We cannot, however, deny that the Adulteration Decree and the Agricultural Produce Export Decree are in the interests of the clove industry and not against the Indian traders who as the established merchants in the trade stand to profit more than the others by them. The Clove Exporters Decree is really a danger to the industry as it aims at a monopoly by raising a prohibitive export fee as licence and our countrymen in Zanzibar will be well advised to concentrate their agitation on that one issue alone. As for the Clove Growers Association, the definition of agricultural producer, the sole qualification for membership, is a wide one and we do not see what objection the British Resident can have to nominating three Indians on the Board of seven, particularly when the Indian interest in the industry is so predominant.

WHERE IS DISARMAMENT NOW ?

(BY 'OBSERVER')

After very nearly going on to the rocks through a difference of view between the French and British Governments, the Disarmament Conference remained afloat as the result of the General Commission's Resolution of June 8. Much more credit for this agreement than is generally known belongs to Mr. Anthony Eden, whose modesty is one of the chief factors in his popularity with other delegations at Geneva.

But although the Conference continues, it has to be admitted that all the major difficulties remain.

Technical difficulties are no longer much trouble. The reduction and limitation of armaments is a feasible proposition the moment the leading Governments of the world are prepared to make the necessary concessions to one another.

Further proof that technical difficulties can be overcome, has been furnished during the past week, by unanimous agreement reached in a Committee, composed of European States, dealing with the question of regional security pacts. Also by progress made in another Committee that has been at work on the problem of securing national and international control over the manufacture of and traffic in arms.

But whether the fruits of such labours will ever be gathered depends not upon technical considerations at all, but upon political.

A bridge—to use the metaphor employed by Sir John Simon—has still to be constructed between the French and German positions, which on paper at least are not hopelessly far apart. That gulf cannot of course be bridged unless there is a positive desire on both sides to reach agreement.

There is no doubt that Germany wants a convention provided it is of such a nature as to make it possible for Hitler to tell the Germany people he has achieved equality of rights—to achieve which principle he is willing to submit to large inequality of armed strength for the period of the Convention (say 8 years.)

It is not so sure, however, that France wants a convention. It is said that even the French General Staff is divided on the point.

Monsieur Barthou's forthcoming visit to London in early July will show which way the wind blows.

In the meantime the preliminary talks about naval armaments are showing, what well-informed observers have been saying ever since the Conference opened, namely, that the Far Eastern situation is even more likely than the European to become the determining factor in this long drawn out attempt to reach a general agreement about armaments.

THE OUTLOOK FOR DISARMAMENT.

(BY BERTRAM PICKARD.)

The Resolution approved by the General Commission of the Disarmament Conference on June 8th after a week of diplomatic tension and general pessimism, marks the beginning of a new phase in the long struggle to achieve a first General Convention.

It is as much a Christian as a political duty to face facts as they really are. Because organised Christian opinion has followed the Conference with constant and earnest attention, that is no reason for taking a sentimental view as to its continued existence, if it could be shown that positive results were now beyond reach.

It would be hard to exaggerate the gravity of the present situation, in Europe and in the world. Signs of insecurity and of the conflict of will and of interest are evident on every hand.

The 'collective system' (as represented by League Covenant and Pact of Paris) for assuring the peace of nations and promoting international co-operation is gravely threatened.

Violent force, though renounced in theory, is still employed as an instrument of national policy. The Sino-Japanese dispute, and two conflicts in South America have illustrated this.

On the other hand, there is little evidence that States with power and privilege are prepared to favour those changes in the status quo without which the changing life of the peoples of the world cannot be made to conform to the dictates of necessity or of justice.

Failing that general reduction and limitation of armaments envisaged by the Peace Treaties and the League Covenant, a new competition in armaments has actually begun, and in the event of a total breakdown of the Conference would certainly develop by leaps and bounds.

For this reason alone, we are disposed to think that the Resolution of June 8th, though it could become a virtual adjournment sine die in disguise, signifies that a new opportunity is now presented to the Governments to reach, before it be too late, a first General Convention which would at least provide a basis for progressive disarmament in the future.

The difficulties that block disarmament are no longer technical; the technical preparation was largely completed long ago. They are psychological and political and they necessarily demand important decisions and concessions, almost exclusively on the part of the Big Powers be it said, notably the so-called 'heavily armed' Powers.

Towards securing such concessions leading to decisions, the Resolution arranges that the work of the Conference is to be carried on partly by the Governments themselves, partly by the Bureau, and partly by four Committees.

To the Bureau is confided the task of working out solutions for the outstanding disarmament problems and of putting together a disarmament convention which is to be presented later on to the General Commission.

As to the Committees, the first one is to deal with security; it is to consider the proposals for pacts of non-aggression and mutual assistance which might be concluded between various groups of States, in the first case in Europe.

The second committee is to study the question of how to ensure that a disarmament treaty, once it has been agreed, to shall be kept by the nations which signed it. This same committee will deal with the similar question of the international supervision of the armaments of all countries for the purpose of ensuring that the amount of armaments permitted is not being exceeded.

The other two committees are to deal with the question of the air and with the arms traffic question. Those are two matters with which the public is especially concerned. A disarmament convention which included these matters would have considerable importance. But if it is to achieve real disarmament it must cover very much more ground.

How this ground is to be covered will depend upon negotiations with Germany with the object of bringing her back to the Conference.

It is here that the Governments come in. An important clause in the resolution leaves it to the Governments to enter into private conversation with Germany "in order to facilitate the attainment of final success by the return of Germany to the Conference."

"HINDU FUNERAL REFORM."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I thank Mr. R. V. V. Tatachiar for his remarks in your columns of 2nd June on "Hindu Funeral Reform." But it seems that he is not as conversant on the practical side of the world and the life of our age, as he is in Smritis. So far as the castes, the method of conducting Hindu funeral and segregation or untouchability are concerned, Manu may be wise in his period of life and leisure but Mr. Tatachiar cannot prove that the method is simple and easy. Regarding God's wish to have corpses of the Brahmins of India as Ahuti, it is purely a myth of Manu but one might say that "the Wheel" is the emblem of progress and not "the Shoulder" of a Hindu.

As many men are wanted to carry a dead body on shoulders all the way to the cemetery, a very uphill task for all and in case of the poor nearly impossible to have such a large number, the hearse is the proper and convenient thing for the purpose and it does not lessen the honour due to the dead but on the contrary enhances it. The hearse is a blessing for Hindu posterity and for the poor.

The glaring defect in Hindu sociology lies in the conduct of Hindu funerals which is a blot on the otherwise fair name of Hinduism or beautiful Hinduism, since the method is sufficient to keep Hindu posterity as hewers of wood and fetchers of water perpetually up to eternity if it is not replaced by an alternative method. When a male child is born in a Hindu family, the advent of the baby is generally hailed by the family along with relations composing their subcaste who rejoice at having one more corpse-bearer: a result of slave mentality to be maintained also by the new born in his turn who may be supposed to be an intelligent and a free man.

May I know, if it is not the cult of the corpse-bearer, what is responsible for having so many castes and sub-castes in India, where originally there were only three or four varnas? It is easy to combat each and every shade of slave mentality and slavery, except that of the Hindu mourners who are instruments of the present plight of our motherland, whose children are turned into a heterogeneous community from a homogeneous group of three or four varnas with intermarriages among all the varnas and with even non-Aryans without check, fear or restraint.

The secret of culture is to learn that a few points steadily reappear, alike in the poverty of obscure form and miscellany of metropolis and that these few are alone to be regarded; the escape from all false ties, courage to be what we are and love of what is simple and beautiful, independence and cheerful relation; these are the essentials; these and the wish to serve or add somewhat to the well-being of men.

It is not only the parents, Mahatmas, Gurus or Heroes that die, but the majority who are not these also die and nobody hesitates to respect, revere, love, and honour the living parents, Mahatmas, Gurus, Heroes, etc., by all the means and ways one likes. But so far as the dead body and its bearers are concerned, Lord Zoroastor's contentions are quite correct. But the hearse is a most reverential and convenient vehicle both for the dead and the living who use it, and the dead do not ask to be shouldered all the way long for deriving reverence of mourners. Moreover, one cannot charge others who place this dead in a hearse drawn by a horse or motor as quite bereft of love, reverence, respect etc. On the contrary they have a solidarity, self-respect, discipline and a status which Hindus in general have not. They can possess and maintain the mentality of a Raj which is the thing wanted by Indians for Swaraj. But those who believe themselves as dust of the feet of their castes may ask themselves as to whether Hindus can honestly abolish segregation of their folds and untouchability without the help of the public hearse and the undertaker. If India wants to be recognized as a nation in its true sense, Hindus will have to nationalize their dead.

Hindus pay cash down for the offices of barbers, butchers, shoemakers, potters, scavengers etc., but the office of the undertaker is unknown to them in spite of the large number of vagrant Sadhus fit for the profession. Eventually a Hindu Minister of State, Chief Judge, or a councillor is a picturesque subject for an artist to paint him, when he is in his untouchable uniform, passing under the yoke of the Hindu bier. If Hindus make cash payment instead of the expenses of funeral feast, the Sadhus can be made to serve us in this world also, as was done by King James I of England, and thereby Hindu society can be saved from being a laughing-stock of the world and many humiliations.

All the merit for salvation cannot be reserved by Hindus alone at the time when they appear to be as if forsaken in this world and lost in the next due to their sins of omissions and commissions in connection with untouchability, compulsory widowhood, infanticides, misalliances, white-slaves and such other evils that are sapping the life-blood of India. Of course there are several other forces and principles that help to nourish such evils, but the cult of the corpse-bearer is, if not mainly, to a certain extent responsible and of course mainly responsible for creating and maintaining the artificial caste system that perpetuates segregation and untouchability. The nations that use the hearse may have their draw-backs or miseries but they don't know such a tyranny as that of India caste system and untouchability.

When Hindus understand that their problems of life cannot be solved without the problem of death, they will insist on funeral reforms and will not be afraid of infection of disease of one dead body to the other placed one after the other in the hearse. And just as barbers know their business to keep their instruments clean, neat and tidy, the undertakers must know theirs as well.

Many Hindu ladies and gentlemen of all varnas have by a will informed their friends and relatives through the Press that after their death their bodies should be taken by hearse to the cremation ground. Thus an impetus has been given to the masses and a large number of Hindu funerals have already been conducted by the help of the public hearse without fearing infection. The public have been falling in with this humanitarian and human method slowly but steadily. The Rajkot Social Service League has provided two on account of the increased public demand for its use. The corpse-bearers have their convictions no doubt but I would like Mr. Tatachariar to understand the maxim, "What individuals are that will the nation be."

C. TEJPAL.

[We cannot say that we have understood every thing Mr. Tejpal say in this letter but we publish it as he has been for many years an earnest and sincere advocate of this important reform. As a matter of fact the use of hearses for conveying the dead is increasing in Bombay and probably in other cities among Hindus. We like Mr. Tejpal's happy phrase of "nationalizing the dead." BADEN-POWELL'S CONTRADICTION.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am sure you will be interested in the correspondence that passed between Lord Baden-Powell and me, copies of which I herewith enclose.

In the issue of the Indian Social Reformer for 3rd March, 1934, there was an article under the title, "East of Suez" by a person who calls himself "Wayfarer." In the course of the article the writer referred to "Instructions" alleged to have been given by Lord Powell to Mr. Wilson who was touring India at that time in connection with the Scout Movement. Among the "instructions" referred to the following occurred,

Some of these natives are not possessed of the same ideas and minds as white men; they have no ideas of chivalry and are full of conceit and self-importance, and if this is allowed to grow without check, they are apt to become insolent and mutinous which is a dangerous thing in countries like India and Africa, where millions of natives are ruled by a handful of whites. It is necessary, therefore, to remind them now and then to respect the British rulers.

As soon as I read this article, I brought this statement to the notice of the Executive Committee of the Madras International Fellowship to consider what we could do in the matter. The Committee felt that without being sure that the report was correct they could not take any action and therefore they asked me to write to Lord Baden-Powell direct asking him whether he was correctly reported. This correspondence then followed:—

Lord Baden Powell,
Boys' Scout Association,
Buckingham Palace Road,
London.

Sir,

In several newspapers in India, there has been lately references to the instructions that Your Lordship seems to have given to Mr. Wilson, when he came to India on his tour on behalf of the Scout Movement.

Among the several instructions that you are alleged to have given, the following occurs:—

"Some of these natives are not possessed of the same ideas and minds as white men; they have no ideas of chivalry and are full of conceit and self-importance, and if this is allowed to grow without check, they are apt to become insolent and mutinous which is a dangerous thing in countries like India and Africa, where millions of natives are ruled by a handful of whites. It is necessary, therefore, to remind them now and then to respect the white ruler."

It is difficult to know if you are correctly reported. Some of us find it hard to believe that statements of the kind given above have their origin in you. It is quite likely that the reporters have been unfair to you. If you are incorrectly reported, we want to say that to the Indian public and correct the impression that has already gained ground. I shall, therefore, be deeply grateful if you will kindly let me know if you are correctly reported.

I need not say that statements of the nature given above will do considerable harm to the relationship that ought to exist between Indians and Britishers and further it will do great injury to the cause of the Scout Movement itself.

I am sorry to trouble you with this. But, I feel sure that you will recognise that the matter is important.

MADRAS,
28th March, 1934. }

Yours faithfully,
A. A. PAUL.

Dear Sir,

In reply to your letter of March 18th. addressed to the Chief Scout, I write to say that the instructions which you say he is alleged to have given were certainly never given by him and you need have no hesitation in contradicting the statement.

LONDON,
2nd May, 1934. }

Yours truly,
Private Secretary.
(To Lord Baden-Powell.)

Since you published the article referred to, "East of Suez", I hope you will consider it necessary to publish Lord Baden-Powell's reply to the question when I referred the matter to him.

Yours etc.,
A. A. PAUL.

BOMBAY REFORM ASSOCIATION ON UNTOUCHABILITY BILL.

The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association has communicated the following views on Mr. Ranga Iyer's Bill in the Assembly for removing Untouchability:—

Though the Bill for the abolition of untouchability among the Hindus is not properly drafted, the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association is in favour of the principle of the bill on humanitarian grounds and reasons based on justice, equity and good conscience.

It is no doubt true that though disabilities are referred to in the statement of objects and reasons they are not specifically referred to. The social and other disabilities are not specified. It is, however, clear that the disabilities referred to relate to the absence of enjoyment of elementary rights as human beings viz., worshipping in the public temple, walking on the same public road or pavement or drawing water from the public well. The legislature is called upon to recognize that the minimum of elementary human rights can be exercised by the depressed classes without let or hindrance and not to allow the courts to recognize any custom to the contrary.

It is true that the enjoyment of elementary rights including touchability is not denied to the depressed realp classes during travel in a railway carriage or any public conveyance. It is a matter of common knowledge that an appreciable number of educated Hindus do not seriously object to the partaking of food or drink touched or prepared by the members of the depressed classes at a public dinner or party especially in the cities. So also no serious objection is raised to the use of the public roads and pavements by members of the depressed classes except in some parts of Southern India. Serious objection is however taken to their drawing water from the public wells and entry in public temples. This objection can be based solely on custom. The elementary human rights cannot be secured to the depressed classes merely by means of persuasion of the higher classes. They cannot be enforced by recourse to law. If a member of a depressed class enters a public temple, in addition to the risk of being maltreated he runs the risk of a prosecution of the offence of Criminal Trespass on the ground that he might thereby cause annoyance to any person or persons. The civil and criminal courts will invariably enforce status quo, the former by recognition of custom and the latter by buttressing the custom by recourse to Section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Though there is considerable change in public opinion and also the custom observable in railway carriages, public hotels and conveyances, the Courts will enforce the custom so far as temples and perhaps public wells are concerned. Since the establishment of the British regime the process of recording any change in custom by Nibandhkars in their commentaries on Smritis has ceased to have any operation, and British courts have petrified social customs by throwing over them the mantle and protection of judicial recognition. There is, therefore, no other way except recourse to legislation to enable the depressed classes to enjoy the minimum of their elementary human rights.

Enlightened public opinion is not sufficiently vehement and assertive to justify penalising the obstruction to the exercise of these elementary rights e. g., by declaring such an obstruction to amount to an offence of wrongful restraint. The Association is of opinion that a member of a depressed class should not expose himself to an action for damages or criminal prosecution for attempting to enforce his elementary natural rights, and the courts should not recognize any custom written or unwritten which would in any way obstruct or hamper the exercise of such elementary human rights.

Though the association is in favour of removal of the disabilities of the depressed classes in social and other diverse matters, it is of opinion that the bill should not confer on them any higher rights than the Sudras, the fourth class in the Hindu social structure of Varnashram Dharma. If the Sudras are not entitled to enter the sanctorum of any temple, the bill should not authorise the depressed classes to exercise higher rights than are permissible to the Sudras. Though the Association is opposed to the recognition of caste as such, it would be prepared to acquiesce in the express restriction of the rights of the depressed classes to the same extent as the Sudras and nothing more, if such express restriction is likely to blunt the edge of opposition. The principle then of doing away with untouchability as such will be enforced and the depressed classes will be allowed access to the public temples and wells to the same extent as Sudras.

The wording of the bill might be amended to secure the enforcement of the exercise of the natural human rights by the depressed classes. If the operation of the Act is restricted to public wells, temples and other public places, it would meet the objection that the bill is likely to violate well-established principles of law relating to trusts and ownership of property.

It is contended in the debate on the bill that the three sources to which penalties, disadvantages and disabilities are traced in the beginning of Section (2) are not quite accurate. In order to meet that objection my Association thinks that the wording of Section (2) should be as follows :—

(2) Notwithstanding any written or unwritten custom, usage or convention having the force of law, no penalty, disadvantage, or disability in relation to public temples, wells or other public places, or in relation to any public convenience, utility or service shall be imposed upon or any discrimination made, recognized or enforced against any person on the ground that such person belongs to an untouchable class or caste among Hindus, and no civil or criminal or revenue Court shall recognize any custom of untouchability or base its adjudication on such custom.

A proviso might be added as follows :—

"Provided that such a person belonging to an untouchable class or caste among Hindu shall not be allowed or held entitled to exercise higher rights than a person belonging to the class or caste of Sudras in the Hindu community."

TEMPLE ENTRY BILL.

(By R. VEERIAN.)

Social tyranny is so rampant that a vast bulk of the masses (Adi Dravidas) are denied the very rudimentary rights of human beings. In fact we have no free access to public wells, tanks, springs, path ways and other places of public resort. Because the mentality of the Caste Hindus have not changed, we are not able to fully enjoy our rights, although there are legislative enactments made regarding the same.

Untouchability is practised in different forms in different places under the cover of Unwritten Laws. This could not be removed without systematic work. It is purely a question of change of heart of the Orthodox section. Without sufficient education and propaganda in a systematic manner, it is not possible to convert the extremely orthodox to cosmopolitan views, especially in religious matters. The so-called Depressed Classes are depending mostly on Caste Hindus for their livelihood, and so they will not care to cast their votes in favour of Temple Entry, for fear of losing their support from Caste Hindus, especially in rural parts. The Bill will not really help the depressed classes, unless an Organisation comes to their rescue to help them financially in the event of any trouble arising by their entry. Without such a provision, we strongly oppose the passing of this Bill.

A deputation of Adi Dravidas of Southern India headed by me submitted a Memorandum to Mahatma Gandhiji at Coonoor on 4-2-1934 and we explained to him that Temple Entry would not in any way materially benefit the community; but would only create confusion in the country. What we impressed on him was an all round education and economic improvement. We have our own Temples and Bhajan parties and hence we are not lacking in any way in spiritual food. Those who plead so much for us ought to help us in actual practice to our free access to public wells, tanks, springs, path ways, and other places of public resort.

Saint Nanda, Thirupanalvar, Sokamallar and Rohidas belonging to our fold had the opportunity to enter Temples, but this did not improve our lot. What more proof is needed to show the truth of my above statement?

“THE SERVICES AND RELIGION.”

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sr,

I for one, must make serious objection to the last sentence in your leader in the Reformer dated July 14th, headed: “The Services and Religion.” You as an intelligent Hindoo know very well that the statement: “Christ died upon the Cross to enable his Indian followers to become candidates for an Assistant Auditorship in the South Indian Railway,” is not true. You are trying to be funny, where as you are, in reality, sacrilegious. I doubt very much whether you are gaining in respect with all right thinking men, not even with impartial Hindoos, when you flippantly make such statements. Rather help us to a better understanding of one another. I think that you owe all Christians, certainly those that have read this statement, an apology. May I kindly request that you refrain from making such statements no matter what your interpretation of the Cross that Christians consider holy, may be?

Champa,
July 17, 1934. }

Yours etc.,
P. A. PENNER.

{ We quite understand our correspondent's indignation but it is misdirected. He has overlooked three small but very important words at the beginning of the sentence that he quotes and an exclamation mark at the end. The full sentence reads as follows:—“To think that Christ died upon the Cross to enable his Indian followers to become candidates for an Assistant Auditorship in the South India Railway!” The thought which offends our correspondent is not ours but that implied in the reservation of this particular appointment exclusively to communities professing Christianity. Mr. Penner's indignation should therefore be directed not towards us but towards the policy which reduces the great religions of the world to the level of qualifications for jobs.—Ed., I. S. R. }

A HILL TRIBE PROPHET.

In 1931, a man named Sri Hari Doss, professing himself to be a ‘Divine Messenger sent by God for the salvation of the hill tribes in the Agency’ was found in the Parvatipur Agency, converting large numbers of hill tribes to his creed by preaching to them that they should bathe twice a day, that they should abstain from eating meat and drinking liquor, that they should recognise him as a messenger sent by God. When it was found in the year 1931, that his influence was growing and that he was creating disturbance, he was deported to Bellary as an undesirable person by the Agent to the Governor for the Vizagapatam Agency under an Agency Warrant. Sri Hari Doss, however, managed to escape from that place almost immediately. A warrant of arrest was thereupon issued against him. The authorities strenuously endeavoured for some time to round him up but failed to find out his hiding place. In August 1932, there was definite information that Sri Hari Doss was openly visiting one village after another at the head of a band of armed Pydies who carried swords, bows and arrows, and that though he at first posed himself as a Sadhu and a Divine Messenger, had later assumed the role of a King and had declared his intention to proclaim himself as “King” of the Narayanapatnam Agency by ascending the gadi in his new “Fort” at Boriput on the Dasara day. The authorities then determined that decisive action should be taken to check the spread of the movement. Armed Reserve police of four districts were concentrated in the Agency and after a protracted campaign, Sri Hari Doss was arrested with his regal paraphernalia. He was tried in a number of cases on a number of charges and sentenced to a long aggregate period of imprisonment wherefrom he soon escaped and was recaptured in Kalahandi State only recently.

AN OPEN LETTER ON THE POONA PACT.

The following open letter addressed to Mahatma Gandhi by the Hindu young men of Punjab was delivered to him on July 12:—

Revered Mahatmaji,

On behalf of the Hindu young men of this Province we welcome you to the Capital of the Punjab. We offer you our tribute of homage and admiration for your great work in the movement for the uplift of the Harijans.

We feel constrained to tell you, however, that even your great and saintly personality and your matchless championship of this cause will be sterile because of the ‘Poona Pact’ in which the Hindu leaders in their anxiety to save your life agreed to conditions which cut at the very roots of nationalism, and which sacrifice the solidarity and the high interests of Hindu India. This Pact is a deathblow to the Hindus of Bengal and the Punjab in particular.

Mahatmaji, you never paused to make a searching enquiry into the miserable plight of the Hindus of these Provinces. Their very existence as a community is threatened by organised Muslim fanaticism and the Government's indifferentism. Their sisters and daughters are systematically abducted by Muslim rowdies. They are economically strangled. They have not the freedom even to preach and practice their own religion. Granted that there are murders and kidnappers in every community. But is there any other community in India, we ask you in all humility, which organises men and funds for defending and help them? And have you ever condemned the nefarious practices of these ruffians? We have been painfully forced to the conviction that this resurgence of fanaticism is almost entirely due to your weighty support of the Khilafat movement and your constant eagerness to be “pocketed” by Muslim communalists who masquerade as nationalist leaders.

The wave of this fierce fanaticism fanned by your obliging readiness to accept Muslim dictation has swept over British India as well as over the Hindu States and has created a veritable hell for Hindus. Witness the troubles in Kashmir, Alwar, Kapurthala and Jhind. Your offer of a blank cheque to Muslims, which is an open confession of the worst form of timidity and bankruptcy in statesmanship, has turned the heads of Muslims.

Your support of the abominable Communal Award opposed to the very first elements of nationalism and democracy has encouraged communalist Muslim leaders in their extravagant communal demands. It is a matter of surprise and grief to us that all this even did not make you pause in your scheme of unjust concessions to Muslims. But under pressure of so-called Nationalist Muslim leaders who work in concert with their communalist brethren you have not only agreed to accept the unjust and anti-national Communal Award but also to exert the pressure of your towering personality on Hindu leaders for persuading them into its acceptance.

DEPRESSED CLASSES IN TRAVANCORE.

The Travancore State Government have prepared a comprehensive scheme for the uplift of the members of the Depressed Classes in the State, which number nearly 800,000 and form one-sixth of the total population of the State.

In order to give them vested interest in the land, the Government have sanctioned concessional assignment of 'Paduval' (virgin land) in many places. The Government have also made provision for the assignment of three acres of 'Paduval' land for each depressed class family. The total area earmarked for the assignment is about 15,000 acres, of which nearly 4,000 acres have already been allotted. The Government have prohibited the alienation of such lands to prevent them from passing into the hands of money-lenders.

Special attention is paid to the spread of education among them and almost all schools in the State have been thrown open to the Depressed Classes children. Every facility has been granted to them in the shape of concession of fee. Besides, a large number of Technical schools and night schools have been started to satisfy educational needs. The organisation of Co-operative Societies to improve their economic condition has been receiving special attention.

Efforts are also being made to organize Cottage industries for their economic betterment and a Weaving School has been established at Vettikavala in the Kotaravara Taluq.

Another scheme for starting a Model colony for the members of the Depressed Classes in Trivandrum has been formulated. The proposal is being considered by the State Government and when the scheme materialises the question of starting similar colonies elsewhere in the State will be taken up.

DR. MOONJE'S CALL TO THE ORTHODOX.

In a message to the Sanatanists Dr. Moonje made the following remarks on the fast undertaken by Mahatma Gandhi:—

"M. Gandhi has announced a fast of seven days, which will be begun two days after he reaches Wardha at the end of a year's most fatiguing tour. The fast has been undertaken as a penance against the show and practice of violence towards the Sanatanist leaders, who are opposed to the methods of his movement for removal of untouchability. It is feared that there may turn up many occasions for such fasts during the course of the election campaign, which bids fair to be marked and polluted with most determined violence between the opposing sides. However, the Sanatanists must recognise and appreciate the purity of heart and engrossing solicitude for the preservation of Hindu religion and culture, as against the active aggression of the proselytising religions in India, which have inspired the movement of Mahatma Gandhi. As the Mahatma is cleansing his heart by his fast, the Sanatanists also should cleanse theirs and protect, consolidate and broad-base their very religion and culture, for which they have thought it their sacred duty to oppose a saintly soul like the Mahatma. They must announce complete eradication of untouchability, as the Hindu Mahasabha has done; so that we may all combine together to save this old religion and culture from sure extinction, which otherwise faces them. Let the so called untouchables who still have faith in and love for their fore-fathers' religion, be brought into line with the other touchable castes in the Hindu community, and a combined and intensive movement be started to bring about an organic unity and consolidation, i. e., Sangathan amongst the Hindus. We all should pray to God for health and long life of the Mahatma."

NOTES

Unfair to the Aga Khan:—A member of the Legislative Assembly asked Government this week whether it was the fact that H. H. the Aga Khan had made a request to be given a State in recognition of his services to the Empire. The Political Secretary to Government replied that they had received a confidential communication from the Aga Khan, the contents of which they could not disclose. A maladroitness intervention by another member provoked the retort that the Government Department was not responsible for the leakage of the information and that there were many other avenues by which it could have leaked out. A similar question was put in the House of Commons the next day and the Secretary of State for India negligently replied that he had nothing to add to the reply given in the Legislative Assembly at Simla. But Sir Samuel Hoare's opponents are alert, and one of them promptly asked how many other supporters of the White Paper scheme had applied for States. Sir Samuel Hoare was evidently taken aback and replied in a somewhat confused way that the imputation conveyed in the question was improper. The Government here and in Britain have thus unfortunately given colour to the rumour that the Aga Khan asked for a State in reward for his services to the empire. A little reflection will show that this is totally out of keeping with the character of His Highness as an Indian leader of outstanding eminence and as spiritual head of a flourishing religious sect which has followers in many lands. As the Aga Khan has so far thought it not worth while to give his own version, it is not for any one else to guess what it might be. But we are sure that the contents of his communication were essentially different from what they have been made out to be and that they were conceived in the public, rather than in his own personal, interest. One ingenious friend went so far as to suggest that His Highness had requested to be made ruler of Sind, excluding Karachi Port and the Sukkur Barrage. Even with these two, Sind will, it is estimated, continue to be a deficit province for many years, and it is highly improbable that the Aga Khan, who certainly knows what he is about, would covet the rulership of the series of deserts which is Sind.

A Political Prodigy:—The impossible has happened. A vacancy has arisen in the membership of the Bombay Legislative Council owing to the promotion or demotion of responsible Minister Cooper to irresponsible Member of Executive Council. This is a vicious, unconstitutional practice calculated to impair the independence of popular representatives. That is by the way. Mr. Soman who stands for the seat vacated by Mr. Cooper in the Legislative Council has, according to Dewan Bahadur Lathe, the support of non-Brahmins, the Congress party and the Liberals in the Southern Division. Mr. Soman has had a portrait and a biographical sketch published in the Mahratta and is a Brahmin. That he should have the support of non-Brahmins, Liberals, the political alias of non-Congress Brahmins, and of Congressmen is a noteworthy achievement auguring well for the future. If this is possible in the Karnatak, it must be possible elsewhere.

Representation of the Depressed Classes:—Our leading article to-day deals with Dewan Bahadur Ramaswamy Mudaliar's second electoral address in which he spoke of the claims of minority communities and the failure of attempts to arrive at a settlement of them. In the same address, he commented on Gandhiji's opposition at the Second Round Table Conference even to reservation of seats for the Depressed Classes in the legislature. It came upon us also as a surprise. But it is not difficult to understand his point of view. He returned to India, determined to launch a powerful movement to influence caste Hindu opinion. He was not able to do so. What happened in the twelve or thirteen days which intervened between Gandhiji's leaving London and reaching Bombay, is a mystery. The Dewan Bahadur said in his speech that the second session of the Round Table Conference came to a disastrous end, "not because the Conservatives were in power, not because Sir Samuel Hoare took the position of the master and the Premier was washed out of the picture and not certainly because the Britishers turned hostile to us, but primarily because the communities could not come together, the trusted lieutenants of Gandhiji threw him overboard, did not show confidence in him and everybody in the whole world knew that we met with disastrous failure over the minorities problem." Even the high authority of the Dewan Bahadur will not suffice to convince observers, Indian as well as foreign, that the replacement of Mr. Wedgwood Benn by Sir Samuel Hoare, as the head of the India Office and its spokesman at the Conference, for instance, did not mean a material change in the atmosphere of the Round Table Conference. Neither Dr. Moonje nor Raja Narendranath can be described as ever having been lieutenants of Gandhiji. We must say that the Dewan Bahadur's opinion is strongly biased against the Hindu Mahasabha people in the first place and in the next against Congressmen.

Gandhiji's Fast:—The Indian Witness complains that we did not express an opinion on Gandhiji's decision to fast on account of the assault on a Sanatanist by a Harijan Sangh Volunteer at Ajmer. It writes: "The Social Reformer says 'we trust the objects with which he has made this resolve will be fulfilled.' It also refers to the fast as undertaken "in expiation of the violence offered to a Sanatanist leader." Does the Editor believe the fast can make expiation for the violence? There is no way to tell. He does not say." On seeing the announcement of the decision, Mr. Natarajan telegraphed to Gandhiji at Karachi: "No call for penitential observance. Condemnation sufficient. Pray desist." Gandhiji replied: "Thanks wire. Read statement. Cause too great for overlooking Ajmer neglect duty." Obviously there was nothing more to be said. The Witness states the Christian position as being that, while one person cannot make expiation for the sins of others, if by his fast Gandhiji can bring the offender to repentance, that is to be desired. We suppose Gandhiji wants not only to bring the volunteer in this particular case to repentance but to warn others not to do as he did in future. As for one person not being able to make expiation for the sins of others, the Witness, of course, regards Jesus Christ as an exception. Many Hindus believe that vicarious satisfaction is of general application. So also many Muslims. There is the classic incident of Babar calling upon himself the illness of his son, Humayun, and dying of it.

Muslims in Railway Services:—An Associated Press message of the 20th explained why no Muslim was selected to undergo special training in the United Kingdom in the batch of six who were recently sent up. There were ten candidates of whom one was a Muslim, and he stood ninth in the order of merit and did not attain qualifying standard. This would be sufficient explanation ordinarily. But Government have undertaken to have 33½ per cent. of appointments reserved for minority communities, of which 22 or 25 per cent is allotted to Muslims. In the present case four Hindus and two Anglo-Indians were selected on their merits. It is now claimed that, as one-third of the six nominations went to members of a minority community, namely, Anglo-Indians, none was available for the Muslim. If this interpretation is the right one, the one-third of appointments reserved for minority communities may all be absorbed by Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and persons of non-Asiatic origin, and the position of Muslims in the services will be in no way improved. According to the recent resolution of the Government of India, one at least of the appointments should have been given to a Muslim even if he did not attain the qualifying standards. Anglo-Indians are only entitled to 9 per cent, and one would be more than that. It will, no doubt, be a serious risk to appoint an unqualified person to the traffic services. But this should have been thought of, and these services exempted from the scope of the recent resolution. The explanation will not serve the purpose intended, namely, avoid further criticism of Muslim representation on Railway services.

Communal Representation in Judicial Services:—The Times of India in a leading article has urged the exclusion of the Judicial services from communal distribution. The Times has chiefly in view judges of the High Courts. But of the enormous volume of litigation in the country, only a small percentage goes before High Courts. The arguments advanced for excluding communal considerations in the selection of High Court Judges, therefore, apply with much greater force to the District judiciary. These arguments, however, ignore one important fact, namely, that, as Judges as a rule work in public, have nearly always a strong bar to assist them in the discharge of their duties, and are aware that their decisions are liable to be scrutinised by higher courts, their incompetence is likely to do less injury to the public than that of Executive officials who work behind the purdah and, for all practical purposes, are sure of being protected by their superiors from the consequences of their errors. A stupid judge will be a greater trial to himself than to the public. He will have to face day after day a Bar which will not be long in making him feel what opinion it has of him. This, and the publicity of procedure, are safeguards against incompetency which do not exist in the case of executive ineptitude. Indeed, the executive officer who acts before he knows the facts, is likely to acquire the reputation of being a strong man. The Judicial Bench is, from the public point of view, the safest place for communal selections with minimum qualifications.

Congress and Khaddar:—Difficulty is being experienced in enforcing the rule that only those members who wear khaddar (hand-spun, hand-woven cloth) can participate in Congress elections. Owing to the comparatively high price of hand-spun cloth, many persons recently enrolled could not afford to buy it. In order, however, to satisfy the rule, election organizers in Allahabad and elsewhere kept sets of Kurtas and Dhotis for the voters to wear at the time of election. Gandhiji's attention having been drawn to this practice, he strongly condemned it as tantamount to cheating. Only habitual wearers of khaddar, he said, should vote in the elections. A man may be very capable and intelligent but unless he wears khaddar he is to be prevented from serving his country, so far as the Congress is concerned !

Kirpans for Girls:—In view of the frequency of abduction cases, Mrs. K. Kaul in a letter to the Hindustan Times suggests that a young woman should keep a kirpan with her "hidden somewhere near her waist." She continues: "She should learn to use it and should not hesitate to put it into operation as and when the opportunity may unfortunately arise. I do not know if other girls, besides my Sikh sisters, are entitled to keep it under the law. If the law allows it, so far so good, and if it does not, it is the duty of every member of the Legislative Assembly to get such a law passed whereby the weaker sex, to whichever class or community she may happen to belong, may be allowed to keep the kirpan with her as a safeguard for her person and honour. And I am sure when once or twice the goondas are stabbed at the hands of the weaker sex, such accidents will never happen. The goondas have no courage, and the knowledge of the dagger being present with the girls will keep them at a respectful distance." The kirpan is a knife about nine inches long which it is the religious duty of every Sikh, man, woman and child, to wear as a part of their dress. The Arms Act specially permits this in the case of the Sikhs. The law will have to be amended to permit of girls of all communities to wear the kirpan. The wearing of the kirpan will instil a wholesome fear not only in goonda abductors, but also in unloving husbands.

A Problem of Co-education:—The Rajshahi College is open to students of both sexes as most Indian Colleges are. Professor Shivkumar Shastri, son of the Principal and Honorary Professor in Civics, found one day that his class in the girls' section was empty. The Professor reported the matter to his father, the Principal, who deputed the Vice-Principal to enquire into the reasons for this apparent boycott of Professor Sastri's Civic class. He found that on that day only one girl attended the college. On being questioned, she said that she felt shy to attend the young Professor's class alone. The Principal, when this was reported to him, fined her three rupees for her "impertinence" and threatened her with expulsion in case of recurrence of such offence. We do not see any "impertinence" in the girl's excuse, though it is surprising that a college girl should feel shy before her Professor.

Death of Nepal Minister's Wife:—The wife of the Nepal Minister at the British Court died at a Nursing Home on Tuesday the 17th July. She was seriously ill even when she left India. Hindu custom requires that the dead should be cremated of as soon as possible. No meals can be cooked or eaten in a house in which there is a corpse. On Wednesday the funeral rites were performed according to orthodox Hindu usage. Princess Shamshere Jung's funeral in the village of St. John's, Working is believed to be the first open air cremation in England. The body was taken in procession along the half-mile village street which was thronged by the inhabitants. The children picked up silver and copper coins ceremonially scattered along the route. The pyre erected behind canvas screens, was made of sandal and other rare woods, says a Reuter's message. In the absence of her husband in Italy, the Nepalese General was the chief mourner. The ashes will be taken to India and be deposited in the Ganges. General Shamshere Jung, accompanied by his suite, arrived in London from Italy on Thursday. He bore obvious traces of grief at the death of his wife, but in accordance with Nepalese custom there was no mourning and the General carried on the usual duties of the Legation.

A Liquor Abolition Resolution Disallowed:—Mr. J. F. Edwards writes in Dyanodaya:—"We are sorry to note in an Associated Press message from Simla dated July 17 that the Governor-General has disallowed in the Legislative Assembly a resolution of which notice was given by Mr. Gunjal which 'proposed the abolition of all liquor shops.' Apparently the resolution is disallowed 'on the ground that the matter does not primarily concern the Governor-General in Council.' This is one more proof of our contention in the Memorandum we have sent to the Select Committee in London on India's new constitution, that even the Viceroy of India has not the power to allow either a non-official Bill which affects revenues, or any Bill in the All-India Legislative Assembly which deals with a Provincial question such as liquor. It illustrates also another of our contentions, that not until Drink Reform is saved from 'falling between two stools' in the Central and Provincial Governments will the Drink Reform that India desires be found possible. Friction between these two sets of authorities must cease by the Central Government administering a united Excise policy, thereby ensuring public morality on the Drink Question. 'This was done in the case of opium,' as Mr. Frederick Grubb of London agrees in the May-June issue of the Indian Temperance News in a reference to our Memorandum, 'in spite of the fact that several States in Central India depended largely on that source of revenue.'"

What For?—The Servant of India thinks that the Congress members of the next Legislative Assembly intend to do exactly what the others declare they will, namely, work the White Paper scheme if it survives their efforts to kill it. Then why the slapping of things, squaring of shoulders and twisting of shaven or unshaven mustachios by the Congress propagandists?

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, JULY 28, 1934.

COMMUNAL AWARD.

By way of preparing his electorate to cast its vote intelligently at the forthcoming election for the Legislative Assembly, Dewan Bahadur Ramaswamy Mudaliar has been delivering a series of addresses dealing with the important aspects of the political situation. We referred last week to his first address in which he dwelt on the grave tasks which awaited the next Assembly and the duty of the electors to return the best and ablest men irrespective of party. He devoted his second address to the Communal Award and the circumstances which led to its being given by the Prime Minister on behalf of the British Cabinet. The Dewan Bahadur began with a melancholy narrative of the infructuous attempts previous to the Round Table Conference made in India to arrive at a settlement of communal claims in constitutional reform. He next referred to the first Round Table Conference and described in piquant language how at about 1 a. m. one morning, Dr. Moonje's hesitancy destroyed a settlement which had been agreed upon by all other delegates as the result of strenuous talks on board the ship by which they sailed to London and on arrival in London. Yet they were not discouraged. They returned to India determined to find a solution. Incidentally, the Dewan Bahadur hinted that it was the efforts of the delegates at the first Conference that led to Congress being invited to the second Conference and also to the conclusion of the Gandhi-Irwin Pact. The second Conference met full of hopes inspired by Gandhiji's presence. A Minority Committee was constituted. Gandhiji was on that Committee. After several meetings, it was proposed that a small Committee of three or five delegates should be appointed to arbitrate on the several communal claims. The Muslims agreed. Dr. Moonje, however, again played the role of marplot. He and two others, a Hindu and a Sikh, "conveyed the distinct impression" that they had no confidence in Mahatma Gandhi who was to have been one of the arbitrators. This also was enacted at 1 a. m. Gandhiji himself, when he reported the failure of the Committee next day to the Conference, attributed it to the non-representative composition of the Indian delegation. The Dewan Bahadur criticised Gandhiji for questioning the representative character of the delegates after having worked with them for many days. He also criticised Gandhiji's opposition to the reservation of seats for antayajās as another cause of the failure to reach a minorities settlement. The so-called "Minorities Pact" was the direct consequence. The Prime Minister was then asked to decide and that was how the "Communal Award" came to be given.

It is natural that the Dewan Bahadur who played an important part in these negotiations and in the sessions of the Round Table Conference, should regard them as heaven-sent opportunities which had been sacrificed by the perversity of some of his fellow-delegates. It is, however, the fact that many people in this country felt extremely doubtful about the utility of holding a Conference of this kind in London. Lest we should be accused of being wise after the event, we quote the following sentence from the leading article in the Reformer of September 6th 1930:—"There is a considerable body of opinion in support of holding the Conference in India where the delegates will be in contact with the currents of feeling among their own people and alive to the absolute need of having Indian public opinion behind them." After pointing out how the original idea of the Conference had been whittled down, we observed in the same article "with the changes now adopted, its character as an authoritative body has been considerably lowered and the chances of its coming to acceptable or even definite decisions made more remote." We are not, therefore, surprised that the delegates of the Round Table Conference in London failed in their attempts to reach a communal settlement which we have not been able to do in India even after repeated attempts. The Dewan Bahadur showed less than his usual perspicacity in trying to make Dr. Moonje the scape-goat for the failure. If Dr. Moonje had signed the settlement at the first Conference, it would have made no substantial difference in the result which followed. The Dewan Bahadur attaches excessive importance to the part played by individuals, whereas the forces which guide and control individuals are deep-rooted in history. The Hindu Muslim question bears a different aspect to the Sikh, the Rajput and the Mahratta from what it does to an inhabitant of Tamil Nadu. It is really not one problem but several problems. If it concerned only the Tamil country, Dewan Bahadur Ramaswamy Mudaliar's observations would be thoroughly well conceived, including that which declared a Pan-Islamic Indian Muslim to be not a "proper Muslim." Said the Dewan Bahadur, "If there is any Muslim who turns his eyes westward, who speaks in pan-Islamic language and tries to adopt the patriotism of Turkey or Persia, then we say—and I trust the vast majority of Muslims will say—that he is not a proper Muslim or a national or a patriotic Muslim." Friends are sometimes surprised that we are not so keen about joint electorates as many others are. The reason is that we feel that Muslims who hold that without separate electorates their interests will not get adequate protection, have some justification for their opinion. The distrust between Hindus and Muslims can be overcome only by their working together for a considerable period for common ends. Such collaboration is, of course, more easy with joint than with separate electorates. But it is not impossible even with separate electorates, and in the present circumstances we should try to do this rather than concentrate our efforts to get rid of separate electorates.

We agree with the Dewan Bahadur that the minority problem in India is essentially different from that of the newly established states in Europe. The fear of racial, religious and cultural oppression against which the minorities in European countries have to be protected, and for which the League of Nations formula was devised, does not exist in this country. "It seems to me idle to suggest," said the Dewan Bahadur, "that a Hindu majority might ever be in a position to persecute or prosecute a Muslim minority on religious grounds. That has not been our tradition. We have admitted into our country every religionist and allowed him to thrive without any restrictions. It is the proud privilege of Hinduism that, throughout its long career and existence, it has held fast to its high tenets; it has given shelter and hospitality to the persecuted of all other nations. And, therefore, it is idle to suggest that what the minorities are really afraid of is religious persecution when once we get powers." This is admirably put. What is it then that the Indian minorities want protection for? Said the Dewan Bahadur: "They want to feel secure that, within any constitution that may be given to us, by any majority rule that may be adopted in this country, they will also have a place under the sun, and, whether they are right or not in claiming these privileges, statesmanship, wisdom, and political sagacity require that minorities should have that feeling satisfied and must have a sense of security that their position will not be jeopardised under any constitution." The Dewan Bahadur here lapses into vague words which is not usual with him. The argument that whether they are right or not, sagacity and statesmanship consists in humouring them is not one which can be accepted. The Dewan Bahadur's Party, the Justice Party, was not founded on this principle. As for the desire of minorities to have "a place under the sun," an examination of their demands would show that what they want is rather a "place under the shade." We do not mind separate electorates, but we are totally opposed to the principle of weightages because these, as the Dewan Bahadur remarked in another part of his speech, could only come from the share of the majority community. A Legislature which does not represent the natural distribution of the population, can carry no moral weight or possess no lasting authority in the country. The Dewan Bahadur and those who honestly share his views, may roll the stone to the top of the constitutional eminence, but they will find it a hard job to keep it there for any length of time.

THE OXFORD GROUP.

For some time past, much has been heard of what is called the Oxford Group. The Oxford Group has nothing to do with the Oxford movement. The latter is a Catholic revival within the Church of England while the former is a campaign for the revival of the practice among men of the truths of simple Christianity. It has nothing to do with Oxford either. Dr. Frank Buchman, a Lutheran Minister came to England from America a dissatisfied man, feeling that his work for the spiritual and social welfare of young men there had been seriously hampered by a difference of opinion with a governing committee. Whilst in England, says the anonymous author of "What is the Oxford Group?" he caught a vision of a Christ-led world untrammelled by sin. Dr. Buchman, unlike other people who have had a similar vision, resolved to make it a practical reality. It meant the cutting of all personal ties, the sublimation of his personal ambitions and making the wide world the only place he could call home. After several years spent in this way he went to Cambridge in England and with two undergraduates whom he "converted," he went to Oxford. That was the origin of the name, Oxford Group. It was at Oxford that the practice grew up of "House Parties" which play so great a part in the movement. These House Parties are held at certain intervals in various countries. They are cosmopolitan. Guests at these house parties are treated as guests; they meet on an equal social footing whatever may be their social status outside. Individual spiritual needs are, we are told, attended to in a sensible and business-like way. All are allowed to contribute their views. There are no strict rules as to admission to these parties. All are free to come and go and do as they wish. There is no special dress and there is no subscription to be paid. The Oxford Group is not a religion. It has no temples, no endowments. Its workers have no salaries, no plans but God's plans. The word 'Sin' is the keyword of this movement. Sin is defined as anything that keeps us from God or from one another. The consequences of sin are incalculable. The Oxford Group maintains that 'I' or the ego is the secret of the power of sin. Individually self-interest is the causation of the world of sin. Absolute surrender to God brings peace of mind.

The above paragraph is put together from the book, "What is the Oxford Group," mostly in the words of the author who calls himself "A Layman with a Notebook." Most of the ideas can be paralleled almost word for word from the scriptures of other religions, notably the Hindu scriptures. In fact, one is almost tempted to think that the main ideas of this group are derived from Hindu sources. It is said that Mrs. Eddy, the founder of Christian Science, in the first edition of her book, acknowledged her indebtedness to Hindu philosophy. But this was omitted in subsequent editions in order not to prejudice the movement in the eyes of the American public. Surrender to God, the ego is the cause of all sin, sin is something which comes between man and God, are all familiar to Hinduism. The idea of sin itself is analysed in Hinduism and found to be ignorance and the removal of ignorance is the way to enlightenment. The one thing that is new in the Oxford Group is the importance attached to the confession of one's sin to another member of the Group. This is not like the Catholic Confession but simply a frank avowal to a fellow groupist of whatever lies as a burden upon one's soul. Sharing.

we are warned at the same time, "does not mean divulging indiscretions which involve other people by name. It means confessing our part in our sinning. Placing the blame on others and making excuses for our weakness is not sharing, it is merely negative selfish talk." Rather paradoxically it is also argued by the author that "the discovery that our sins are often the sins of our neighbour gives a particularly healthy outlook to the young." The Oxford Group is at the same time opposed to any exhibitionism of ourselves even in talking about sin. The other ideas in the book too are nothing new. In fact it is very difficult for outsiders to understand the extraordinary claims that are made for the effect of this movement on many thousands of lives. We note with special interest the observation about the visit of a team of the Group to South Africa. It is claimed that this visit resulted in the bringing about of better racial understanding and reforms which would have a lasting effect on the life of the Dominion. A well-known South African statesman is quoted as saying that if the work of the Group continues to grow in South Africa during the next few years as it has in the past, there will soon be no racial problem there. We fervently hope that he is right. When people say that a particular religious thought or practice has brought peace to their souls, it is not for others to question the fact. We are bound to accept the claims put forward in this book for the Oxford Group. There can be a similar movement in every religion with Buddha, Sri Krishna or the Arabian Prophet as the central inspiring figure. We do not know whether there is any team of this Group working in India as yet, but if there is, we should like to know more of it.

The propositions about honesty, sincerity, love, restitution, sex and so on, contained in this little book, will find universal acceptance, and every one of us would be better for attempting to put them into practice as much as possible. But the author himself shows that few could wholly succeed in the attempt. One of the best men of our acquaintance used to say that he had only one principle in life and that was to tell as few lies as possible. He was really a very truthful man but he would not claim to be a satyagrahi. The problem of the would-be Groupist is to find another who is truly a "changed man," and not a "rogue in grain veneered with sanctimonious theory." In India we have what is perhaps the least fallible test for a spiritual teacher. He must have renounced the world. Even so there are many pretenders. In the Oxford Group, overt acts of renunciation are discouraged. Frank Buchman is not an ascetic, says the author. He wears no distinctive garb, affects no unusual manner, and makes no claim to an unusual personality. There is more laughter in House Parties than at many social gatherings. There are no prohibitions, not even against liquor and gambling. From one point of view, the Oxford Group may be described as "Religion made Easy" or "Religion Without Tears." "What is the Oxford Group" is a book worth reading even by those who may find it a collection of copy-book maxims amplified and elaborated with great ingenuity.

Prof. P. Lakshminarasu:—We regret to record the death which took place recently at Madras of Prof. P. Lakshminarasu at his residence in Mint Street, Georgetown. The late Mr. Lakshminarasu was wellknown as an educationist having been for a long time Professor of Science in the Pachaiyappa's College. He was a great pioneer of the social reform movement and took an active interest in the work of the South Indian Buddhist Association of which he was the President till the time of his death.

SOCIAL WORK IN BOMBAY •

(By S. S. PATKAR.)

The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association was founded in the year 1900 after the death of Mr. Justice Ranade. The Ranade Memorial Fund formed the nucleus of the fund of the Association. For nearly two decades the association was doing very useful work under the guidance of Sir Narayan Chandavarkar. Other funds were also collected vis., Madhavdas Raghunathdas Memorial Fund, Temperance Fund and the Hindu Widows Fund. It appears that latterly during the last fourteen years the Association was not so active as before and the number of members was considerably reduced. Owing to the efforts of the Secretaries—particularly of Mr. Y. V. Bhandarkar—the number of members has considerably increased this year.

Last year besides the celebration of the Anniversary of the passing of the Widow Remarriage Act, the Association arranged a series of public lectures on various subjects of social reform and sent representations to the proper authorities in connection with the bills on the Legislative anvil relating to matters of Social Reform.

It would not be inappropriate to refer to some of the bills relating to the burning questions of the day.

Our Association was in favour of the Devadasi Bill which will be introduced in the Legislative Council by Rao Bahadur S. K. Bole. The bill purports inter alia to render illegal the performance of the ceremony having the effect of dedication of a woman Devadasi in a Hindu temple, and to render legal the subsequent marriage of a Devadasi notwithstanding her going through the ceremony of dedication as a Devadasi.

Our Association also sent considered opinions on the Temple Entry Bill by C. S. Ranga Iyer and the Abolition of Untouchability Bill by Rao Bahadur M. C. Raja.

Attempts are made to include members of the depressed classes within the pale of Hinduism on political and other grounds, but they are denied the exercise of the minimum of natural elementary rights on the ground of religion, usage and custom. The elementary human rights including touchability cannot be secured to the depressed classes merely by means of persuasion of the higher classes. They cannot at present be enforced in a court of law. Though there is considerable change in public opinion and also the usage as observable in railway carriages, public restaurants and conveyances, the courts will enforce the usage so far as public temples and wells are concerned. In order to remove these disabilities in respect of public temples, wells or other places of public resort or in relation to any public convenience, utility or service, there is no course open except recourse to legislation to secure to the depressed classes the elementary human rights.

It appears that a large number of petitions have been forwarded against the bills. On this point I may refer to the remarks of Sir John Peter Grant on 12th July 1856, on the occasion of the Widow Remarriage Bill. Sir John Peter Grant observed "that he believed that there were upwards of 40 petitions against the bill signed by from 50,000 to 60,000 persons; in favour of the bill there were upwards of 25 petitions signed by more than 5,000 persons. If he knew certainly that but one little girl would be saved from the horrors of the life she led by the passing of the Act, he would pass it for her sake. If he believed, as firmly as he believed the contrary, that the Act would be wholly a dead letter, he would pass it for the sake of the English name." During the course of the discussion of the same bill, Sir Barnes Peacock pointed out circumstances under which the legislature was bound to interfere with religious customs. He observed:—"When the commission of an act or the omission of a duty would be an offence against society, a political Government interfered to prevent that act or omission. But it did it for the protection of society, not for the protection of religion."

With reference to the proclamation of Her Majesty the Queen Empress on which strong reliance is placed by the sanatanists, it is pertinent to observe that the proclamation promises to see that none shall be molested or disquieted by reason of his religious faith and observances and that "All alike shall enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law," and further gives a pledge to paying only "due regard" to the ancient rights, usages and customs of India "generally in framing and administering the law." But "due regard" does not mean unconditional or implicit regard but only regard which is proper i. e., consistent with reason, justice and humanity. If the government and the legislature do not protect any of the subjects from outrageous and inhuman acts when such acts are either sanctioned or enjoined by religion, or does not secure the enjoyment of elementary human rights to any of the subjects on account of social or priestly tyranny, it would amount to paying an "undue regard" to ancient rights, usages and customs however objectionable and reprehensible they may be on the ground of reason, justice and humanity.

There is another point to which I would like to refer on this occasion. There is a loud and persistent complaint that there is a wholesale defiance of the Sarda Act. The offence under the Sarda Act is not a cognizable offence. The Magistrate can take cognizance of the offence only on a complaint made in that behalf. It is therefore the duty of Social Reform Associations or Vigilance Committees if any in the different towns and cities to make proper complaints in cases of flagrant defiance of the Act.

I would like on this occasion to indicate the channels in which our association should work in the near future.

One of the objects of our association is to promote the cause of Temperance. The vice of drink is more prevalent among the mill-hands and the backward and depressed classes. I do not suggest that it does not exist in the higher classes. I would suggest that mill-hands and members of the backward and depressed classes should be invited to send prize essays on the question of temperance and total prohibition, and prizes should be awarded by our association. Another suggestion I would make is that magic lantern slides and also cinema films should be prepared with a view to emphasize the evils of drink, and shows should be arranged in the quarters inhabited by mill-hands and backward classes and Harijans.

The movement of social reform is mostly confined to the higher classes. Social reform ideas should be made to permeate through the lower classes. Effort should be made by means of preachers and lecturers to carry wholesome and progressive ideas into the lower strata of society. Ideas of the dignity and the rights of women should be popularised in order to prevent regrettable instances of beating and cruelty to women in the lower classes.

If funds are available, a widows' home should be started in Bombay to facilitate widow remarriages.

It appears that when the object to be attained is acquisition of higher social or political rights, the pursuit of that object is all engrossing or a pleasant one. But when the question arises as to concession of rights to others with or without diminution of one's rights, the matter assumes a different aspect. It is now increasingly realised in many quarters that social and moral progress is absolutely necessary for national uplift. It is a very encouraging sign of the times that women are taking a more prominent part in social, political and educational movements. I would therefore appeal to enlightened ladies and gentlemen to assist this association in furthering the cause of social reform. If our Association does substantial work in furtherance of the objects of our association, I have no doubt that the number of members of our Association is bound to increase.

INDIA'S MISSION.

(By MRS. I. J. PITT.)

It is not only the authors of "The Rise and Fulfilment of British Rule in India" who believe that a resuscitated India with free scope for her self-expression has a specific contribution to make to the comity of nations, but all who know her well will agree with this dictum. And what is her unique quality?

Surely it must be that which is so forcibly brought home to the observant Westerner who has come into close contact with the people. It is, to use an oft-repeated phrase, her "genius for religion." Truly in the West there are saints who have sounded the heights and depths of religion to as full an extent as any in India, but the "masses" are not inherently religious, they must acquire it. To give two illustrations:—

The writer was taking an evening walk, accompanied by a Hindu school boy. The passing by an old temple gave rise to questions asked regarding the Shaivite sect. Other boys strolling that way, joined us, and with eager interest listened and contributed information to the enquirer. Another: Every evening the Munsif, the Headmaster, the Vakils, the doctor and the writer were accustomed to meet in a Brahmin musician's house for reading and discussion of Hindu scriptures; some or other always attended, and would stay on talking to the late hours. Imagine our English schoolboys eagerly discussing religion on the road, and our village or town magnates giving up every evening to a Bible class! One's wildest flights of fancy do not reach that! Who living amongst a Hindu community but does not observe that with the unsophisticated the spiritual world is the Reality, the material, the unreal, the transitory, and that this recognition is part of the very fibre of their active lives; and that ability which enables many a simple illiterate to grasp easily a metaphysical abstraction.

Without being concerned here as to whether their lives are more moral than other people's, the fact remains that the invisible world is to them the real. That spirit is greater than mind or matter.

If asked to give proof for this belief these people would look astonished, they take it for granted, as they do the functioning of their bodily organs. Such a one and his questioner might be compared with a lover of music and a friend who had no ear for music whatever. Let us suppose this friend saying, "What is this music that you tell me produces in you exhilaration, ecstasy, and enralls you absolutely? All I can hear is a lot of chaotic sounds, conveying not the least meaning to me. Unless you can give me proof that these sounds are capable of producing the alleged effects, I must conclude that you and all musicians are victims of a delusion."

The music lover might reply, "So be it, I can only assert that I know that I have spoken the truth. I can give you no proof. As you are deficient in the musical sense, to re-iterate the experience of these who are musical is only to speak to you in a strange language. If you have faith in our bonafides you will take our word on trust; if not, not." The "things of the spirit" can be only discerned by the spirit. If that become atrophied by disuse, or lying dormant, or perhaps non-existent the language of the spiritual world will be mere gibberish.

Is it not India who speaks this language with the greatest proficiency who should teach it to a world where the powers of evil are mustering all their forces to destroy the angels: to fill puny man with a colossal pride, by which he imagines he can dispense with the incomprehensible, scorn the supernatural and evolve a religion out of himself, which is to have no creeds, no dogmas, leading to a state "moth-eaten with liberty" as T. S. Eliot calls it? "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God," but even fools can understand that every man a law unto himself, and every man allowed uncontrolled self-expression, means chaos and anarchy and that the only check upon this, which is available to them is to standardise humanity, suppress individuality, induce group-mentality—in short, soul slavery.

But the starved soul must have an object of worship, a God and a religion. Or they will worship a man, or the machine, as in Russia; and for a religion, a concoction compounded of materialism and sentimentalism, as served up by Bertrand Russell, for instance. All those with eyes to see can discern in the modern world how all this works out where it has been tried.

Is India preparing herself for this spiritual mission? Are none of her sons falling under the attraction of an outwardly alluring form, which speaks with the voice of the charmer, of liberty and a universal religion without God, while they discern not that the bright coloured vesture clothes a skeleton?

A CO-OPERATIVE COLONY FOR MAHARS

(BY VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA)

Among the places visited by Mahatma Gandhi during his recent stay in Bombay was the Colony of Konkanaatha Mahars at Pali Danda in Bandra. The colony comprises nearly one hundred families who have put up thatched huts of their own on a site at the foot of the Pali Hill. In 1918, they were allowed temporarily the use of this Government land. Since then they pay to Government a monthly rent of Rs. 1 per cottage. Government are prepared to consider their request for the permanent use of the site provided they construct pucca buildings on approved lines. The colonists who are mostly employed in the Railway Work-shops and in Mills are anxious to remain on the present site and put up permanent buildings out of their little savings. These savings of persons with a monthly income of Rs. 20/- to Rs. 40/- are naturally not substantial and the proposal has, therefore, been put forward that the colonists should form a Co-operative Housing Society. The society will borrow funds for the purpose from Government or other sources and purchase the site from Government, construct the buildings and manage the property until the liabilities are met.

A beginning has been made in this direction and 30 persons have made a formal application to the Registrar of Co-operative Societies for the registration of the proposed society. During a period of three months a sum of Rs. 925/- has been contributed by members and deposited with the Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank, Ltd. Plans and estimates have been drawn up for the cottages and informal discussion carried on with the Collector, Bombay Suburban District for the purchase of land and for the grant of a loan. It is understood that in view of the special circumstances, a Government loan may be made available to the extent of three-fourths the cost of the land and the buildings, as a special concession the rate of interest may be reduced to 5 per cent, and the period of repayment extended to 40 years. The land is to be made available also on special terms, being required by a Harijan Community, and the price is estimated at Rs. 1/- per square yard.

According to the estimates the total cost of the land will be Rs. 7,500/- at Rs. 250/- per cottage. Two types of cottages are proposed, ten for those who can afford to pay a larger monthly instalment of Rs. 10/- and twenty for those who will pay a monthly instalment of Rs. 5/-. The cost of the former will be Rs. 10,000/- and for the latter also Rs. 10,000/-. The total cost of the buildings will thus be Rs. 20,000/-. If a Co-operative Housing Society can be registered, Government will grant a loan of Rs. 20,625/- but that is conditional on the remaining one-fourth or Rs. 6,875/- being secured at the outset. The members are prepared to put by as much as possible from their monthly saving and by the time the Society commences operations they expect to raise Rs. 2,400/-, Rs. 1,200/- being contributed by the ten intending occupants of the larger cottages and Rs. 1,200/- by the twenty occupants of the smaller cottages. The Co-operative Department cannot, however, register the society unless the members raise the whole of the guarantee fund themselves or secure donations for the purpose. The members wish to borrow the amount required and have no desire to secure donations, but the condition imposed regarding registration makes it incumbent on them to seek assistance in the form of donations. The scheme, as framed, contemplates the refund of these donations in a period of five to seven years, as the monthly payments proposed to be made by members cover repayment of this amount. The total amount required is Rs. 4,475/- and this appeal is addressed to all who are interested in the welfare of Harijans, in which the improvement of housing conditions plays a very prominent part to assist in the scheme by giving some substantial help. The Mahar Colonists are ready to help themselves and only need some initial help to comply with the requirements of the law under which they seek registration of their housing scheme.

Donations may be sent to the Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank, Ltd., (Post Box No. 472) for being placed to the credit of the Society's account.

Indian Position in Zanzibar:—It is understood that in view of the paucity of information regarding the Indian position in Zanzibar as affected by the recently proposed legislation, the Government of India are likely to ask Kunwar Sir Mahars Singh, their Agent General in South Africa, to proceed to Zanzibar to conduct an inquiry on the spot and to make recommendations to the Government of India to enable them to take up the matter with the Colonial Office.

THE ABOLITION OF LICENSED HOUSES.

The League of Nations has gone on record as being opposed to the maintenance of the system of licensed houses of prostitution, which is still in force in many countries. This view was adopted by the League Committee on the Traffic in Women on the basis of a report prepared by the Social Section of the League Secretariat on information collected in reply to questionnaires and from investigations done on the spot in a number of towns in which licensed houses have been abolished.

The report gives evidence in reply to the question: What, in actual practice, have been the consequences of the abolition of the system of licensed houses? It contains the results of an enquiry in fifteen European towns in which licensed houses have been abolished or have never existed. Different types of towns were chosen—state capitals, seaports, garrison towns, cosmopolitan centres—from a number of countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Estonia, France, Germany, Latvia, Netherlands, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland. Information on recent developments with regard to the abolition of licensed houses in port towns or colonies of the British Empire was furnished in the survey prepared by the British Social Hygiene Council. The information collected refers to the following points:

- (1) Date of the abolition of the system of licensed houses and measures taken with regard to the inmates of the establishments which were closed;
- (2) Laws and regulations at present in force for the protection of public morals, and the results of their application;
- (3) Measures applied to combat venereal disease and the efficacy of these measures;
- (4) Preventive measures;
- (5) Opinion of persons in direct contact with prostitution regarding the value of the measures at present in force as compared with the former system of licensed houses.

The examination and discussion of the draft report brought out the fact that considerable diversity of method had been employed to achieve the same ends. It was the opinion of the Committee that methods must naturally vary according to local conditions and the social habits and customs of a population. This applies particularly to measures taken for the rehabilitation of former inmates of the licensed houses. In its final report, the Committee drew attention to the different methods employed. In particular, it emphasised (a) the necessity for making the free treatment of venereal disease available for all members of the community, (b) widespread propaganda with regard to this disease, (c) early intimation of the decision to close the licensed houses so that co-operation may be achieved among all concerned, (d) that suitable measures must be taken for the rehabilitation of former inmates. The Committee concludes, in view of the fact that the authorities in communities where licensed or tolerated houses have been closed, have been unanimous in declaring that the problem of prostitution can be more effectively dealt with where these houses are abolished and that there is no desire to return to the former system, that it will no longer be possible to defend the system of licensed or tolerated houses by the arguments which once seemed to justify it. It asked the Council to invite the Governments to maintain the abolition of the system of licensed or tolerated houses wherever this has been realised, and to consider the desirability of abandoning this system where licensed or tolerated houses still exist.

At the same time, the Committee pointed out that abolition in itself cannot be effective unless it is supplemented by the education of public opinion and effective medical and social measures. In addition, the punishment of souteneurs and procurers must be severe and consistent.

The Traffic in Women and Children Committee expressed its satisfaction at the fact that since its last session (April 1933) Brazil had ratified the 1921 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children. The Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women of Full Age which was drawn up in October 1933, has already been ratified by twenty-seven States—viz., Union of South Africa, Albania, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Chile, China, Czechoslovakia, Danzig, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Monaco, Netherlands, Norway, Panama, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Yugoslavia.

THE CHURCH AND "UNBELIEVERS."

Mr. L. P. Jacks, the editor of Hibbert Journal, concluding his second article on Mr. Loisy's new book on the birth of Christianity remarks:

On one pervading characteristic of the earliest Christian propaganda which, unhappily, its later developments have never entirely lost, M. Loisy has touched but lightly—its attitude of condemnation, of menace and even, at times, of violence towards the unbeliever—who, be it noted, is not the unbelieving atheist of modern controversy, but the "liar" who denies, in one way or another, that "Jesus is Christ" (1 John ii. 22) and is in turn to be denied by the Christ before the Father in Heaven (Matt. X. 33.)—probably one of the sayings "received" by some prophet or initiate as a spiritual admonition from the risen Christ. This intolerance of the unbeliever, apparent enough even in the Epistle which announces that "God is love," may be detected all through the New Testament, sometimes as an undercurrent and sometimes, as in the Apocalypse, assuming a tone little short of ferocity. May we not account it the damna hereditas of Christianity, the fruitful parent in every age of theological hatreds, internecine bigotries, heresy hunts and excommunications? What but this has given Christianity the uneavable reputation of being the most addicted to persecution of all the great religions of the world? Combining an official theology which condemns the unbeliever to perdition with humanitarian ethics which declare that all men are brothers, is it to be wondered at that Christianity in these days is inwardly divided against itself and outwardly split into atomistic sects, an astonishment to the Hindu and the Buddhist, whom it vainly seeks to convert, and even, at times, to its own adherents? Intelligible as such intolerance may be as a phenomenon of the age when Christianity was born and amid the fierce oppositions which beset its infancy, the survival of it into our times is an offence to just-minded men. By this spirit M. Loisy himself, toiling a long life for the spiritual progress of humanity, has been excommunicated. But there are many others, toilers in the same cause, who wait for no official excommunication to drive them beyond the pale. Offended by anachronisms so inhuman, they excommunicate themselves.

PROHIBITION REPEAL A TRAGIC FAILURE.*

(By F. SCOTT MCBRIDE.)

The results during the first six months show that repeal has deplorably failed to solve the liquor problem. So increasing tragic are these results that the ignoble control experiment is tottering toward collapse. Predictions of improvement have been proven disastrously false, and wet promises have been contemptuously broken.

The saloon is back, with added evils, in New York, headquarters of the repeal movement, and in Chicago, where both the Republican and the Democratic parties made their most solemn declarations and platform promises that the saloon must not come back.

In Washington, where Congress voted for repeal and passed what the wet Crusaders praised as a model control law, drunker driving, according to a traffic official, has caused an increase of 63 per cent in traffic accidents during the first four months of this year. Governor Fly, of Massachusetts, who attacked the Eighteenth Amendment while nominating Al Smith in Chicago, recently declared here in Washington that "unless our present record improves the time is not far distant when it won't be safe for any one to venture on our streets after the cocktail hour." Here in the nation's capital an appalling record of drunken attacks, murders, suicides, crimes and misfortunes of all kinds, refutes the claim of the Crusaders that repeal would bring "true temperance."

The American Automobile Association reports that "a wave of recklessness is sweeping the nation's highways," and quotes figures showing a 84 per cent increase in railway crossing accidents under repeal.

Bootleggers have not disappeared with repeal. Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau is quoted as saying that the illegal liquor business is "as bad as ever," and Mr. Joseph H. Chote, Federal Alcohol Control Director, states emphatically that lawless liquor now exceeds the legal supply. Repeal has simply added a legalized trade to the lawless traffic.

The cocktail hour, ingeniously popularized for profit by the big hotels of Washington, New York and other large cities, is more perilous and ruinous to young women than the old-time barroom treating custom ever was to young men. Employing the insistent influence of social custom to promote alcoholic habits and liquor sales, the cocktail hour alone is sufficient to condemn repeal as an inexcusable crime against American youth.

Widespread reports of rioting and bloodshed in connection with strikes are but another indication of the regrettable consequences of repeal. The contrast between turbulent conditions in strike areas in recent weeks and invariable orderliness during labor troubles under prohibition demonstrates the stupidity of adding drink to discontent.

Many recent misfortunes and disasters of carelessness, like train wrecks and fires, were undeniably caused by the drinking of beer and wine, conveniently obtainable almost everywhere since repeal.

The granting of 2,400 Federal retail liquor dealers' tax receipts in the dry state of South Carolina and the sale of revenue stamps to a brewery in dry Georgia indicate the futility of promises to protect dry territory—promises made not merely by candidates and in party planks, but in the repeal amendment itself.

* Mr. McBride, General Superintendent, Anti-Saloon League writes in The American Issue.

The fact that officials apparently neither care nor dare enforce effective restrictions in either wet or dry territory proves the rule that politicians who choose to march in the wet parade are expected to go the whole route for the liquor interest.

My own personal observations in the eighteen states from coast to coast which I have visited in the past three months are confirmed by reports from our Anti-Saloon League offices in all parts of the country.

The first six months under repeal have provided convincing evidence that there is absolutely no hope for a cure of liquor evils in any of the various control systems.

Conditions under control, already terribly bad, will constantly become worse with the further development of gigantic liquor sales systems and fabulously financed advertising campaigns—plus the inevitable operation of the habit-forming effect of intoxicating beverages.

Accordingly, all our Anti-Saloon League Superintendents and workers are being urged to redouble the efforts to prevent repeal of state and local prohibition laws, the last and best remaining defense against repeal evils.

INDIAN ANTHROPOLOGIST IN THE WEST.

Rao Bahadur L. K. Ananthakrishna Iyer, Indian Anthropologist and officer in charge of the Ethnographic Survey of Mysore, has been the recipient of cordial welcome at the various European Universities that he has so far visited in the course of his tour abroad, writes The Sind Observer.

Landing at Brindisi and proceeding to Rome via Naples, he was invited to lecture at the University of Rome on the subject of "Black Magic in India." Addressing a large audience, Prof. Iyer stated that it afforded him great pleasure that he had the privilege of giving his first European lecture in so ancient and great a city as Rome. He instanced that contact for a South Indian with Rome was not to be unexpected as the earlier records indicated that South India and Rome had intimate commercial relations and, what was more, had actually a temple dedicated to Caesar Augustus in the vicinity of the modern Cranganore. In the course of the lecture, which was illustrated with lantern slides, he enumerated a large number of cases of survivals and modifications of the practices of black magic in modern Hindu society. His Excellency Prof. Tucci, who presided, thanked the lecturer for the very learned and illuminating discourse he made in the University.

Prof. Iyer was invited to Florence by the University. At the Institute of Anthropology of the University, he spoke on "certain aspects of primitive culture in South India." Illustrating his points suitably with slides depicting the actual practices among the jungle tribes, he explained the customs and manners peculiar to them. Towards the conclusion the Vice-President of the Society presented him with a diploma of Honorary Membership of the Society. On the following day, the Rettore Magnifico, Prof. Dindo de Vecchi, of the Royal University of Florence awarded him the Academic Medal of the University.

The Indian savant was invited the following week to talk before the Institute of Ethnography and the Institute of Indian Civilisation of the University of Sorbonne. At the former, Prof. Mauss of Sorbonne presided and Prof. Iyer spoke about the importance of the study of the lower forms of culture. "The proper interpretation of higher forms of culture can only be undertaken when we appreciate the significance of the simpler form of culture correctly." He ran through the whole gamut of Indian society to be found on the west coast, explained the unity of principle to be discerned in the diverse manifestations of customs and convictions developed by the people in the course of ages, betraying the influence of their older primitive habits. At the Institute of Indian Civilisation under the direction of the famous Indologist, Prof. Sylvain Levy, Prof. Iyer lectured on the subject of magic in India. Magic practised by the people, he stated, was of two kinds black and white. The meeting was particularly memorable as it had attracted a large number of Indologists and Indian students pursuing their studies at the University of Sorbonne.

Prof. Ananthakrishna Iyer next proceeded to the University of Oxford where the University Anthropological Society invited him to deliver a lecture on June 7.

At Vienna, the Asiatic Society and the Faculty of Anthropology invited him for a discourse on certain problems of Indian sociology. Baron Heine-Geldern of the University of Vienna was found working on the sociological analogies between Kerala and Indo-China. The indefatigable Father Schmidt, the founder of the Anthropos, the Director of the Vatican Ethnographical Museum and Professor of the University of Vienna, in collaboration with Prof. Coppers have utilised very large amount of information from the "Cochin Tribes and Castes" in their able and encyclopaedic work on Culture. Then, again, at Breslau, Prof. Dr. Freiherr von Eickstedt, Director of the Anthropologisches Institute and Ethnologisches Institute, has created an important school of Anthropology for the University of Breslau. Apart from the monographs he has issued on various racial problems in India, he has collected 15,000 photographs of types from India alone.

At Berlin and Konigsberg the next two places to which the Indian Anthropologist was invited, there are professors attached to the University who have studied and published important contributions to the study of Indian culture. Mention may be made of Prof. Helmuth Von Glasenapp, who is as familiar with the important pilgrim centres in India as any orthodox Hindu.

Prof. Iyer next visited Halle on Saale about 2 hours' journey from Berlin, to speak on the Aryan Conquest of South India at the University.

At Halle the Lord Mayor welcomed Prof. Iyer and his son, Prof. Natesan, to the ancient and noble city of Halle. The Mayor Weidemann stated "To my sincerest thanks to your visit which greatly honours us, I may add the wish that you will have gained some good and thorough impressions of Halle. Our town is situated in the middle of the German Reich. This Central German landscape has always played an important part in the spiritual and political history of Germany and Europe. It was here that the great religious fighter and creative linguist Dr. Martin Luther was born. I would greatly appreciate if your stay in Germany would help you to understand our struggle in the right way. May you take home besides a good scientific result which will serve to promote in a greater degree friendly relations between two peoples of old culture."

Education of Indians:—That the late Mrs. Shyamji Krishna Varma, wife of the wellknown Indian revolutionary of that name, who died in exile in Europe has, by a will, left a sum equivalent to about thirty lakhs of rupees for the education of Indians abroad is announced in an interview by Mr. K. P. Jayaswal, wellknown historian, Indologist and lawyer, who recently returned from a tour in Europe.

PROFESSOR LASKI.

The London correspondent of the Hindu writes:—

The lecture recently delivered in Moscow by Professor Harold Laski on the prospects of revolution in the United Kingdom, has had the inevitable consequences of indignant protests in Parliament.

Mr. Laski is now back in London and he has protested to the "Daily Telegraph" against certain of its comments and its assertion that the lecture to which exception is taken was given before the Communist Academy. In the House of Commons yesterday, the Foreign Secretary was asked the terms and conditions under which the Professor's passport was endorsed to enable him to visit Russia. Sir John Simon replied that Mr. Laski held the usual passport, available for travel anywhere, including the Soviet Union. No special facilities were necessary and none were asked for from the Foreign Office.

Mr. Attlee pointed out that Professor Laski's lecture was given not before the Communist Academy but the Institute of Soviet Law and consisted of a defence of Parliamentary Government. It was followed by five hours' continuous attack by Communists on Professor Laski's views.

The Government was then asked whether in view of the fact that the London School of Economics was supported by an official grant, it would be indicated that such grant was not given to facilitate such activities as those now criticised. The Government reply was, the London School of Economics does not receive a grant directly from the Government. The University of London receives an annual block grant, paid on the advice of the University Grants Committee, and from this source and others at its disposal makes allocations to its various constituent schools and colleges. It did not seem necessary to take any action of the nature suggested.

Captain MacDonald.—Is it not a fact that this Professor Laski is an avowed Communist as well as being of alien origin; and will the Right Hon. Gentleman say why he should be allowed such facilities as are provided by the B.B.C. frequently, as well as the London School of Economics, to spread his poisonous propaganda?

Sir S. Cripps.—Is the Right Hon. Gentleman aware that the charter of the London School of Economics expressly provides for complete freedom for professors and lecturers to express their political opinions outside the school; and will he resist the obvious tendency to try to curtail that freedom?

Mr. Maxton.—Is not the gentleman referred to in this question a perfectly respectable member of the party which composes His Majesty's official Opposition? (Laughter.)

No answers were given.

The Vice-Chancellor and the Principal of the University of London have written to the press pointing out that although they offer no opinion on Professor Laski's action in Moscow which will doubtless form the subject of inquiry by an appropriate body, they wish it made plain that the University accepts no responsibility for personal expressions of opinion by any of its professors. It is added that such expressions of opinion should not be taken as representing in any way the views of any responsible person connected with the University.

Building A Mosque in South Africa:—

A meeting was held in the Zeerust Town Hall recently to consider a petition urging the Town Council to sanction the building of a mosque on a piece of ground next to the Post Office, which the Mahomedans had bought some years ago for that purpose. The design showed that it would be a fine building. The Christian section of the community, however, attended in force, determined that the Indians should not succeed.

—A HINDU CHURCH FOR CATHOLICS.

—If the miniature church now designed by Rev. Keras, S. J. the wellknown historian, meets with the approval of the Apostolic Delegate in India, to whom it will be sent in a few days, then the church in India will have made the biggest stride in its process of acclimatisation in this country.

The miniature church which is 5½ by 4½ ft. has been constructed at a cost of a thousand rupees. To all outward appearance it looks more like a Hindu temple in South India than a Christian church with its 'sikaras,' 'mandapa,' 'vimanas,' etc. The architectural style in the main follows the lines of the Madura temples, but the 'sikaras' or towers, which unlike the Hindu manner of construction, are hollow, have for their models those of the famous Khajuraho temple of Bundelkhand in Northern India. These towers are surmounted by crosses, which thus drop a hint to the casual on-looker that the place is dedicated to Christian worship.

At the entrance are two elephants which signify according to the Indian usage that the residence belongs to royalty. On either side of the main gate carved into the wall are two 'dravapalaks' or gate-keepers, who have wings—a thing not in conformity with Hindu custom. The first 'sikara' which is above the entrance, is constructed in a way so as to provide living room for the priest in charge on the first floor, whence the bell suspended in the tower can be operated.

Right from the entrance runs a very narrow 'mandapa' open inwards but closed outside by a wall, which forms a complete rectangle enclosing the church. This mandapa resembles the usual courtyard surrounding the Hindu temple. From this mandapa the worshippers can obtain a clear view of the main body of the church which is covered by a much larger mandapa. The smaller mandapa is therefore meant for processions and private devotions.

Between the main entrance and the principal mandapa is the 'vimana' or the baptismal font through which the worshipper has to pass to the main body of the church. The font symbolises purification and is a sine qua non to enter the church. The principal mandapa itself is supported by ten pillars representing the Commandments. All the pillars are constructed in the style of the Vyjjanagara period.

The entrance to this mandapa is over seven steps representing the Seven Sacraments of the Church. At the top of the entrance, are two peacocks which denote souls in the manner of the Syro-Malabar Church.

The sanctuary is separated from the rest of the church by railings. Besides the main altar there are two other sideways. By the main altar and in front of the Holy of Holies is the perpetual Lamp like a silver dove hanging on a serpent-like chain.

The main altar is directly below the second 'sikara.' At the back of this altar is a statue of Christ made after that of the Buddha of Sarnath. It is in the Buddhist preaching attitude—"dharma-chakra-mudra". Around this altar are twelve candelabra representing the apostles. Behind this 'sikara' and on the outside is a statue of the Mother of Christ dressed in Javanese attire, so also are the statues of saints placed in the narrow mandapa. The statues of the evangelists kept at the four angles of the mandapa are purely in the Hindu costume and the gospels which they carry bear Sanskrit inscriptions.

There is a vast mass of architectural detail containing religious symbolism, which whenever it does not conflict with the essentials of the Christian worship, is maintained intact. In this miniature all suggestion of Moghul architecture is carefully eschewed.

MAINTENANCE RIGHTS OF HINDU WIVES.

The judgment in Sobhanadramma v. Parakkal Lakshmi & enr. is important from the point of view of Hindu wives who for proper reasons live apart from their husbands but neglect to sue them for maintenance. The decision which is reported in the current issue of the All India Reporter is to the effect that where a wife leaves her husband's house without his permission but subsequently comes back and offers to live with him, his refusal to allow her to do so entitles the wife to demand separate maintenance from him. Maintenance depends upon a gathering together of all the facts of the situation, the amount of free estate, the past life of the married parties and the families, a survey of the condition and necessities and rights of the members, on a reasonable view of change of circumstances possibly required in future, regard being of course had to the scale and the mode of living and to the age, habits, wants and class of life of the parties. The Court has held that the claim to maintenance which arises when it is unlawfully withheld is a legal right. A demand and refusal is not necessary to create the right. They are only of evidentiary value to show that afterwards the withhold must have been wrongful or that there could not be any support for the theory of abandonment or waiver. In the same way, mere non-payment of maintenance, though by itself it does not constitute the withholding wrongful, is still evidence to show that the withholding was wrongful. The only legal answer to such a claim is either abandonment or waiver or such conduct on the part of the plaintiff as may have misled the defendant into thinking that such a claim would not be made thereby inducing him not to make any provision for it especially as maintenance is a provision to be made out of the current income of the estate or of the person liable. The discretion of the Court when applied to the grant of arrears of maintenance is generally exercised in adjusting the rate at which the arrears have been awarded or in limiting the period, by inference from facts of an implied waiver or abandonment or conduct such as above mentioned. In this particular case the plaintiff under the advice of her father, who was in affluent circumstances lived away from her husband, practically during all her married life without making any claim for maintenance against him. He had no property which could be charged with the maintenance and his only income was his salary earned by his profession. It was held that it was not unreasonable in the circumstances to infer that the plaintiff had either impliedly abandoned or waived the claim for the greater part of the period for which arrears were claimed or at least that her conduct had been such as to lead the defendant to believe that he would not be called upon to meet suddenly a claim for a large sum of money which he would not reasonably be able to pay and which ordinarily he ought to have found from the current income and the enforcement of which would only lead to the result disastrous alike to him and to his wife, of making him a pauper and that arrears could be granted only from the date of demand.

MAN WITH "X-RAY EYES"

Prof. K. B. Duke, a Kashmiri gentleman, 28 years of age, who has earned a reputation for possessing "X-Ray Eyes" claims to have discovered a method which will make the blind see.

Blindfolded with a number of kerchiefs, a broad cardboard screen placed over them all, he sat back in a chair and read printed and manuscript sheets in English, Hindi and Urdu,—the three scripts he knows, demonstrating his uncanny ability to see through the several opaque substances. The Professor also claims that he can drive a car blindfolded, or shoot with his eyes closed and hit the bull's eye as often as he could with his eyes open, writes the Hindi.

"How did you develop these undoubtedly marvellous powers?" asked a press representative to whom he gave a demonstration in the Hindu office.

"It all came so naturally," the Professor observed, "I was studying books on Hypnotism and Psychology. It suddenly struck me that it should be possible for men to see blindfolded, and I gave up my studies to see if I could successfully do so."

"At first some people laughed at my queer idea," the Professor added smiling, "I was not good at school and they thought it was a ruse I was playing on them. But leave school I did in 1918."

"How long did it take you to attain your present powers?" he was asked.

"Just ten years—I perfected the art in 1928. It was a process of greater and greater concentration of the sense of hearing and seeing. As a result, I believe my brain powers have developed as also the general condition of my health."

The Professor stated that ever since he had acquired these powers his one ambition had been to train others, particularly the blind ones, in this art. "If I succeed," the Professor added hopefully, "blindness will no longer be a disability or misery." He said he had, in fact, been approached by some prominent citizens of Bombay to help them with his services in certain schools for the blind which they were interested in; but, he said, the proposal did not materialise.

The Professor expects to proceed to Europe and America in about a month and there demonstrate his powers before societies and organisations interested in the education of the Blind. "As soon as I have sufficiently popularised the system," the Professor stated, "I hope to come back to India and start an Institution for the Blind."

At present, he gave the interviewer to understand, he does not propose to give any public demonstrations.

Muslims and Railways:—The following Associated Press message dated Simla the 20th was published in the papers last Saturday: "In order to avoid further criticism regarding Muslim representation in Railway Services it is stated that at the time the recent selection of Special Class apprentices for training in the United Kingdom was made, there were in all ten candidates, six Hindus, two Anglo-Indians, one Parsee and one Muslim, who had completed their training at Jamalpur. Six of these apprentices, four Hindus and two Anglo-Indians, attained qualifying standard and were selected in direct order of merit in accordance with the regulation for further training in the United Kingdom. As by this selection, one-third of the vacancies were already secured for members of minority communities, the Government did not consider it necessary to make any further communal adjustment. It is also added that a Muslim candidate, who stood ninth in the order of merit, did not attain qualifying standard and could not, therefore, under the rules, be selected for further training in the United Kingdom."

Mysore and Federation :—We are rather old-fashioned in our view regarding statesmen in office writing to the Press. We did not quite like Sir Mirza Ismail's letter to the Times (London) purporting to interpret the inner significance of the objections of British Indian leaders to the White Paper. But his letter to the Morning Post protesting against its attempt to make out that Mysore supports Federation because it wants to get back the civil station of Bangalore, is entirely proper. Mysore is perhaps the one important State which has from the first welcomed Federation without any mental reservations and what is more it is the one which can enter it at once without any very large readjustments in its existing legislative machinery. But all is fair in politics, and the Morning Post did not perhaps seriously intend to cast doubt on the disinterestedness of the Mysore Government. As we have referred to the return of the Civil Station to Mysore, we may remark in passing that Sir Henry Gidney's speeches, regarding his negotiations with the Mysore Government, rather suggested that his community was condescending to become subjects of Mysore on conditions. We not believe that there is any basis for the suggestion.

The Indian Academy of Sciences :—The late Sir K. Seshadri Iyer, when Dewan of Mysore, perceived the immense advantage to the State of attracting the Tata Research Institute to Bangalore and succeeded in doing so against all competitors, the most formidable being Bombay City. Sir Mirza Ismail has achieved a not less important stroke by securing the location in Bangalore of the Indian Academy of Sciences which was inaugurated on Tuesday. His opening address is published elsewhere. The presence of Sir C. V. Raman at the head of the Royal Institute is, of course, the immediately effective cause of the Academy being located in Bangalore. There have been some complaints that he had forestalled his constitutionally-minded and slower-moving fellow scientists, but we are sure that it will be found that Bangalore possesses more suitable climatic and other favourable conditions than almost any other place in the country. In fact, Bangalore is tending to become the Geneva of India. We have heard some other projects discussed of late, and in nearly every case, Bangalore was first in the list of places considered for their situation. Sir C. V. Raman has been the target of some rather unbecoming attacks in a section of the Bengal press. It is not, therefore, amiss to quote here what one of the leading thinkers of the day, thinks of his service to Science and India. Dr. W. E. Hocking of Harvard University in "The Spirit of World Politics," examining the conditions which establish a country's claim to a rightful place in international comity, observes ; "Nations presenting a case for independence will always, and justly, point to their men of intellectual eminence. It is an event of first rate importance for national India when a Nobel Prize is conferred on a physicist of her own breeding." This is about the only reference to India in Dr. Hocking's important contribution to modern political philosophy.

Minority Differences :—The acting Governor of Madras, Sir Mahomed Usman, will vacate the office at the end of this month when Sir Frederick Stanley the permanent Governor resumes charge after handing over the Viceroyalty to Lord Wellington who is due back in about a fortnight. Sir Usman was presented with a complimentary address by the Municipal Corporation of Madras a few days ago. No Muslim member of the corporation attended the function. Sir Mahomed who is the senior member of the Governor's Executive Council, retires on the expiry of his term shortly. The appointment of Mr. Pannirselvam, a Roman Catholic Christian gentleman, as his successor was announced a few days ago. There is a feeling among Madras Muslims that the post should have gone to a Muslim. As the announcement of his successor was made when Sir Usman is acting as Governor, they seem to think that His Excellency has betrayed the interests of his co-religionists by recommending a non-Muslim. It is very probable that Sir realp. Usman had nothing to do with the recommendation. The permanent Governor before leaving for Simla would in the ordinary course have made the selection. Sir Usman might even not have been consulted about it. The incident, however, shows that the communal distribution of jobs must lead to friction among the minority communities themselves.

The Dehra Dun Public School:—We gave in some detail not long ago our reasons against the idea of an English Public School for Parsis. These reasons apply with just as much force to the Public School which Sir Joseph Bhore opened at Dehra Dun. We are glad that this time the volume of protest is larger and comes from varied sources. We reprint the criticism of the Guardian in another column. The Indian Messenger, the Brahmo journal, protests "against the waste of money with which ten or twelve good schools may be founded at healthy places for our boys who should be encouraged to develop into first-rate Indians in preference to fifth-rate Englishmen." Even the Statesman, the Anglo-Indian daily, strikes a discordant note. It observes: "The atmosphere of an expensive English school where, whatever masters may desire, only the scholars and a few other clever boys are by the rest of the school expected to 'swot' and most of the boys are concerned only with growing up in comfortable conditions until the time comes for them to settle down in comfortable conditions, is not to be found, and not to be desired, in India, even in a school where fees are high and pupils will be of the 'better' (i. e., richer) classes." The prime mover in this project was the late Mr. S. R. Das, when he was Law Member of the Government of India. Lord Irwin, then Viceroy, favoured the idea, and money was forthcoming without difficulty. In these hard days it is something that the school or college will give employment to some Englishmen and Indians (in, of course, subordinate roles).

Politics not an End in Itself:—Speaking at the opening ceremony of a new Children's wing attached to the Chittaranjan Seva Sadan at Calcutta, Gandhiji referred to the fact that both the late Lala Lajpat Rai and the late C. R. Das, who were foremost political leaders of their time, left all their property when they died for purely philanthropic and charitable objects. He also referred to the late Mr. Tilak devoting his time in prison to writing learned books on the antiquity of the Vedas and the secret of the Bhagavat Gita. This, said Gandhiji, shows that although to-day politics may seem to engross the entire being of Indian leaders the ideal that their souls crave for is religious in the broadest sense of the term. "If we are often compelled to engage in politics," he concluded, "it is in order to clear the way for the exercise of our constructive talent." Gandhiji would agree the exercise of our constructive talent itself has a purpose beyond ourselves, to make India's due contribution to the well-being of humanity. It has been India's good fortune that its leaders have all along been men of wide outlook, great culture and high character. They were also imbued with a strong religious spirit, using the term in the same broad sense as Gandhiji. One sometimes feels that in India as in other countries, including Britain, politics is passing into the hands of men of a different type. Let us hope this is a passing phase.

To Prevent Preponderance:—Sir Henry Craik, the new Home Member of the Government of India, was questioned in the Legislative Assembly regarding the recent resolution laying down certain proportions in which appointments in the public service should henceforth be made. Asked as to what the policy was behind the scheme, he answered that it had long been an established practice to prevent preponderance of any particular community in public services. It is only an Englishman (or Scotchman) who can with such calm assurance speak of preventing in others a crime or sin (take your choice) of which he is himself the standing exponent. The Briton takes his own predominance as a matter of course, and as a blessing to all concerned. In others it is a heinous offence which it is his God-appointed mission to prevent!

British Rule in India:—Messrs. Thompson and Garratt have collaborated in a new book on the British period in Indian history. As might be expected from any volume with which Mr. Edward Thompson is associated, the "Rise and Fulfilment of British Rule in India" (Macmillans, price Rs. 21/-) starts with a claim to work for an "understanding between the two countries which fate has linked so strongly together." The book has been acclaimed as a successful attempt in this direction in Great Britain where the sympathetic treatment accorded by the authors to the White Paper Scheme, has won the hearts of their critics. Both the authors are newspapermen and in attempting to write history they have not left journalism behind. The authors, in presenting in their preface reasons why they are so admirably fitted for the task of writing a history of the British in India, have made it clear that, though they have a feeling of a second nationality for India, their first loyalty is to their own country. That statement covers many lapses in the volume. The writers occupy a good part of their time in knocking heroes from their pedestals and finding mitigating circumstances for the scapegoats of history. In commenting on the pistolling of the three Princes after the Mutiny the authors confuse the issue. They remark, "The blame attached to Hodson for pistolling the Princes seems hypocritical. They had been active members of the rebel army and had surrendered without safe conduct.....Actually, if not theoretically, everyone who joined the mutineers was treated as deserving capital punishment." (Pages 455, 458 footnotes). The point is not whether the princes were guilty of having participated in the rising but whether Hodson was justified in summarily executing them. Vincent Smith in his Oxford History remarks that Hodson had not even expediency on his side.

Truth and the Politician:—A great part of "The Rise and Fulfilment" is political pamphleteering and that too at its worst. The two authors have been about in India recently and that has been unfortunate for the history. Much of the gossip they picked up from Indian friends who discussed the personal aspect of Indian politics, has been slung into the latter half of the volume. There is one particular passage which we should like to know to which author to credit. "Ever since 1897, when Tilak violently attacked Gokhale for withdrawing a statement which he could not verify, the Congress," write Messrs. Thompson and Garratt, "had accepted the view that nationalist propaganda was a war-time weapon, and there was no need for it to be based on truth. Though ultimately this has disillusioned many of their friends abroad, the method is effective in India, where fact and fancy are liable to be confused, and there is little political controversy..... Mr. Gandhi now introduced two Hindu religious conceptions—satyagraha, the vow to hold to the truth, and ahimsa, or harmlessness." Passing the translation of ahimsa as harmlessness, we are astounded at the conclusion to which our historians have jumped. Even the most ardent Congressman can scarcely claim a monopoly of political truth for Gandhiji. Lest it be concluded that the Thompson Garratt collaboration is pro-Gandhi, we hasten to add that the book clearly tells its reader that political wisdom is lacking in India and that despite Gandhiji's introduction of two Hindu religious conceptions the Congress has unfortunately not been able to cure itself of its old defect.

The U. S. Bogey:—We should not be surprised if Messrs. Thompson and Garratt turn themselves to writing next on the "War Debts and American Influence in India." Mr. Thompson was about two years ago on a lecturing tour in America and, from what we have heard he was not quite satisfied with his reception there. He has not unnaturally arrived at the conclusion that Indians have played for American support and, as response to his propaganda there did not come up to expectations, he respects the Indian politician whom he regards as a successful rival. Here are a few specimens: 'From the Irish Gandhi learnt how a modern Government can be goaded into repression, and how this can be exploited in other countries in order to complicate international relations. The United States formed the obvious field for such an appeal, owing to their post-War importance as a creditor nation, their strong "mugwump" elements, and their old hatred of British imperialism.' (P. 607) 'Some even hoped that...a foreign country might intervene. Mr Gandhi, with his sense of publicity, was admittedly fitted to win support in America, where a generation educated on headlines and traditionally hostile to England was captivated by the picture of the small and ascetic Mahatma defying the might of the British Empire, or in later days parleying on equal terms with the tall Viceroy.' (P. 630). This is a nightmare picture of Great Britain—between the nether millstone of India and the upper one of the United States. We are not surprised that so many British politicians are going on lecturing tours to America. We remember reading a laudatory review of "The Rise and Fulfilment" in an English journal. The critic wrote that the history reads like a novel. It is.

A "Tribune" Protest:—Among Indian newspapers which are not Congress organs, the Tribune of Lahore has been the most consistently sympathetic in its appreciation of Congress activities and personalities. It is, therefore, the more remarkable that in an appreciative leading article on an address on the coming elections which Mr. Rajagopalachari delivered at Calicut, it should feel obliged to lodge an emphatic protest against his demand for a "a blank cheque" for his party. "Our strongest objection is, it writes, to Mr. Rajagopalachari's claim that the Congress should be given a blank cheque, and that, entirely irrespective of the nature or merits of the candidates it puts forward, the country should return its nominees to the Legislature. In our opinion this is an extravagant demand, a demand which is not good either for the Congress or the country. Both have seen in the past the difference between a good and a bad member even when both belong to the Congress." The Tribune goes on to observe: "We are not forgetful of the underlying assumption of Mr. Rajagopalachari's speech that the Congress means the leaders of the Congress and the leaders mean the Mahatma, the leader of leaders. But in spite of all that he says and in spite of all that one sees in Europe to-day, we are profound believers in democracy and are profoundly distrustful of the best, the wisest, the most humane and beneficent of all dictators. No man is infallible, and the Congress leaders have in the past made far too many mistakes for the country to accept their lead blindly and uncritically." It is not wise to provoke so stern a rebuke from a friendly journal.

Austria in Revolt:—The methods adopted by Dr. Dollfuss to suppress Socialists were not calculated to ensue peace. The suppression of the Socialists has strengthened the Austrian Nazis who staged a rising and murdered the Chancellor. The situation is said to have been controlled but the appeal of the Austrian Government to the European Powers to protect its territories, would show that German action in sympathy with Austrian Nazis is feared. The end may be delayed but there is no power on earth which can prevent the two Germany's from coalescing.

"PARLIAMENTARY MENTALITY."

Gandhiji in his speech at the end of the meeting of the Working Committee of the National Congress at Benares last Sunday, is reported to have observed that the 'parliamentary mentality' had come to stay within the Congress. By way of explanation he pointed out that the present programme, outlined by the Congress Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board, was, by no means, the old obstructive programme of the old Swaraj Party, about which much has been said. He suggested that they were going into the Assembly and meant to stay there without staging any 'walks-in' and 'walks-out.' They were going to do their utmost to reject the White Paper, to get the repressive laws repealed, and to get a constructive programme worked out and to do a number of things sanctioned by the Congress. To an agonised interruption by Mr. K. F. Nariman: "But Mahatmaji, what could we do? We shall be in a hopeless minority," Gandhiji replied: "It does not matter. You and Mr. Satyamurthi can make yourself felt and bring credit to the Congress." Mr. Nariman protested: "But then what can I or Mr. Satyamurthi do?" Gandhiji said: "You will be judged by your record and you must be content to be judged accordingly." This is reproduced from the report of the Hindu's own correspondent at Benares and is not found in the reports of the Associated Press published in most of the other Indian dailies.

It is not our purpose to-day to speculate how this startling change came about in the course of the last two months within the Congress. We welcome the change and wish to take the first opportunity of pointing out what it means. Gandhiji in his usual lucid style explained what is meant. It is not consistent with the "parliamentary mind" to "walk in" when things go as you like and "walk out" when they do not. It is consistent with the parliamentary mind to do your best to reject the White Paper and to get the repressive laws repealed. But it is not consistent with it to do this in a spirit of obstruction. This should be done in a spirit of co-operation—the Opposition in Parliament is as much His Majesty's as the Government. The parliamentary mind requires that you support to the measures of Government which are beneficial to the public and welcome Government support to your constructive proposals for the public good. The parliamentary mind cannot be put on and off as occasion suits. It is the outcome of the constitutional temperament. The best definition of the constitutional temperament that we have come across, is one by Sir Henry Maine. "One of the rarest qualities of national character," he observes in his Ancient Law, "is the capacity for applying and working out the law, as such, at the cost of constant miscarriages of abstract justice, without at the same time losing the hope or the wish that law may be conformed to a higher ideal." If this quality is rare in countries which are under their own national rulers it is almost impossible in a country under a foreign government. And yet such is the innate affinity of the Indian mind to the British in many things that matter in national life, that the founders of the National Congress and their successors in political leadership had acquired the Parliamentary mind and the constitutional temper to perfection. Sir Surendranath Banerjee, Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Gokhale, were great parliamentarians. The people of India under their leadership also acquired a strong constitutional bias. Gandhiji's appearance on the Congress scene wrought a change. The constitutional temper came to be despised as the spirit of mendicancy. The old veterans were chased out of the Congress, with contumely, sometimes veiled, often open. Only Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya with his infinite capacity for ignoring rebuffs, stuck on, and he, too, has now been obliged to quit. All the leading figures in the Congress of to-day have been brought up in the school of non-co-operation and direct action. They are accustomed to look down upon the constitutional temper, which they really never understood. Mr. Nariman's question, "What shall we do, Mahatmaji? We will be in a hopeless minority" would not have occurred to the man with the parliamentary mind. Parnell was always in a hopeless minority but he held the fortunes of more than one powerful British Government in the hollow of his hand. Any fool can lead with a large majority behind him. We trust Messrs. Nariman and Satyamurthi will be able to resist the non-co-operator's instinct to fall back on satyagraha methods on the least provocation. If they fail, knowing how hard it is to get over a fixed idea, we, for one, shall not blame them. Very few men have Gandhiji's mental agility.

The conditions under which Congress members will enter the Assembly, we must say, are not in keeping with parliamentary tradition. There is nothing more repugnant to the parliamentary principle than a caucus; and the Congress members will be candidates of a caucus. In the same speech from which we have quoted above, it is reported: "He (Gandhiji) was confident that Congressmen would come out of the legislature, if they were called on to do so by the Working Committee of the Congress, but he did not believe in calling them out, unless there was supreme need for the same, and Congressmen in the legislature had voluntarily agreed to the course." The implication of the last clause is not clear. It was not in the Bombay resolution and is evidently an afterthought of Gandhiji's. However that may be, these members as much by their own choice as by the mandate of the authority which selects them, will be responsible for their conduct in the Assembly not to their constituencies but to the Working Committee of the Congress which is really their common constituency. Edmund Burke, the greatest authority on the subject, held that a Member of Parliament could not be directed even by his electors to pursue any course in performance of his parliamentary duties. In a famous passage in a letter to his electors, he repudiated the idea that a member of Parliament was their delegate in any sense. The prevailing tendency in Europe is to make the Legislature the organ of a single powerful party. Sun Yat Sen discovered this principle; in the hands of Lenin, Mussolini and Hitler, it has elaborated a varied technique. This, rather than the Parliamentary principle, of which it is the negation, seems to be the goal to which Congress is tending. The demand for a blank cheque which Congress leaders want from the country, is not the expression of the parliamentary mind. It may be that the system of one-party rule is the best for India. If so let it be called by its proper name and not masquerade in a parliamentary garb.

PANDIT MALAVIYA DECIDES.

My feeling on reading the news that Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has resigned from the Congress Parliamentary Board was one of immense relief. I met him at Birla House a few days before he left Bombay for Benares. We had a long talk. Mr. Aney was with us for a part of the time. Dr. Ambedkar came in as I was taking leave of Panditjee. I had not met Panditjee since I visited him in the lock-up of the Esplanade Police Court during the first Civil Disobedience Campaign. He had squatted all the previous night in the middle of Cruickshank Road, opposite the Municipal Office along with a large number of men and women who were prevented by the Police from going as they intended in a procession to the Fort. "I could not," he told the Magistrate, "keep aloof when my sisters and daughters were undergoing this hardship." He is not a man who loves crowds, processions and demonstrations. But the keyword of his life is "loyalty"—loyalty to his religion, to his country, to the National Congress of which he is one of the first members, and to Gandhiji. There is no hardship, no indignity which Panditjee will not endure when it is a question of loyalty. The problem which distressed him for the past several weeks was how to reconcile his loyalty to his religion and his country with his loyalty to Congress and Gandhiji. I could not help him in solving it. As a Hindu Protestant I recognise no intermediate loyalties between God and man. Institutions, leaders, the country itself, are deserving of support only so long as their claims do not clash with those which God makes upon us through the mysterious something which we call "conscience." There is, of course, the danger that what one hears in his conscience may not be the voice of God but may be that of the devil. There is the same risk in lesser loyalties—one's religion, country, political party, personal friendship. However that may be, the sight of Panditjee, more frail than I have ever seen him, but gentle, courteous, dignified as ever, torn between conflicting loyalties, was most painful. That is why I felt great relief at the news of his resignation. What it means to my mind is that Panditjee has decided after a prolonged struggle that loyalty to Congress and Gandhiji in the matter of the 'Communal Award' is disloyalty to his religion and to his country. Mr. Aney did not strike me as struggling with a conflict of loyalties. He seemed to view the question in a purely objective way with reference to its possible effect on politics, particularly of Maharashtra. His resignation means that he has found that it would be wholly unfavourable.

As for the Communal Award which is the ostensible bone of contention, the whole thing to my mind was a mistake from the first. I can not imagine how the experienced lawyers, business men and publicists of the Indian delegation agreed to refer the matter in dispute to the Prime Minister for decision. I say 'agreed' because the Prime Minister left them no alternative. He declared that if Indians could not come to an agreement, Government will do it for them. He thus ruled out by anticipation arbitration by an independent party. The British Government was a party to the suit, so to speak, as much as the Indian delegates. The ultimate issue in the constitutional reform is, after all, the transfer of power from British to Indian hands. In the nature of things the head of the British Government could not be expected to take a detached view of the Communal Problem. He was bound to look at it from the point of view primarily of British interests. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, to be sure, had travelled in India, come in contact with Indian politicians and written books about Indian administration, criticising some of its defects in uncompromising language. But Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the struggling member of the Labour Party, to whom it was an honour to be thought of as a possible President of the Indian National Congress, is not the same man as the Prime Minister of Great Britain. He was not the same man as Prime Minister in the National Government as Prime Minister in the Labour Government. The Indian delegation did not realise the significance of the change—it did not understand that the politician's business has affinities to the actor's. In default of agreement among themselves, the Indian delegates should have asked for an arbitration by independent men as in the case of the recently decided dispute between the Government of India and the State of Navanagar. It was a blunder on the part of Indian delegates, including Gandhiji and Malaviyaji, to have left the matter to the Prime Minister for arbitration. It was not fair to him. To be quite fair to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, he distinctly warned them that any decision that he might give would be an unsatisfactory one. But the blunder of the delegates should not be allowed to go against the interests of the country. The country has a perfect right to repudiate the action of the delegates. The question then is, how does the Award stand on its merits? Let us take the case of Bombay as a test. The Legislative Council of Bombay including Sind is assigned 200 members. Muslims, Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans have separate electorates and the number of representatives allotted to them totals 77. The general electorates which consist of all others are given 107 seats (including 10 for depressed classes.) Some 45 seats are thus taken from the general and handed over to the communal electorates in the name of the "protection of minorities". An award which includes such an arrangement cannot be claimed to be a fair one. The Award, it is laid down, can only be changed with the consent of all the parties. Obviously, this consent can only be secured if the general population is prepared to make greater sacrifices than the Award inflicts. An artificial distribution of this kind has to be maintained by artificial means and hence the Governors' extraordinary powers are a logical necessity. What should be the attitude of nationally minded Indians to the Award? The same, I think, as to the White Paper—try their best to mend or end it. It is difficult to understand the tenderness of the Working Committee of this Congress in dealing with the Award as compared with its downrightness as regards the White Paper. Perhaps, Congress Muslims who are for joint electorates are unwilling to forego the weightages allowed in the Award. To me, separate electorates are far less harmful than weightages.

N.

BEYOND THE WHITE PAPER.*

It is a tragedy when a writer who has given proofs of the possession of the creative talent is obliged to become a party hack. Philip Cox in his "Rani of Jhansi" showed real dramatic power. The Rani herself was a potent personality. She needed no touches from the artist's brush to make her seem greater than she was. In fact, Philip Cox's picture of her made her out to be rather less than what she was. His most striking portrait in the play was Low, the member of the Governor-General's Executive Council, who tells the masterful Dalhousie to his face and in defiance of his subservient colleagues, that his policy of annexation was a breach of faith with Indian princes. "As ye sow, so shall ye reap! What your Excellency has just been pleased to refer to as the dead past may rise up to confound us some day!" Let us show that "we are not the common thieves that our actions sometimes lead people to imagine us to be," Dalhousie who first tried to browbeat Low is himself momentarily cowed down a bit by this fearless councillor. There must have been several Lows who served India with undaunted loyalty and that is why in spite of everything the Indian politician in his most excited moods has a lurking sense of what he and others owe to British exemplars. It is painful to meet the portrayer of Low as a propagandist of the White Paper which belies every principle and tradition we have been taught to respect and try to imitate as British. It is not, to begin with, straightforward, not honest. It is double-faced—one to face the British with and another to show to the Indian people. A section of the Indian Press has unwillingly allowed itself to be manouvered into seeming support of this scheme by holding up Winston Churchill as the great enemy of Indian Self-Government. If he is, he is quite frank about it. He has helped to expose its double-dealing, not a small service to any good cause. As a writer and thinker he towers head and shoulders above his contemporary politicians to whom the expediency of the hour is the guiding star. It is a greater honour to be attacked by Churchill than to be defended by some of the apologists of the White Paper. It is not evident why Cox calls his book "Beyond the White Paper." All that he quotes—it is really a compilation from the evidence largely of Sir Samuel Hoare before the Joint Committee—is there. The sub-title describes it as "a discussion of the evidence presented before the Joint Select-Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform. There is very little discussion—only assertion. In his final words, he says that "If my method of analysis should have given the impression that I regard the White Paper proposals as being primarily designed with a view to the imposition of checks and over-riding powers, I shall be doing both the framers and myself a disservice." As a fact, the book conveys not only that impression but also that the author approves of its being what it appears to be from his presentation. The book, he says, is concerned rather with the difficulties of English people in understanding the features of the White Paper scheme than with developing independent views about the Indian political situation. He has made the English people understand—and the Indian people also—that this great constitutional Reform consists mostly of a facade behind which things will be managed pretty much as now, but with Indian Ministers to bear the responsibility while the English Governors and Governor-General pulls the strings of power.

HINDU CHURCH OR CHRISTIAN PAGODA?

The Reformer of July 28th published a brief account of Father Heras' miniature church for Catholics in India. As the move is of peculiar significance to the history of the Catholic Church in India I sought an interview with the Reverend Father. The approach to Father Heras' study is appropriately enough through the Indian History museum of the St. Xavier's College. Father Heras regretted that the miniature of the church was ready packed for despatch to the Apostolic See but said he could give me an idea of what was proposed by means of a few photographs of the miniature which he had with him. As he handed me the first of these—the church from the front—he remarked that the Church of England was a national Church and so could not adapt itself to foreign countries in which its missionaries preached the faith but that the Church Universal, the Catholic Church, had no such limitations and was not under necessity to restrict itself to an uniform architectural style or mode of worship. In answer to a question he remarked that the Indian Church building would be Hindu or Muslim. Father Heras disclaimed any originality in his idea of "Hinduising" the church and illustrated his remarks with prints of paintings by Chinese artists of incidents from the New Testament and photographs of two churches in Moghul architecture in Karaohl and Patna. There is another "Moslem" church in Gwalior.

My knowledge of architecture, unfortunately, is elementary and my interest lay more in the practicability of a scheme which meant nothing less than reversing the methods pursued by the Catholic Church in India for nearly four hundred years. But Father Heras has for years been absorbed in the study of Hindu history and it struck me that he would resent any suggestion of mine that a church built on the Hindu style might not appeal to the Western educated Indian Catholic as much as it did to a man who had deliberately concentrated on Hindu India. I tentatively remarked that the minute symbolism with which Father Heras had decorated his church would certainly appeal to the Hindu but not to the Catholic of Bombay who would very probably be happier in a Church built on European models.

Father Heras dismissed the thought with a smile. "In this connection," he said, "I will tell you what happened at Karachi. The plans for a church in the traditional Western style were ready and a description of the proposed building was published six years ago along with an appeal for funds. I wrote to the priest at Karachi approving of the idea of building a Church, but why, I asked, do we want the Roman basilica? When the early Christians emerged from the Catacombs they occupied the old pagan buildings and in Europe the basilicas had a meaning. In Karachi where the population is predominantly Mohammedan why not adopt the Moghul style? My suggestion," continued Father Heras, "was adopted. But the Catholic donors demurred, threatening to withdraw their support if the new suggestion was put through. In a few months, however, everybody came round. The Church was built on the Muslim style but it was not possible for financial reasons to put up two domes. The priest sent me photographs of the building and asked what I thought of it. Father Heras concluded with a chuckle, "I wrote back that it was beautiful but looked like a queen without a crown. The church is now complete." The moral was obvious. I pointed out that Muslim art has in the past been utilised in the building of Catholic Churches notably in Spain. Father Heras agreed and expressed the view that the same process of adaptation could be applied to Hindu art and architecture.

I was interested to find out how far Father Heras was prepared to adopt the externals of Hinduism; and, as he has dressed the main figures in the Church in Indian dress, I asked him whether his priests would don the saffron robe of the ascetic. "My friend," remarked Father Heras with a twinkle in his eye, "when you yourself have adopted English dress why should I go back to the old sanyasi garb? Besides everyone in the cities understands what our dress signifies. In the villages I agree that it would be more advisable for us to adopt a dress which has a definite meaning for the people." "Does this imply that the Church is reverting to the policy of Abbe Dubois?" I asked remembering the Abbe's claim that by circumspect conduct and by adopting the habits of the people he had gained their confidence. "De Nobile, not Dubois," corrected Father Heras.

I asked Father Heras about the music. He informed me that all the hymns would be sung in vernacular. The Gregorian Chant would necessarily be in Latin but, observed the Father proceeding to illustrate his argument, with a recital from "Lamentations," the intonation is very similar to that of the Hindu chants. "You will admit, Father Heras," I remarked, "that the average Bombay Catholic has had his ear trained to Western music and will very probably find the Indian jarring." A Catholic friend of mine who was by me and who had put me in touch with Father Heras, bore me out. Father Heras, however, was in no mood to brook opposition. "We foreign missionaries and the older Catholics must sacrifice our feelings in the interests of future generations," he retorted. "And what after all is the Western music in Indian churches today? It is the strongest argument for my proposal. In a South Indian Church and in a church in Gujerat where the hymns were sung in the local vernaculars, the result was distractingly effective."

Two paintings were intended to decorate the church. One was a geometrical production looking strangely like a railway poster and representing the omniscience and illuminating qualities of the Almighty. The bottom half was occupied by the sea; the top consisted of an eye set in a triangle which was surrounded by circles of varying colours, the brighter ones being nearer the centre. The second picture portrayed God as a venerable rishi seated on a lotus, his left hand raised above his head where the heavens are depicted, his right straight down where just below his parted finger and thumb appears the completed globe. Father Heras lingered lovingly over this picture as he remarked that the artist must have been inspired when he painted it. It was a striking piece of symbolism. Both pictures carried Sanskrit inscriptions. This is an instance of enthusiasm carrying a man beyond reasonable limits. In view of the importance of Latin in Catholic literature, it is inappropriate to introduce another language equally remote to the Catholic laymen.

Father Heras' almost exclusive interest in Hindu life has led him, to my mind, to exaggerate certain aspects which, say, the Hindus of today would not worry much about if they were building a temple. It might be retorted that Father Heras is truer to ancient Hindu art than modern Hindus are. The object of the Catholic Church—Father Heras told me he was commissioned by the Apostolic See to plan an Indian church—is presumably to provide a place of worship for its Indian members which will appeal to their national tastes, a place where they may feel religiously "at home." It is very doubtful whether a church after the Hindu style will appeal to Indian Catholics. It is useless to discuss whether the first missionaries were correct in modelling the Church here after structures in their lands. The Western buildings are here with us and they carry a certain meaning not only for Catholics but others.

It is not the old Catholics alone but even, and more so, the young Catholics who have been brought up on Western traditions. The Western music of Indian choirs might be discordant to Father Heras and the European missionary, but the vast majority of Indian Catholics have become habituated to it and, I daresay, find it spiritually satisfying. They may find the Indian songs a serious hindrance to worship—I have several Indian Catholic friends who are frankly bored by performances of Indian music. Hybridism is no doubt bad but when the whole country is going through a form of it it seems to me absurd to insist on a revival.

If the Indian Catholic community had wanted a change in the existing Church building or method of worship there would have been organised agitation. But it is just the other way about. The Hindu building suggestion has met with a certain opposition, not very vocal I admit, but nevertheless strong.

There can be only one explanation for the proposed innovation. Faced by the fact that converts were decreasing, Protestant Christianity seeks to modify its attack against other faiths. Catholicism meets the same danger by adopting the externals of other faiths. Such a policy might inconvenience the existing worshippers but it will, it is hoped, attract new converts to the fold. The new Church will, however, introduce a split in the community. As funds will not permit of a country-wide scheme for replacing the old Western churches with Indian ones, the two types will exist side by side, at any rate for a time. The worshippers at the Indian shrine will be marked out from the worshippers at the Western shrine, probably bringing about a new caste division. If, however, the "Hindu" and "Muslim" church is accepted without reservation the Catholic community would have moved several steps forward towards removing the reproach that its members are denationalised. A Hindu friend with whom I was discussing the proposed innovation, remarked drily that this was a half-way house to Hinduism.

AN OXFORD GROUP MEETING.

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

I have read with interest your article in the last issue of the Reformer on the "Oxford Group" or Buchmanism. It will not be without point to note that a young Oxford undergraduate has written on the

realpatidar.com

Group. Mr. Phillip Stockil in an essay in 'Red Rags' has many hard things to say about the Oxford Group or Buchmanites as he insists on calling them. The conclusions which he forms of Buchmanism are contained in these sentences: "The great attraction of Buchmanism is that it appears so easy. The tenets seem so simple. 'Believe in God's Guidance and you are saved.' 'Confess your sins to a group of other sinners and your conscience is clear.' Any one could adhere to this code of behaviour. It is a very easy way out of difficulties for the weak or lazy."

Mr. Stockil is often flippant. But he tells us that he attended a group meeting and relates what he saw there. "There was," he writes "no ceremony. A bespectacled chairman began by reading at random out of a notebook. Then he called upon a young man, whose name he had in this notebook, to come forward and 'testify.' The young man seemed only too willing. Apparently he had already expressed his desire to do so. He stood on the hearthrug; he told us his name; he told us the history of his early life, the history of his fall, the history of his conversion. It was not instructive; nor indeed particularly entertaining, although the audience laughed on the slightest provocation. But I noticed this about his speech. The form and matter of it corresponded exactly with a model instance given in Buchman's 'For Sinners Only.' The inference is obvious. This was not so much a case of 'inspired witness,' as 'witness according to formula.' It seemed, too, that the young man had not even had the energy to invent new sins to suit his own case. His misdeemeanours tallied exactly with those given in the 'model instance.' There followed a comic person whose remarks were received with loud laughter. He said that he had been a 'decent chap' at school; that he was very religious; and that he had joined the Group Movement, believing that it alone could satisfy his spiritual needs. Then he proceeded to describe the effects of "Guidance" in his own case. He had been guided to stop smoking. He attempted to give no reason for this. The authority of his "Guidance" was apparently sufficient. Again, after another bout of introspection, he had been guided to shave off his moustache. This pronouncement was received with laughter and applause. But I could only pity the poor young man standing by the fireplace, revealing only too obviously the hopeless naivety of his mind. I doubt if his own remarks were funny to him; for there only flickered across his face one slow, embarrassed smile when the storm of guffaws broke loose. He had not expected this revelation of the precious contents of his soul to be received with such hilarious mirth. He sat down shamefaced. As I have indicated many of the speeches were received with laughter. In fact, on the slightest encouragement, the whole meeting would give way to mirth. But I noticed that this Hearty-Muscular-Christian hilarity was so forced and stopped with such unanimous suddenness that I was reminded of nothing so much as schoolboys laughing at their form-master's poor attempt at wit. It was considered good form to laugh; but to be really amused would be the height of impropriety. The former was expressive of broadminded Christian fellowship the latter of obscene irreverence."

It is, I dare say, probable that Mr. Stockil was unfortunate in the "Group" he fell in with. But his experience reveals at the very least what such a movement can degenerate into.

THE OXFORD GROUP.

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I was interested in the article in The Indian Social Reformer of July 28th on "the Oxford Group," and noted the writer would like to know of a team, if any in this country. I am myself an Oxford Group and we have in Bombay a Group that meets regularly. There are now scattered Groups in many parts of India, but there is in no sense a 'team' at work. The Metropolitan of India, Bishop Wescott and Father Jack Winslow are both keen Groupers. There was a semi-public meeting in Bombay last November at which the Metropolitan spoke. It is possible that a 'team' might come to India in the not far distant future. If your writer would get in touch with me, I should like to correct his impression of "the keyword of this movement," if I could.

THE TEST OF A SPIRITUAL TEACHER.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the Indian Social Reformer of July 28th, you remark in an article on the Oxford Group that the least fallible test for a spiritual teacher is that he must have renounced the world. Another "test" is frequently alluded to by Sri Ramakrishna in his teachings. Replying to an inquirer on the methods of present day religious teachers, Sri Ramakrishna said:—

"It is like inviting an hundred persons to a dinner where the food is only sufficient for one. It is pretending to be a great religious teacher with a very small stock of religious experience. When a fire burns, the moths come, one knows not whence, and fall into it and die. The fire does not invite the moth to its fate. Even such is the preaching of the perfect. They do not go about calling others but hundreds come to them, no one knows whence, of their own accord, seeking to have instruction of them. The ants gather of themselves where the sweetmeat has fallen. The jar when it is filled makes no noise, and so the man who has realised God does not talk." In another place Sri Ramakrishna remarks:—"You wish me to show you God while you sit quietly by without making any effort. You would have me set the curds, churn the butter and hold it before your mouth! You ask me to catch the fish and place it in your hands!"

As Yeats-Brown writes in Bengal Lancer, "Information is not to be had for the asking. The high-caste Hindu is convinced that no illumination can be given to minds that do not wish for it." The old method of imparting religious instruction only to the persistent inquirer had much to commend it. It might not have brought the spectacular results of mass conversions but neither did it disturb the multitude who found solace in pursuing the faith of their fathers. Such an attitude, however, is only possible with a society where tolerance in the matter of belief prevails. Obviously the man who believes he has come into sole possession of religious truth, cannot wait for disciples to come to him, nor can he pick and choose his followers. But such an attitude is alien to Hindu religious thought.

THE MAHAR CO-OPERATIVE COLONY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read with interest the article entitled "A Co-operative Colony for Mahars" by Mr. Vaikunth L. Mehta, in the current issue of your excellent weekly, and was much impressed by what is being done for the better housing of the Mahars at Danda. The Mahars, though included among the Harijans, belong to the upper strata of that society and are honest and intelligent. That the benefit of modern institutions should be made available to them is much to be commended. That they have responded eagerly to the idea of the formation of a co-operative housing society speaks well for themselves. It is a pity that the whole scheme is held up for want of a sum of Rs. 4,475, the balance necessary to make up the guarantee fund to secure the registration of the Society. Instead of appealing to the harassed public which has had many calls on it, in these days of earthquakes and flood disasters, why has not Mr. Mehta applied for the money to the Harijan Sevak Board which has accumulated nearly eight lakhs of rupees during the one year tour of Mahatma Gandhi in the cause of the Harijans? If I am not mistaken one of the objects of the Sangh is to help housing schemes for the Harijans and what can be worthier than the cause of the Mahar colonists? Besides, the money will be refunded to the Sangh in a few years.

PARLIAMENT AND THE ELECTORS.

The late Mr. John Galsworthy contributed an article some years back to The Realist entitled "The Good Servant" in which he wrote:—

"Our statesmen nowadays starve the imagination within them, out of fear of the plain man, and the expression, 'Not practical politics.' They wait on public opinion, instead of initiating it. The art of 'waiting in front,' in truth, is the art best understood by modern politicians. It is not enough. The House of Commons has succumbed to the idea that it is elected to follow, not to lead. It has abjured the function of foresight. Unless it abandons that line of least resistance, it is doomed as an institution that counts, and the real direction of British policy will, for bad and all, fall to unseen forces already shaping it, or, rather, letting it drift.... A kind of fatalism has crept over the political scene. Public opinion has become a fetish, though no one knows what public opinion really is. Even granted that everything comes back to the question of the money that will make the mare to go, custom and vested interests will always guarantee the line of least resistance and prevent the mare from going, unless ruthlessly opposed by a foresight and initiative that will wrench the wherewithal from support of what is not so vital to the rescue of what is....."

"Do we elect in order that we might drift with the man in the street, or in order that we may be led by vision at least a little in advance of the judgment of that easy-going citizen? If the former, we must inevitably slip back, perceiving each landslide after the event, and making pathetic efforts to recover ground that need never have been lost. The elected of the people cannot justify their election by unimaginative service to popular prejudice and belief; they can only justify it by the exercise of foresight and by initiating policies which may well start at long odds, but will turn out winners, for all that....."

"Imagination may be a bad master, but it is a good servant. If it is not employed by those who are elected to run this country, this country can only run downhill."

WHY THEY RESIGNED.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Mr. Aney conclude a long and closely-argued statement on the reasons which obliged them to resign their positions in the Congress Parliamentary Board, as follows:—

"The Working Committee has said that, judged by the national standard, the Award is wholly unsatisfactory, besides being open to serious objections on other grounds. It has added that it is obvious that the only way to prevent the untoward consequences of the Communal Award is to explore ways and means of arriving at an agreed solution and it has further qualified what it has said by unnecessary forbidding an appeal to the British Government or any other outside authority in what it calls this essentially domestic question, which has ceased to be a domestic question and has become a political question of the highest importance by the manner in which the British Government has dealt with it. The effect of the attitude taken up by the Working Committee is that a Nationalist, who will be elected on the Congress ticket as a member of the legislature, will be bound to abstain from voting against the Communal Award, if anyone should bring forward a resolution on the subject. He will also be bound to abstain from making any representation against the Award to the British Government or to any other outside authority. The result will be that while, in view of the fact that the Joint Parliamentary Committee and the British Parliament will be dealing with the proposed legislation which will include the communal decision of the Government, a tearing agitation will be carried on throughout the country, as part of the election campaign or otherwise, against the White Paper, there will be no such propaganda by Congressmen against the Communal Award and the wrong impression which has been created by the action of the Working Committee will be strengthened that the Communal Award has been accepted by the Congress and therefore by the Hindus and Sikhs."

"In our opinion, in view of the entire circumstances mentioned above it was the clear duty of the Congress Working Committee not to have adopted an attitude of neutrality towards the Communal Award but to have opposed it wholeheartedly and to have stood up for the Working Committee Scheme of 1931. By not doing so it has given Nationalists in general, and Hindus and Sikhs in particular, cause for just complaint."

"We fear that the Communal Award has been considered more from the communal than from the National point of view. Sedulous attempts have been made to foster a feeling in the minds of nationalists that the Communal Award affects the question of only the distribution of seats among the several communities in the legislatures. Even if it were so it would still be a matter of deep national concern but, as a matter of fact, communal aspect of the Award is of secondary importance. The matter of primary importance is how the award affects the national question of questions, namely, the establishment of Swaraj, Self-Government or responsible Self-Government. It is clearly the duty of every Nationalist to examine the Award primarily from the national point of view. Looking at it from that point of view it is important to note that distinguished Indian Nationalists who cannot be accused of any communal bias have condemned the Award as anti-national, arbitrary and unjust, and have urged its complete rejection."

THE ASSEMBLY AND THE TEMPLE ENTRY BILL

A significant turn has been given to the progress of the Temple-Entry Bill by a letter received from Mr. C. Rajagopalachari by several Hindu Members of the Assembly. The letter which is dated Madras, 13th July, says:

"If it is found that the majority of the existing Hindu Members of the Assembly are not in favour of the principle, Mr. Gandhi will advise the holding up of the Bill for the present. It is Mr. Gandhi's desire that the Bill should be passed with such modifications as may be proposed only if there is a clear majority of Hindu Members in favour of it. Mr. Gandhi does not desire it to be passed with the help of non-Hindu votes."

Mr. Rajagopalachari wants the Assembly members whom he addressed to write to him expressing their opinion for or against the principle of the Bill. The Bill itself does not open any temple but only permits the opening of a temple if, upon the vote taken for the purpose, a majority of local Caste-Hindus desire it to be opened to Harijans.

The provisions of the Bill regarding majority in the referendum may be so modified as to make it very stringent. It need not be a bare majority but may be made three-fourths or whatever is deemed desirable. In other respects too, the amendments may be made.

"The question is," writes Mr. Rajagopalachari, "whether you (the Hindu Member addressed) are in favour of the principle of a permissive measure. I believe that the majority of the present Hindu Members are in favour of the principle and I wish to make it clear to Mr. Gandhi."

AN ORTHODOX VIEW.

In reply to the letter of Mr. C. Rajagopalachari in regard to the Temple-Entry Bill, requesting Hindu members of the Assembly to communicate to him their views on the principles of the Bill, Raja Bahadur G. Krishnamachariar, M. L. A., has sent the following communication:—

I thank you for having given me the opportunity of expressing my views on the subject matter of your letter. I am glad to note that Mr. Gandhi is not willing to get the Bill passed with the help of Non-Hindu votes, and that he is not anxious to proceed with it if a majority of the existing Hindu Members of the Assembly are not in favour of the principle of the Bill. I specially welcome this statement from you that Mr. Gandhi is the real sponsor of the Bill, for when I made a statement to that effect in the Assembly Mr. M. C. Rajah fell foul upon me and said that long before Mr. Gandhi was thought of, he and others who agreed with him were pressing for this right.

You will remember the discussion that we had in New Delhi along with your friends when we were there on the last occasion. At that time, I made it quite clear that I was wholly opposed to the principle of the Bill and I would oppose it lock, stock and barrel. So far as I remember you told me at the end of the interview that while you were sorry you could not enlist my sympathies on your side, you quite understood my position. Whatever has since happened has only strengthened my opinion and I am decidedly against the principle of the Bill. I do not know on what basis you say that the majority of the Hindu members of the Assembly, I do not know if you include officials and nominated members also, are in favour of your Bill. But whether it be so or not my position is perfectly clear and it is impossible for me as a matter of conviction based on reasoning to support the Bill before the Assembly.

I quite admit that the Bill is only a permissive measure and I have no doubt you have read the speech of Sir B. L. Mitter and of others who pointed out the defects in the Bill and that it is of an unworkable nature. Even assuming that these defects are rectified I must point out that the so-called permissive nature of the Bill is only an eye-wash and, as the late Mr. Justice Muthuswami Aiyar pointed out in matters of legislation permissive statutes have a knack of becoming compulsory. In my humble opinion this is only the thin end of the wedge and I consider that it would be a gross violation of the principles of Sanatana Dharma to allow this to be done in connection with temples which have been consecrated under the various Agamas considered to be authoritative in the country. Mr. Gandhi himself has admitted that the temple-entry question is of a purely religious nature as worship or prayer in a temple or a church or a mosque is indeed the most important item of any religion. I do not know upon what authority Mr. Gandhi allows the "Satanic Government" to interfere with our sacred religion for which he has been claiming his great regard to the extent of styling himself as the only true Sanatanist who understood the Shastras. Apart however from this it is a most novel principle, at least to me, that a religious question could be decided by the vote of a majority. Would the Mahomedans or the Christians allow this to be done in respect of any of their religious injunctions? It is a tragedy that Hinduism alone is considered fit for reforms at the behest of any and every one.

Another difficulty is to determine who the Caste-Hindus are in a locality whose votes would determine the entry in view of the fact that if a Caste-Hindu is an unbeliever in the principles of Hinduism his vote, however valuable as coming from a distinguished member of the community, would be absolutely valueless in determining this question. The danger of making this dependent on such votes is all the greater considering the wave of reform that now sweeps through the country which, I have no doubt, would in a few years completely cool down. You remember the enthusiasm with which everything foreign was adopted by our people in our younger days and now you yourself are the champion of a policy to reject everything foreign. That way enthusiastic and unthinking reforms lie. Pray pardon this plain speaking for I thought you did require a frank reply to your letter.

May I, in all humility, submit to Mr. Gandhi through you that it is virtually admitted on all hands that there is a very strong opposition in the country against this measure, however unreasonable that opposition may be supposed to be? It is also the opinion of distinguished men that the present movement of Mr. Gandhi, however well intended, has already thrust a wedge in the Hindu community. You know how the Sarda Act which had Mr. Gandhi's benediction and which was rushed through the Assembly with the help of the Officials' votes has created great dissatisfaction in the country. Even such an ardent reformer like our distinguished countryman, the Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri declared the other day in Kumbakonam that the Sarda Act was a hasty piece of ill-considered legislation or something to this effect. Among the depressed classes themselves there is difference of opinion as to the advisability of pursuing this propaganda and as to its probable effect on that community. It is singular that the whole movement owed its origin to and is given the necessary momentum not by a member of the depressed classes but by Mr. Gandhi. Unkind people say that being a Jain or at least brought up in Jain traditions he is not particularly qualified to advise on Hindu religious matters. The Assembly is in its last gasp and the country requires attention to other and more important matters which will come for decision. Would it not be the part of statesmanship to put off such disruptive proposals until a new Assembly comes into existence? You gentlemen are perfectly confident, if your public speeches are any index of your feelings, that your party, that is, the Congress party would sweep the polls and be returned with a thumping majority. If that is so, and the Assembly so constituted would decide that such a Bill must be passed, then no amount of what your party calls obscurantism can stop it from becoming law. Why not wait till then? The Heavens are not going to fall if you waited for a year. Meanwhile in addition to the political difficulties the most important problem is economic depression that now passes over the country, and notwithstanding the claims made by the Congress it seems to me, as one of the many millions that have been sorely affected by it, that more attention may be directed towards that aspect of the question. Pray do not misunderstand me. It would be highly impertinent on my part to advise such an exalted personage as Mr. Gandhi and I have ventured to place these few observations before you in the hope that you will take effective steps to save the country which we all love from a further trouble until we get over the present crisis. No one can help the fulfilment of this object as Mr. Gandhi can do, and that is my apology for this appeal.

JAIN OPINION.

In reply to Mr. C. Rajagopalachari's letter to the Hindu members of the Legislative Assembly regarding Mahatma Gandhi's willingness to agree to certain modifications in the Temple-Entry Bill if the majority of the Hindu members accept the principle of the Bill, Mr. Bhupat Singh has sent the following open letter to Mr. C. Rajagopalachari:—

As far as I am personally concerned, being a Jain, I am not against the principle of granting equal status to the Harijans in the matter of religion and worship and specially in the matter of entry into temples by all, irrespective of caste, as Jain temples are always open to every Jain. But this is a Bill which concerns caste Hindus and, as I represent the landholders constituency of Bihar and Orissa, consisting mostly of caste Hindus, I will have to be guided, in these matters of important social legislation, by their wishes, which I am seeking by a circular letter addressed to all of them separately. Though it does not affect me personally, yet I believe that the opinions of caste Hindus have not yet sufficiently been brought round in favour of opening temples to the Harijans and I think the present propaganda, both in the Press and on the platform, will have to be continued by the leaders for a long time yet to bring round a sufficiently large volume of caste Hindu opinion in favour of such entry before legislation to this effect could be undertaken.

The Indian masses of today, even after 150 years of British rule are still in the depths of abyssmal illiteracy, due to the absence of compulsory primary education, and, unless and until the masses are sufficiently educated, the passing of such social legislation will bring in more disunion and discord and may even lead to violent riots amongst the Hindu society to which I cannot conscientiously be a party.

I agree with you that the Bill is only a permissive measure and the question of grant of permission to temple-entry has been left in the hands of the caste Hindus. But that is not enough. It should have been provided in the Bill that the management of all Hindu temples would remain by statute in the hands of caste Hindus even in such cases where the temples would be thrown open to the Harijans. There is no denying the fact that almost all the Hindu temples with very few exceptions have been established by the caste Hindus and a provision for their maintenance has also been made by such caste Hindus by the bequests of large estates and properties attached to such temples. To sum up I will, in this particular case, be guided by the views of my constituents, but at the same time, I think Mahatma Gandhi should direct his efforts to educating public opinion in favour of such a change till the caste Hindus voluntarily veer round to this view and help legislation for this purpose.

HANDLOOM WEAVING.

(BY EVELYN GEDGE.)

It is entirely satisfactory to read that the Government of India are going to render financial aid to Provincial Governments for the development of the Handloom Industry. Handlooms will it is hoped provide steady employment for an increasing number of people who need employment both in villages and towns not only in India but in many other countries of the world. Also through the conservation of handloom weaving the native art in rural districts will be protected and encouraged.

The economic problem in such development in rural areas lies along the path of providing proper supervision for the standardisation of production, and satisfactory marketing facilities for the distribution and sale of what is considered up to set standard work.

In Rumania a similar problem exists and has been fairly satisfactorily met by the Department of Education. Country products in the way of homespun cloth, embroideries, carpets, woodwork, etc. are sent from villages or convents where they have been produced to Bucarest for inspection by a committee of expert ladies. The Ministry of Education keeps a room for a permanent exhibition of all goods which are considered to be good enough for sale and the pricing of those goods is done by this committee so that there is no bargaining (and this is a country where bargaining is as common as in India).

I would suggest that the Government might start some such permanent organisation for the sale of Homespun and other village products in each big Indian City where women's organisations exist. Ladies would be asked to serve on committees to select the work and also to act as saleswomen in the Exhibition room once or twice a week. In Bucarest the exhibition room is in the Ministry of Education and it is open on Wednesday and Saturday mornings for several hours. The work is sold at a moderate price and the whole of the stock is up to standard. Usually there are crowds of customers. Would not the various provincial Governments of India utilise some of the new grant towards the establishment of such depots in each of the great Provincial centres of India. There is little doubt that such a scheme should more than pay its way, as a certain small percentage on sales would go towards expenses.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SCHEME.*

Sir Joseph Bhore, the present custodian of what is called the Indian Public School Scheme, has issued a lengthy report outlining the proposals made by the School Executive Committee. If people well placed in life desire to provide a superior type of education for their children to what is available in India, we should consider such a desire natural and commendable. Though a scheme with this object would benefit only the rich, the model might be one which could be adopted on a modest scale for the needs of other classes. The Dehra Dun Scheme however has little to commend it to either the rich or the poor. Sir Joseph Bhore reports the decision of the Committee that 'the school should not become the exclusive preserve of the rich.' For the benefit of 'those of moderate means,' the fees have been fixed at Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 1,200 per boy per year for the Junior and Senior classes respectively. Obviously the Simla standard of 'moderate' means in ordinary language 'rich' as a simple calculation of the cost of maintaining a couple of boys at this school will show. However the more serious question to ask is what will happen to the products of this school. It is said that they may join an arts or professional course in an Indian University or let us say, a British University. Used to an uncommonly high standard of life till 18 years of age, they must take their chance with the lesser breed in later scholastic life and in the search for occupations. A few may step direct into the ranks of the idle rich or perhaps become active national workers. But the majority cannot inherit the I.C.S., Army offices or leadership of the Bar from their parents. On the other hand, they would start with the handicap of a standard of life ill suited for severe competition in life and ill adapted for social relationships outside the circle of the elect. A new class will arise, not those who rise in society on their own merits by self effort as happens now, but manufactured according to plan by the Public School. Literally and figuratively, they will be left high and dry at Simla, if the hope is that they would be our future rulers in embryo.

The standard of life to be maintained, let us note, is not natural to Indian conditions. The promoters are clearly thinking in terms of their own selves. There is a highly artificial mode modelled on the artificial life that the European maintains in India. The European in this country is an intolerable snob so far as the rest of India is concerned and even in relation to his countryman who chooses not to be so. The Public School is designed to foster this atmosphere and will thus be an exotic unlike the Public School of England that fits naturally into educated society in that country. Whereas the present day wealthy man in India in spite of his wealth, follows the habits and customs of his countrymen, the new rich of the Dehra Dun School will aspire to be the replica of the up-to-date exclusive Westerner. Sir Joseph Bhore's report stresses that the Indian outlook will be preserved. The value of that forecast may be estimated by what the Statesman rightly characterises as an 'amazing proposal.' Here it is: "Provided that there is a suitable demand, instruction in Indian vernaculars and Oriental classical languages will be given, but special emphasis will be laid on imparting a sound knowledge of English." After this, the talk of Indian culture in the school is just hot air. The Headmaster is to be selected in England by a Committee there. The position assigned to the Viceroy is very much like the

* The Guardian.

Governor-Generalship of the school. He is to be the Chairman of the Board of Governors. He is to appoint the Vice-Chairman and six other members of the Board. Among the 8 other members, one is to be the Commander-in-Chief. What is the school going to accomplish but create a new class of people and denationalise them thoroughly at a young age? Wealthy boys can do better than pay heavily for a secondhand knowledge of Western snobbery.

The past quarter of a century has witnessed a remarkable change in the attitude of Indian thought towards the material sciences. The Intellectual of former times exhibited a lack of interest in, and even a certain amount of distrust of, investigations into the working of a universe of the objective existence of which he was not too sure. It is, therefore, not surprising that practically all the scientific work from India which came to international notice was that emanating from the scientific departments of the Government. The system of scientific education or instruction followed by the Indian Universities, in which the study of experimental science hardly figured, was responsible for in the younger generation an attitude of undue submission to the authority of books and for discouraging independence of thought and of action in pursuing original investigation. In fact, so marked was this effect as to create a general impression abroad of deficiency of originality and resourcefulness in research as a quality inherent in the Indian character.

Reforms in the methods of teaching the experimental sciences introduced some twenty years ago have not been long in bearing fruit in the form of the very respectable volume of scientific research of a high order which now stands to the credit of Indian workers in academical institutions as well as in official departments. Indian science may be said to have come again into its own after a long dormant period. Of recent years, indeed, its success has been nothing short of spectacular; in every branch of research, Indian investigators have gained international recognition. Some have become leaders of the very front line in their own particular subjects. As evidence, I need only cite such names as those of Sir C. V. Raman, Professor M. N. Saha, Sir J. C. Bose and Sir P. C. Ray. India's new position in international science demands the foundation of a permanent central institution, charged with the functions of representing Indian scientific opinion as a whole, of safeguarding the position of research, of offering reliable guidance in scientific matters to the administrations, of providing means of publication for work of merit and value—in short, of being to India what the Royal Society of London is to England, and what the other Royal Societies of the British Empire are to their respective Dominions.

Regarding the necessity for such an institution there can be no difference of opinion. Judging from certain newspaper paragraphs that have recently appeared, there does seem to have been some dissension in Indian scientific circles regarding the form of the new institution and particularly regarding its location. Without presuming to discuss a matter which is to be considered at your business meeting to be held later in the day and without prejudice to any decision you may reach, I may say that I should welcome the choice of Bangalore as the home of the Indian Academy of Sciences; and the Government of Mysore would be prepared to consider the grant of special facilities to the Academy should you finally decide to found it here.

Bangalore needs no introduction to the Scientific fraternity in India. This city present a combination of climatic advantages and social convenience and amenity such as probable no other place in India can offer. It is already sufficiently accessible from all parts of the country and will become more so in future years as the aviation service develop. Here, also, the young plant of the Academy will find, during its growing years, a sturdy support in the Indian Institute of science, the only All-India Institution for the pursuit of original research in a variety of branches of pure science—an Institution, moreover, which is independent of external control to the extent of practical autonomy, and which is now under the direction of an Indian researcher whose brilliant discoveries have done so much to bring this country to the forefront among the nations in the field of scientific advance. May I also mention here the fact that the Science department of the University of Mysore is located at Bangalore, a department which can, I believe, stand comparison with any of a similar description elsewhere in India, as regards both equipment and personnel? For all these reasons, it appears to me that no more favorable ground than Bangalore could be found for the germination of the idea of an Indian Academy of Sciences and for the subsequent growth of the organism into a flourishing national institution with the necessary international affiliations. I trust, therefore, that those well known scientists of the North—some of whom visit Bangalore regularly in connection with the meetings of the Institute of Science—who are, at present, not so kindly disposed towards the proposal, will modify their attitude and will lend their powerful support in establishing a successful and influential academy. The mind of science is one of high ideals—and the Academy holds out a great ideal before us all.

I understand that sixty distinguished scientists from all parts of India have already enrolled themselves and I hope that other eminent men of Science will soon join and make the Academy an institution truly representative of the growing scientific achievement of our country.

It ought to be one of the functions of the newly established Academy to secure the intimate co-operation of the medical, agricultural, industrial and forest research departments and to stress the importance of such co-operation among those departments for the promotion of the national health and the economic well-being of the country. I hope that in the years to come, the Academy will expand and grow into a great national research organisation. The function of the Academy ought not to be restricted to the encouragement and co-ordination of research work conducted in detached centres, nor merely to the publication of scientific papers and memoirs—however important and necessary these may be for the intellectual greatness of the country. The Academy should seek opportunities for establishing a link between Science and Government on the one hand, and on the other between Science and Society. It should accept the responsibility of promoting discussion in the Council Chambers of All-India on scientific subjects in their application to economic policy and national well-being. The usefulness and importance of the Academy will be tested not merely by the scientific prestige which it attains and the number of publications which it produces each year, but also by the confidence it inspires in the public and the influence it exerts on national affairs.

NOTES

The Anand Marriage Act:—We reprint in another column the text of the Anand Marriage Act which was passed by the old Imperial Legislative Council in 1909. When the Bill was introduced by the Maharajah of Nabha, then the heir-apparent and a member of the Council, we took exception to the omission to introduce in it the principle of monogamy which has been embodied in all other Marriage Acts passed by the British Indian Legislature. The Act came under public discussion four years later with reference to a polygamous marriage contracted under it. We reprint elsewhere the letter published in the Reformer of the 15th June 1913 from a Sikh leader as also some Legal Notes published in the Tribune of Lahore bearing on the applicability of the Act. It appears from both the writings as also from the comment of the Khalsa Advocate, the now defunct organ of the Sikhs of the Punjab, that polygamous marriages are against the tenets of Sikhism except when contracted for urgent "political reasons" and that the community views with repugnance marriages according to the Anand rites contracted by non-Sikhs who become Sikhs in order to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act which was intended to remove doubts as to the validity in law of this custom. In the Legal Notes it was argued that the Hindu law alone is applicable to Hindus outside the Punjab even though they might have gone through a form of conversion to Sikhism as customary law is peculiar to the Punjab. We have thought it necessary to reprint these writings as there is a danger that, without realising the nature and objects of the Anand Marriages Act, marriages which contravene their personal law may be contracted by parties who are unable to marry under the Special Marriage Act or Gour's Amending Act owing to the insistence of these two Acts on their having no prior husband or wife living at the time of marriage.

The Ban on Communists:—The announcement that Communist (not Communalist) organizations have been declared illegal by the Government of India, came rather as a surprise. There have been several prosecutions of Communists, including the famous Meerut trial, and recently several leaders of the Textile Strike were arrested and kept in jail without trial under one of the many emergency laws, on suspicion of being Communists. There was, perhaps, some loophole in the law which the ban is designed to close up. Except Government and some factory-owners, very few believe that Communism is an imminent peril in this country. Gandhiji was right when he told a Socialist deputation the other day that many of their theories borrowed from Europe had no application to Indian conditions, except to a very small extent. Trotsky himself points out in his "History of the Russian Revolution" that the conditions in his country were different from those in India. In the first chapter on "Peculiarities of Russia's Development," he observes: "The ancient civilizations of Egypt, India and China had a character self-sufficient enough, and they had time enough at their disposal, to bring social relations, in spite of low productive powers, almost to the same detailed completion to which their craftsmen brought the products of their craft." Trotsky's reference to Gandhiji also shows that he thinks that what was not successful in Russia might be practicable here. Referring to Tolstoi's "philosophy of non-violence" and his endeavours to put it into effect Trotsky writes: "Mahatma Gandhi is now fulfilling the same mission in India, only in a more practical form."

Communism and Christianity:—For some time Christianity has occupied itself with the problem of facing Communism. Western Protestant leaders have even suggested an easing of the missionary drive against other faiths in the East to help in checking this menace. The Student Christian Movement with a view to concentrating public attention on this issue has undertaken publication of a series of volumes of which two are already published—"The Truth and Error of Communism" by H. G. Wood and "Communism and the Alternative" by A. J. Penty (Association Press, Calcutta; Price 4s. and 3s.-6d. respectively). Mr. Penty seems to incline towards Fascism while Mr. Wood prefers to keep both Communism and Fascism at arm's length. His alternative is not dissimilar to what Gandhiji has propounded as "indigenous Socialism." A recent contribution to the subject was made by Dr. Stanley Jones in an address before the Madras Y. M. C. A. "I am not," said Dr. Jones. "an economist nor even a Socialist.....But I am a religious man and as such I say we must present an alternative programme or abdicate...Personally I think Christianity will fit in better into a co-operative order than into a competitive one." The real reason why both Communism and Fascism have a greater appeal than any religion today is because both systems attempt to govern men in all their activities. Walter Duranty in his "Russia Reported" just touches on the close parallel between Bolsheviks and early Christians. The subject is worth developing.

A Christian Prayer Cave:—Mr. B. S. Josyulu writes from Dichpali, Nizam's Dominions, "It was very interesting to read an article in the Indian Social Reformer of August 4th on "Hindu Church or Christian Pagoda?" Quite recently I had the chance of visiting Bidar, a place of great historic past, in the Nizam's Dominions, in the company of a kind English friend. Amongst the many interesting sights was the Mission Compound where the Missionary in charge showed us round. The most striking of all we saw was what the Missionary called a "Prayer Cave." It was after the fashion of a Hindu Cave Temple and was dug through soft red rock on the side of a steep. It was not much roomy inside but there was large enough open space in front with a modest garden. Inside, an altar was carved on which were kept a copy of the Holy Bible and a punched board with the words "Lord Save Us" woven in wool. I further understood that a jatra is also held here once a year about the end of April. The atmosphere inside was just like that of a Hindu Temple. This struck me to be the farthest step in Indianising the appearance of a Church and I came out feeling that this sort of reform would really take Indians much nearer." The difference between the Bidar "Prayer Cave" and the elaborately designed church of Father Heras is obvious.

Rangoon University:—A meeting of Burmans in the Shwedagon Pagoda was held recently to support the resolution of Rangoon University making the Burmese language compulsory for the matriculation examination there and to protest against the opposition of Indians and "other foreigners." Resolutions were also adopted urging the University to make Burmese compulsory in the higher examinations. Evidently the Burmans are seeking to replace English gradually by their own language and they resent opposition as calculated to set back their national progress. That the resolutions were adopted unanimously is significant even though the meeting was attended largely by members of the Nationalist Party. Burma apparently regards Separation as an accomplished fact and is setting about to make the best of it. Indians in Burma will be well advised to accept the situation instead of standing in the way of Burmese self-realisation. After all such a measure should in the long run be advantageous to the Indian.

The Pusa Institute:—The Editor of the Indian Nation of Patna has published a pamphlet protesting against the proposed removal of the Pusa Agricultural Institute to Delhi. With many of his arguments, it is impossible to disagree. There are one or two, however, which may be urged in addition. The Pusa Institute has done good work and has become recognised as one of the principal Agricultural Research institutions in the world. It has developed a technique and a tradition of its own which should not be uprooted except for very cogent reasons. Then again, the present is the worst possible time to establish new and costly institutions instead of developing existing ones. The Rt. Hon'ble Srinivasa Sastry writing in the Hindu adduces another weighty reason with which there will be general concurrence. He writes: "I have a rooted objection to all expenditure on Delhi and its neighbourhood as the capital of India. It is to me not only conceivable but probable that a future legislature, really mindful of the interests of the poorest taxpayer of the world, will abandon a system that requires the maintenance of two expensive seats of Government, one of which is partly, and the other wholly, out of touch with public opinion. Those who, like me, raised this issue in the old Supreme Legislative Council, found the bureaucracy in mild sympathy with us, but compelled by the weight of policy to support the vast outlay on the erection of New Delhi."

Sir John Simon Not a Jew:—It is improbable that Sir John Simon would have gone out of his way to declare publicly that he was not a Jew but an ordinary Briton of Aryan stock with no Jewish admixture whatever; merely to satisfy the Nazis. It would seem that the statement that he is is industriously circulated in Great Britain and abroad with the suggestion that British foreign policy since he became Foreign Secretary was powerfully influenced by his ancestry. Sir John Simon disclaims sympathy with anti-Semitism which he characterises as un-English.

A Colony for Indians:—The public has every reason to be satisfied with the result of discussion on Thursday in the Council of State on the proposal of the South African Colonisation Report to found a colony exclusively for Indians in some derelict part of the world. The idea was favoured by Mr. Hasan Imam who moved a resolution recommending that the British Government should be informed that it is desirable to have such a colony. Mr. Hasan Imam's speech, so far as can be gathered from the telegraphic summary, was rather a thin one. His one argument was that there should be an outlet for the surplus population of India which was excluded from many parts of the world. Sir Fazli Hussain had no difficulty in showing that the idea was preposterous. He described it as a proposal to have a Harijan quarter for Indians. The resolution was lost. Mr. P. N. Saprú, in a speech which evoked the warm praise of Sir Fazli Hussain, moved that the colonization scheme did not serve the interests of South African Indians and that the Union Government should be urged in accordance with the Cape Town Agreement to take adequate steps to secure the advancement of Indians in South Africa. Sir Fazli Hussain's statement on behalf of Government will be endorsed by Indian opinion. He said, "on the present report, the Government of India had not yet formulated their views, as they were awaiting expression of opinion not only in India but in South Africa. In such a difficult matter as this a few weeks' delay should not matter. Even if the colonization scheme was accepted, it was obvious that in the present state of finances, it was impossible to start it. The Government of India would carefully examine all opinions received before formulating their own conclusions." As for improving the conditions of Indians in South Africa, Sir Fazli said that the Government of India's policy was strictly national. There was no difference between their views and those of the public in India. "A large number of members of the Union Government desired to help Indians as far as possible. But that was a responsible Government, and they found it difficult to carry opinion with them. Public opinion in the colony was narrow and selfish judged from the Indian point of view. So education was needed. Something was done when the Rt. Hon'ble Srinivasa Sastri, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and Sir Kurma Reddi were there. But that was not substantial enough. The struggle with South Africa must continue with perseverance and vigour. The Government of India would do everything to see that this struggle was carried on in the best interests of Indians overseas."

Indian Christians in Public Services:—A resolution moved in the Legislative Assembly by Dr. de Souza urging due consideration to the claims of the Indian Christian community in the Public Services, received support from all quarters. It was a striking testimony to the relations of goodwill between Indian Christians and other communities. Dewan Bahadur Ramaswami Mudaliar in strongly supporting the resolution declared that in South India, Christians were not distinguishable from Hindus, and all over India the community had no extra-territorial patriotism. Dr. Zia-ud-din objected to discrimination being made between Anglo-Indian and Indian Christian to the disadvantage of the latter. Mr. James said Indian Christians had always put the nation first and their community next, and that was why they made friends with members of other communities. Mr. Trivedi speaking on behalf of Government pointed out: As regards Indian Christians, they held to-day in every service under the Government of India a proportion well in excess of their population ratio, which was 1·4 per cent of the total. For instance, their share in the I. C. S. was 5·8 and in the Indian Police over three per cent. The same was the case with appointments in the railways, posts and telegraphs and the Government Secretariat. As for the future position of Indian Christians, Mr. Trivedi said that the 8 1/3 share reserved for non-Muslim minorities would really be consumed by Indian Christians, Sikhs, Anglo-Indians and Parsis, who all combined formed only 2·6 percent. of the total population of India. Indian Christians were highly educated and would annex more appointments even in the unreserved portion. The reason why Anglo-Indians had been specially treated was that their economic well-being was woven round a particular class of appointments, whereas Christians held posts in all classes of the services. He accepted Dr. de Souza's suggestion that the annual returns should show the position of the Indian Christian Community, and if at any time it was found that Indian Christians did not get reasonable representation, the position would be reconsidered. Dr. de Souza in winding up the discussion observed that his community put the nation first and community next and they would contribute their share to Indian Nationalism. The resolution was carried.

The Temple Entry Bill:—The present session is the last of this Legislative Assembly which will be dissolved about the end of this year. There has been some doubt as regards the future of the Temple Entry Bill. The Hindustan Times made enquiries and was informed that Mr. Ranga Iyer's Temple Entry Bill has not been dropped. According to the Rules of the Assembly, the Bill could be moved only by the member in charge. As Mr. Ranga Iyer who was the member in charge of the Bill was absent, the Bill could not be moved. The next day for non-official bills is August 16. If Mr. Ranga Iyer requests the Secretary to include the Bill in the ballot which has to take place about August 10, it is possible that Mr. Ranga Iyer's Bill may have a chance on August 16, but everything would depend on the ballot. Though a number of members had given notice of the motion to introduce the Bill originally, Mr. Ranga Iyer having won the ballot, the other members were ruled out on the ground that only one motion on the same subject could be made. This has now resulted in making it impossible for any other member to move the Bill in Mr. Ranga Iyer's absence.

Gandhiji's Fast:—Gandhiji began his penitential fast as planned on Tuesday the 7th inst. In a statement issued just before the fast Gandhiji insisted on the personal purification of workers for the Harijans and the Congress and concluded by asking all the friends in India and abroad, whatever their faith or race, to pray that God may bless his little penance.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, AUGUST 11, 1934.

THE NEW NATIONALISM.

We showed in our leading article last week that although Gandhiji said that the Parliamentary mind had come to stay within the Congress, the machinery devised to control elections and the language of some of its recognised spokesmen rather pointed to one-party rule, as in Fascist Italy, Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, as the actual goal of their endeavour. In an article headed "Christian Youth and Contemporary Nationalism," Nicholas Berdiaeff, Director of the Russian Religious-Philosophical Academy in Paris, describes the characteristics of post-war nationalism and assesses their value with special reference to Christianity. The form of State to which post-war nationalism tends is the Totalitarian. The Totalitarian State tolerates no other influence—not even that of religion. "The Totalitarian State," writes Berdiaeff, "spreads its power not only over one side of human life, but over the whole of it. It organizes not only the social, political and economic life of the nation, but also the spiritual, religious and intellectual life. It usurps authority over the most intimate depths of the human soul. Contemporary Nationalism, just like Communism, accepts dictatorship; not only a political dictatorship but, above all, a dictatorship over the whole world-wide view of the individual; a dictatorship over the spirit." Though the subjects of a Totalitarian state are under the domination of an absolute Dictator, his power in theory is derived from the masses. "Mussolini declared," says the writer, "that the State was limited as long as it expressed the wishes of privileged groups; it would become absolute as soon as the people should have power in their own hands." Again, "the strength of contemporary Nationalism is upheld by its attempt to unite national and social elements. Without this, Nationalism could not exist during our social epoch. Therefore this new type of Nationalism attempts to fight Capitalism in its own way; it wants to plan and regulate economic life; it competes with Socialism from which it borrows many features. A Totalitarian National State dictates its laws both to spirit and to matter; to religious and to economic life." Those who have followed even cursorily the trend of Congress evolution, will easily recognise in them more than one of the features of this movement of contemporary Nationalism. In keeping with Indian character, the dictatorship here is based neither on the army nor on the proletariat. It bears a quasi-religious character. Its measures are enforced by religious not by political reasons. It professes non-violence. Nevertheless, it is a dictatorship as absolute as that of Hitler or Mussolini. Owing to the dominance of a Government deriving its authority from a Parliamentary democracy, the Congress has perforce to adopt Parliamentary methods in the political field. We understood Gandhiji's statements at Benares regarding the intentions of the Congress Parliamentary Party, to mean that it will act in the Legislative Assembly as His Majesty's Opposition. The Hindu of Madras takes the same view. Whether it acts as a constitutional opposition or not is another matter. But in other fields in which activities affiliated to the Congress are carried on, there is undisguised autocracy. Only habitual wearers of hand-woven, hand-spun Khaddar can vote or hold office in Congress organizations. The Bombay Board of the Harijan Sevak Sangh goes farther. Following Mr. K. M. Munshi's fallacious assumption, it demands that the Government of India should exercise the powers which ancient Hindu Kings are supposed to have but never in actual fact exercised. In the Reformer of July 21st we cited the composition of the Managing Committee of the principal temple in Travancore in which the Maharaja had one-half of one vote in a council known as that of eight and a half members. The powerful Peshwa, Baji Rao, had to give up his idea of investing his son (by a Mussalman lady) with the sacred thread because of the opposition of Brahmins. There is not a single instance, recorded or legendary, of a Hindu king having changed by his fiat the traditional customs of his people. "Hindu kings in India," declares the Board, "have always exercised the right of controlling religious matters. The argument that the present Government being foreign should not interfere in religious matters is not founded on reason. Even if it is considered a foreign Government ruling by virtue of conquest, its obvious duty is not to perpetuate by any act of its own, either of commission or omission, a disability which members of a religious community have come to regard as unreasonable." The question at issue is not whether the community has come to regard the disability as unreasonable. We think that the Board is right in its view as to that. But the question is whether a particular method proposed is the most appropriate in the circumstances of the case. The Board completely ignores the fact that, whatever ancient Hindu kings did or did not do, the Government of India, as at present constituted, is pledged not to interfere with the religious beliefs and practices of any of the communities of India. We refer to this matter here only to show the dictatorial mentality of contemporary nationalism in India as in other countries.

Berdiaeff does not agree with those who think that Nazism in Germany and Fascism in Italy are artificially engineered by persons who have secured the support of the Army. "There can be doubt," he writes, "that both Italian Fascism and German National Socialism are movements of the people." He does not include Russian Communism in this statement but doubtless it is true of it equally. realpatidar.com

THE HINDU VIEW OF LIFE.*

The July number of Hibbert Journal contains an article headed "Death, Dying and Survival" by Mr. Harold P. Cooke. Mr. Cooke begins by pointing out that statements such as 'life is extinct' is misleading. By Death, he says, "we mean nothing more than a 'corpse,' or our seeing a corpse or 'dead body.' No corpse or 'dead body' no 'death.' And the 'body' it was that was 'dead,' not the man, spirit, soul or what not that before was supposed to 'inhabit' it. Only by a kind of metonymy, proper to some later date, could the man have been said to be 'dead.' For a 'dead man' is simply a 'corpse' and has never meant aught but a 'corpse' save in contexts more pleasant and facetious." He concludes: "Dying, whatever it consists in, appears the peculiar prerogative of those who are said to be dying. It is something unshared by others. Or, at least, that is so of the 'living.' If others in some sense may share it, they dwell in some world beyond this, into which we are 'born' when we 'die.' Such may well, I conceive, be the case."

The ancient Hebrew, like the nineteenth century scientist, believed that death is the end of life. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee," cries the Psalmist to his God; "in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" Christianity, however, holds by the immortality of the soul. "Life is extinct" is the language of the physical scientist as "the man is dead" is that of his ape, the popular journalist. People who are neither, say that a man has "passed away" or that he is "no more (among us)." Both these phrases are consistent with Mr. Cooke's idea that death is of the body. It is, nevertheless, true that death to the Western mind most generally signifies the cessation of life as well as of bodily functions.

In striking contrast to this, is the age-long recognition, both in popular language and religious philosophy, of the Hindus that Death is a physical phenomenon unrelated to Life. In communicating the death of a relative or friend the Hindu speaks of the deceased person having attained to some more delectable place called Shivaloka or Vaikunta, according as he is a devotee of Shiva or Vishnu. That life does not cease with Death is in the very grain of the Hindu mind. It is almost an instinct, supported and emphasised by the highest philosophical thought of his race.

In that great synthesis of Hindu religious philosophy known as the Bhagavad Gita, we have a fairly connected view of Life and Death. According to it, the body is literally a dwelling place of the soul. Death is a bodily process just like childhood, youth and old age. We put off our old bodies as we put off old clothes to don new ones. The soul cannot be cut or burnt or dissolved in water or dried up by exposure to the sun and air. The soul is not subject to the vicissitudes of age or death. A man's actions and thoughts, fulfilled and unfulfilled, affect it closely and determine the manner and conditions of its next incarnation. Reincarnate it must so long as it retains even a trace of "I"-ness as distinct from the soul of the Universe. No values, especially ideal values, are ever lost. The aspirant starts in his next birth exactly where he leaves off in this. He is born again in conditions favourable to his continued development. The momentum of his endeavour in one life carries him on to farther and farther achievement without conscious effort in the next. Very similar is the philosophy of Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra."

The question arises: Why should Life enter a body since it can go on without it? The answer is that it has to work out its past and to work up its future. It wants a medium through which it can fulfil this double function. And what is the work which subserves this double purpose? The answer to this question given by the Gita is to my mind the high watermark of human thought. And that is, in the words of the Christian Teacher, whatever thy hand findeth to do, that do with all thy might and, adds the Gita, without an eye to result, either in the shape of reward or consequence.

To the Hindu, the world is a round of duties—to God, ancestors, family, posterity and society or state. There is no word that I know of for "rights." Perhaps, Hinduism has overshot the mark in regard to duties. Certainly, the West has done so in regard to rights. In the ideal polity of the future, duties and rights will be strictly correlated.

The weakness of present-day Hindu society and Hinduism is that the 'duties' have become petrified, instead of being interpreted in the light of changing conditions. As Lowell says,

New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth,
They must upward still and onward,
Who 'ld keep abreast of truth.

There is nothing in Hinduism to prevent the enlargement of our view of duty according to the needs of our time. I would like to enter an emphatic protest here against the unthinking denunciation of Hinduism for its assumed failure to do this or that. For over a thousand years, Hinduism has had to put forth all its energies to preserve itself and even some of the walls and barriers which now but impede the free movement of light and air, were erected in order to prevent Hindu society from being overwhelmed. Without underrating political expediency, it is really going too far to falsify history for its sake.

The man who has performed all his duties with entire disinterestedness and has ceased to be obsessed by the first person singular is the perfect man, ready to become one with the Infinite. But out of compassion for mankind, he does not exercise this privilege. He remains with us to guide and instruct us. Such an one was Buddha; such an one was Jesus. There are men and women at all times who, in larger or smaller measure, are used by these great benefactors of mankind as their instruments. How shall we know them? Arjun is rather confused by the philosophy of the Gita. He wants to know how the emancipated person behaves. How does he walk, how does he talk? The Behaviourist School of modernists are not modern after all. There are two pregnant phrases describing the supreme quality of such men. These are that they look with equal eye on all and, as a consequence, they delight in the good of all. But how should we know them if we met one of them face to face? It is not for us to know. Their presence announces itself to us without any effort on our part. They carry in their eyes, as Emerson would say, the patent of their nobility. The Hindu is assured that in the hour of need the Supreme Soul will incarnate on earth to save mankind from catastrophe. Mathew Arnold had a glimpse of the same belief when he wrote the last lines of "Rugby Chapel":—

"Then, in such hour of need
Of your fainting, dispirited race,
Ye, like angels, appear,
Radiant with ardour divine,
Beacons of hope, ye appear!
Langour is not in your heart,
Weakness is not in your word,
Weariness not on your brow."

REACTION IN REFORM.

The Bombay Chronicle published on Monday the news that a daughter of the late Sir Ramanbhai and Lady Nilkant had married a man with a wife and three children. The young lady is a graduate of the Bombay University and occupies the position of head-mistress of a Girls' High School in Ahmedabad. Polygamy is one of the evils against which the Women's Movement in this country has resolutely set its face. The Nilkant family is one of the first and most enlightened families in Gujarat. It has played a pioneer's part in religious and social reform. The parties could not marry under the Hindu law, as the girl is a Brahmin and the man is a Bania. Marriage with Hindu rites was thus not open to the parties. They could not marry either under the Special Marriage Act of 1872, or under Gaur's Amending Act, for both embody the principle of monogamy. They could have gone to Baroda where intercaste marriages among Hindus have been legalised irrespective of caste. The validity of marriages under the Baroda Act (assuming it is not monogamous) by persons domiciled in British India, has not been tested. Short of perversion to Islam or Christianity (in the latter case legal proceedings involving delay would have been necessary to get over the principle of monogamy) there was only one door open and that was the Anand Marriage Act applicable to Sikhs and the only Marriage Act of the Indian Legislature not based on the monogamous principle. So both became Sikhs and got married under the Anand Marriage Act. We deal in an editorial note with the legal position of marriage under the Anand Act by persons outside the Punjab.

The Bombay Chronicle in a curious editorial pleads on personal and public grounds for "exercise of sympathy and understanding" on the part of publicists in commenting on this event. There is very little difficulty in understanding what has happened. The man has been working on the feelings of an impulsive woman by tales of an unhappy married life from lack of love. Her pity was aroused and pity is a fair imitation of love. She had also ideas of shocking Hindu Society out of the old custom of parents' settling the marriages of their children. This may be a bad custom but when a man acquiesces in his parents' selection so far as to have children by the marriage he is morally estopped from advancing the plea that his wife was not of his own choosing. Notwithstanding Miss Nilkant's ipse dixit, the Hindu custom has not proved less successful than alternative customs. "Every one of my friends who married for love," said Disraeli, "either beat their wives or are living apart from them." The few cases of this kind in India have borne out his experience. We are not, of course, justifying this ancient custom. We are only pointing out that it cannot be altered to suit the fancy of every person who has an overweening sense of her right to please herself at whatever cost to others who have as much right to be happy. There have been cases of educated men discarding their innocent young wives as not being good enough for them. Some of them pose too as champions of mother India. As for sympathy, that of all right-minded men will flow to the unfortunate wife and her children who for no fault on their part have been exposed to ignominy.

The Chronicle thinks that this incident proves the urgency of the need for provision for divorce in the Hindu law of marriage. We are unable to grasp the point. Who should have divorced whom in the present case and for what reasons? Surely the Chronicle does not hold that a husband and father could divorce his wife because he has taken a fancy for another girl. The Hindu community or any other community for that matter has nothing to gain by smoothing the path for people to marry in haste and repent at leisure. The couple in this case, declares the Chronicle "will have rendered a distinct service to their community if the action they have taken hastens the adoption of divorce by it." Really?

SOVIET RUSSIA AND THE LEAGUE.

In a study entitled "The Soviet Union and the League of Nations 1918-1938" by Kathryn W. Davis, published in collaboration with the Geneva Research Centre, it is suggested by the author that "Soviet-League relations have passed through an evolution in which four apparent stages may be discerned." These four stages are classified as follows:

- 1 The period of Non-recognition;
- 2 Sporadic attendance at some League meetings, of a technical character mainly;
- 3 Post-Locarno period of frequent contact with Geneva;
- 4 Recent establishment of a more positive and constructive relationship.

This analysis, though summary and approximate in character, offers, nevertheless, a sufficiently accurate guide to the phases of a clearly marked, and significant evolution.

It was no oversight that Soviet Russia was not invited to Versailles to co-operate in the drafting of the Peace Treaty and the League Covenant. On March 23, 1919 President Wilson suggested to Mr. Lloyd George that the League should be offered to Europe in effect as "an alternative to Bolshevism."

A covert, if not overt, hostility to the Soviet Government on the part of the principal architects of the League was fully reciprocated. Lenin spoke of the infant League as "an alliance of world bandits against the proletariat" a phrase which to this day characterises the attitude towards Geneva of the Third International and its associated organisations. At that time hardly any members of the League recognized Soviet Russia, which fact no doubt prompted Chicherin's retort to Dr. Nansen—"My Government does not recognise the League of Nations."

Nevertheless, both over prisoners of war and refugees, the Soviet Government did deal with Nansen not as League Commissioner but as emissary of the States in the League! Whilst a year or so later Soviet delegates attended the Health Conference (March 1922) held under the auspices of the League at Warsaw. The ice had been broken.

It is highly probable that contact and even co-operation between the Soviets and the League would have developed much faster had it not been for the assassination of the Soviet delegate at the Lausanne Conference in 1923. The acquittal of the assassin by a Swiss Jury led the Soviet Government to refuse participation in gatherings on Swiss soil (with one or two exceptions) until in 1927 a formula was found which enabled this Soviet-Swiss controversy to be buried officially.

Nevertheless, sporadic contact with the League continued. In 1923 Soviet Russia adhered to the Straits Convention (supervision under the League of the Dardanelles). In 1924 the Soviets attended a Naval Conference called by the League in Rome. In 1925, for the first time, the Soviet Government signed a League Convention (connected with inland navigation). Throughout this period, Soviet delegates maintained regular direct contact with the League's Health Organisation.

Once the above-mentioned Swiss-Soviet dispute had been settled, Soviet delegations became frequent visitors to Geneva. This phase of more or less regular contact with the League was heralded by Soviet participation in the Economic Conference of 1927; and was characterised then, and later at meetings of the Commission of Inquiry into European Union and of the Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament Conference, by the pursuit of a double policy. On the one hand, Geneva was skillfully used as a sounding board for the propaganda of Communist ideas. On the other hand, the astute Soviet Foreign Minister (Mr. Litvinov) made the most of the unique opportunities offered by Geneva for personal contacts with the statesmen of the world. A study of Mr. Litvinov's speeches during this period will demonstrate his diminishing interest in Communist dialectics and his increasing concern to establish with "Capitalist" states a co-operative relationship designed first and foremost, naturally enough, to achieve the political and economic security of Soviet Russia. A corresponding change in the attitude of other delegations towards the Soviet representatives (notably Mr. Litvinov) is equally apparent.

Two events of outstanding importance for the world—the Japanese occupation of Manchuria in the autumn of 1931, and the emergence of the Third Reich in the Spring of 1933—have revolutionised the attitude of the present rulers of Russia to the League. The Soviets feel themselves threatened both in the East and the West, and having abandoned hope (if they ever entertained it?) of substantial general disarmament, are now working tenaciously to secure their territorial integrity in two ways: first by a series of non-aggression and non-intervention pacts with as many neighbouring States as possible; second by exploring the possibility of closer co-operation with the other signatories of the Pact of Paris and the League Covenant towards the organisation and preservation of peace.

A highly significant departure from the traditional attitude of Soviet Russia towards the League was made in December 1933 when Stalin publicly declared that under certain circumstances "it is not impossible that we should support the League of Nations despite its colossal defects," while similar statements have been made by leading representatives of the Soviets. The distance travelled from an unqualified ridicule and fear expressed in 1919 to a guarded offer of support in 1934 represents remarkable political pilgrimage indeed.

France's Marriage Fairs:—Ancient marriage fairs to enable unmarried girls to pick up husbands from the young men of the village, have been revived in France to keep up the falling birth-rate of the country. The first fair was held at a big village near Rennes. The Archbishop and local officials have expressed approval of the revival of the custom, which is centuries old, but had recently fallen into disuse. The assembly is fixed for early morning and by noon the fair is in full swing. Girls and men first parade in opposite camps, but as noon approaches, any girl is free to invite the young man she prefers to lunch with her, on condition that she pays the whole cost. The man is not obliged to accept the invitation but, if he does, it is an invitation that he is not indifferent to the interest taken in him by the girl. If afterwards there is no marriage, it is taken as severe slight on the girl, and young men who offend in this way are generally cold-shouldered in the village. After the luncheon, there is an afternoon of revelry on the village green followed by strolls through the woods, in which the youths chosen are expected to pair off with their entertainers.

OUR POLITICAL PEASANTS.

It was a frequent reproach levelled by British officials against Indian politicians that they were lawyers who had no contact with the masses of the country and were liable, if the Government were not careful, to exploit the agriculturists for personal advancement. The insinuation was hotly resented by Indians who felt not unnaturally that they were more likely to understand their people's wants than a foreign officialdom. It is interesting to watch the reactions of the educated to the same charge when it comes, as it does today, from Congress leaders.

We are all familiar with Gandhiji's identifying himself with the masses, and most of us have heard Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel say so often that he is "a peasant born and bred" that we have almost come to believe it! Mr. Patel helps on the illusion by dressing the part. But it surprised me, and, I daresay, I was not the only one, to read in a recent issue of the Sun Mr. Bhulabhai Desai's remarks on himself in his Vizagapatam speech. After telling his audience that with men among them like Sir S. Radhakrishnan and Sir C. V. Raman, they were not lacking in "intellectual equipment," Mr. Desai remarked, "I am a man of the street. I was born a poor agriculturist and had to walk five miles to school at the age of seven with a view to learn the rudiments of Gujarati character. Therefore, I am of the people, I belong to the people, and I understand them, and it is through them, for them and with them that my thoughts always turn." The first remark is only rhetoric. I can only say that if Mr. Desai is a "man of the street" lots of people I know would like to be in the same street with him. As for his birth as an agriculturist, it is, or so I have been told, what a man becomes rather than what he was born that determines his occupation in modern society. Incidentally I should like to how many other "poor agriculturists" whom Mr. Desai claims to represent, considered the five mile trudge worth their while. That zeal for the rudiments of education which Mr. Desai and doubtless many of his audience displayed, is what marks them out from the average man.

Why then should Mr. Desai who far from dressing the part has adopted the aristocratic sherwani and close-fitting trousers of North India, claim kinship with the rural masses of India in an address to educated Indians? It cannot be merely electoral tactics. The real explanation seems to me to lie in this that the mantle of the Government official has fallen on the Congress leader. In this country there is no rest for the educated class. Having figured first as the scapegoat of Government and then of British propagandists—Messrs. Thompson and Garratt refer to the educated Bengali as the dog which is learning to walk on its hindlegs like a man—it is now being victimised by the Congress whose leaders, good, bad and indifferent, are all drawn from its ranks. That is understandable because all opposition arises from this class and opposition is resented by every group which seeks to establish absolute control over a country. What puzzles one is the patience with which the intelligentsia tolerate these attacks. Nor can I understand how the Congress can still claim to represent the whole country when at the same time it is bidding for agricultural support. India no doubt is mainly agricultural but its political centre is in the industrial cities.

Harijans' Complaint:—The Secretary, the Harijan Sewak Sangh, Lahore, has addressed the following letter to the Executive Officer, the Municipal Committee, Lahore: "My attention has been drawn to the fact that in the preparation of electoral rolls various candidates are alleged to be using unfair means in registering Hindu sweepers as Muslims and Christians for the purpose of Municipal franchise."

THE RIGHT METHOD OF REFORM.

(BY RAMDATTA SINGH.)

"Gods conquer them who consider themselves different from Gods;

Men conquer them who consider themselves different from men."

is a Vedic teaching, the full purport of which the Hindus as a community are just beginning to learn. They had enough of degradation and downfall. After paying heavily for their ignorance, and after learning a bitter lesson they are awakening to their sense of duty towards themselves. Real help and growth, now they realise, have to come always from within. So they are attempting in all possible ways to cleanse their home and set it right.

This change of attitude on the part of the Hindus is manifesting itself decidedly in the way in which they have taken to the service of the low and the downtrodden. It has been a shame and disgrace to them that a portion of their race should have been so long left neglected, if not maltreated. To lift up these unfortunate millions who have become next door neighbours to animals, has now rightly become an important item of national work. It behoves every caste Hindu to seek atonement for his communal sin by his doing all he can for his suppressed brother. The service to the poor shall not be forced, and it shall have no colouring of pity or favour. It shall rather be the result of spontaneous flow of the heart, tinged with the spirit of yajna or worship. "Literal worship of the Daridra Narayana shall be our motto."

In all societies there is a section of people who are conservative in their outlook and they view with suspicion anything new that is presented to them. India is no exception to this. The conservatives here are old, fossilised and scantily informed about the way in which the world is moving. The greatest help that they have been so far rendering to the nation was that they did not offer any obstacle to the progressive work of the country. Their silence and aloofness amounted to consent if not hearty co-operation.

But quite recently things have taken a sudden turn for the worse. Controversy, division of opinion, cleavage among the Hindus—these seem to be the order of the day. It may be that rivalry and party spirit are justified in the political field. But they ought to be scrupulously avoided in matters relating to the religious, social and economic uplift of India. Organisations and institutions concerned ought to complement and not compete with each other.

The question of removing an unknown and obscure legal difficulty that stands in the way of admitting an out-caste into the orthodox Hindu temple is now engaging the attention of the whole of the Hindu community. This has unnecessarily created an unpleasant faction among them. Those who stand against or oppose the Bill for removal of disabilities, call themselves Sanatanists, while those in favour of the bill are styled Reformers. The agitation reveals lack of right understanding on the part of one, and haste and deviation from the proper method on the part of another. But quite recently things have taken a sudden turn.

Each party claims that it alone is the real champion and protector of the Sanatana Dharma from danger and perdition. Sanatana Dharma is nothing short of principles and spiritual laws governing life. To claim proprietorship over them is as ridiculous as one's saying that all the air and water of the earth are his sole property. Again a formal Sanatanist can no more be a Dharmi than a king on the stage can be the ruler of a territory. To reach the state of a Sanatani one has to strive through a disciplined life. From the ideal point of view a Sanatanist is one who has through purity, austerity and control of body and mind realised the Eternal Truth that he is the immortal Atman putting on the mask of a mortal body. Such a man is the embodiment of good conduct and compassion for the whole creation. Virtue and universal love mark him for their own. Men of this type are, of course, rare and few. But all Hindus, irrespective of social inequalities, are conventionally called Sanatanists because of their paying allegiance to the ideal. Even non-Hindus and foreigners become Sanatanists when they take to this ideal.

The party which stands against the Bill is alarmed and agitated. It refuses to make a calm study of the situation. In the Bill under consideration there is, in fact, hardly anything against the Sanatanist, his society and his religion. Mere legislation will not change society into anything good or bad. The Sarda Act is a standing testimony to it. But all social customs and usages which come into existence under certain circumstances, also die out when they cease to serve a noble purpose under changed circumstances. Time is a great purifying factor in this respect. It rings out the old that is no more of any use. It rings in the new that is good and beneficial to society. Whatever might have been its origin, untouchability as it exists today is a useless and meaningless custom, and it is bound to die a natural death. Vain is the attempt of man to preserve it.

Long before the Reformer conceived the idea of removing the legal difficulties, the suppressed brother had effectively solved the problem for himself. The cultured section, though few in number, of the so-called depressed classes, who were no more satisfied with their wild deities and demi-gods, had been quietly going into the orthodox Hindu temple when the urge to do so came from within. The priests and the orthodox knew it, and they also recognised the natural growth behind it; as such no voice rose against it. In a couple of years, in direct proportion to the amount of culture imparted to the suppressed brother, the custom and usage will have assumed the desired form and change. Legal difficulties would have remained there simply in theory, as many such things are to this day in Manu Smriti.

There are certain vices which are best rooted out by making the least possible reference to them. They die or become things of the past by man's ignoring or forgetting them completely. One such vice is that of untouchability. Under modern modes of life it is impossible to cherish it any further. It is rapidly disappearing and is bound to become completely extinct in the near future. Speeches, legislation and circulars have been unwittingly calculated to give the vanishing vice undue importance.

Social inequalities in India have been, till lately, mainly based on culture. To-day the economic condition also plays an important part in getting a social uplift. The methods that the religious reformers were uniformly adopting all along was to give a cultural uplift to the backward classes. In spite of the country being caste-ridden and priest-craft-ridden, it automatically bends its head before that magic wand, culture. Bring light, darkness vanishes; give culture, elevation and equality come of their own accord. In other words if proper care is taken of the means, the end will take care of itself. This has been the one smooth and golden method adopted by all the Acharyas. They acted efficiently without creating a jarring reaction anywhere. But the method now adopted almost all over the country seems to be in a reversed way. They attempt to remove darkness anticipating that light will come, force equality hoping that culture and cleanliness will follow suit. When this process is properly analysed it reduces itself to putting the effect before the cause. Temple-entry, along with several other things, ought to be the natural outcome of education, culture and economical uplift.

Though political issues and growth of society are inter-related to some extent, the changing tactics of the former should not be confounded with the steady, though sometimes slow, evolution of the latter. It is both noble and desirable that the country has taken to the spirit of self-sacrifice and service. Along with it if she learns to adopt the right method of service, and if she also learns not to become impatient and eager to have quick results, the combination will then be splendid. This happy combination and whole-hearted service are required more to-day than ever before.

VILLAGE WORK.*

(By FR. VERRIER ELWIN.)

Here are three heresies of mine. I don't suppose that anyone will agree with me, but I would like to say what they are.

My first heresy is that I cannot stand this idea of well-to-do people from the towns going out to the villages or to the quarters of the Harijans with brooms and disinfectants to sweep them up. How would we like it if some well-meaning social reformer were to walk into our bungalows with a vacuum cleaner and start improving our carpets, provide a better Bromo for our lavatory, and remove the last shy cobweb from our walls? We would regard it as an intolerable impertinence. Villagers have exactly the same feelings as we have, and they take a very great pride in their houses. As a matter of fact, the Gond houses for example (and many Harijan houses that I have seen) are far cleaner than the average Brahmin houses. Peasants at least do not use their bathrooms as latrines. The truth is that sweeping a village, with someone taking photos if possible, is a mere sop to the conscience. It is completely and utterly useless. It does no good to the villager. It simply makes the social worker more conceited and superior than he was before. He thinks he is a tremendously fine fellow, but he has done nothing. Village relief work is a far harder and longer business than that.

My second heresy is that I don't see any point in the craze for badgering our unfortunate university students, especially the Christian students, to take up village work. Why should they? They have spent a great deal of money on an education which may be good or may be bad, but which is the very last thing that can prepare them to be of the slightest use in village service. If you want to persuade well-to-do people to do village work, then go to the schools and capture the imagination of the boys and persuade them to take some training that will enable them to be of some use. By the time they have gone to college it is too late. In the village centre brains are a great nuisance. The people best fitted for village work are villagers. You need of course a few educated people to set the ball rolling, but for the real hard work an enterprising village cannot be beaten. Now when students and educated people write to me wanting to join the Gond Seva Mandal, I say "No, thank you;" and when I want a worker I go and find a good villager. The villager does more work than the student and he does it better. The student had equipped himself for something else and he had better go and do it. Once for example, I thought that all our workers ought to be graduates, but experience has taught me otherwise.

My third heresy is less heretical. For heavens' sake, let us stop talking about Village Uplift Work. Who are we to uplift the villager? Read Pearl Buck's The Mother: is there in your life that depth of feeling, that magnificence of love and devotion that the mother who has not even a name possesses? Live among villagers for a time, and you will find that there are many things that you can do with them but you can't uplift them, really you can't uplift them. We are not good enough for that. We can suffer a little with them, perhaps—if God allows us that privilege: we can share a few of their joys; we can fight a few of their battles. But generally (and I am not forgetting any of the superstitions and ignorance and evil customs that exist) we can only follow humbly in the footsteps of the poor. St. Francis was right. Poverty is a straight road to heaven, and the poor tread it. The safest rule for village work is never to try to do anything and never to talk in a way that we would not do or say to someone who is of the same (to use the conventional expressions in which I do not believe) social and cultural status as ourselves.

'THE TEST OF A SPIRITUAL TEACHER.'

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The article in the Reformer of the 4th inst. under the above heading arrested my attention. That renunciation of the world as the test of a spiritual teacher has for long been obsolete, the two coming to be more and more recognised as a contradiction in terms. The two Hindu Epics Ramayana and Mahabharata, foremost among Sir John Lubbock's 100 books, will be found to demonstrate this view in unmistakable implications because the central lesson in both is the revealing of ways and means for self-realisation amidst worldly conditions. The simile of Sree Ramakrishna Paramahansa of the burning fire and the moth is not happy either, because the predominant suggestion therein is one of decaying into destruction—a view which is diametrically opposed to the idea of winning over.

It is not correct to say that Spiritual teachers "do not go about calling others." They do more than that. The ideal of a real Guru is that of lying in wait for response from straying souls with grief when it is not forth coming—a variety of grief which has a compelling force hidden in it. The attitude of a spiritual-Guru may be better compared to the sunshine waiting outside to enter in abundance as soon as you make the least opening in your window that remains shut against grace. When that is the law of life, how much more transcendent should be the spiritual law? That law is that response always transcends impulse,—but impulse there must be—as was sung by a great Kanarese Saint Jagannatha Dasa in his 'Harikathamrithasara,' a moving lyric. Here is the import of the verse:

"If you sit up and think of Him (that is the least human effort) He stands up and listens. If you yourself stand and invoke, He will reveal Himself to you dancing in ecstasy."

If this is the experience it is inevitable that the real ultimate test of a spiritual teacher is a vein of sorrow at the indifference of the multitude to the eternal law that spiritual destiny is the heritage of each composing it. This grief again is in the measure of the intensity of a Guru's spiritual experience. Prahlada's life-story is a standing illustration of this truth. Harold Begbie's "Broken Earthware" supplies the latest authority in support of this view.

THE OXFORD GROUP.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I was very interested to read your article on the Oxford Group Movement and the discussion that has followed since in your valued paper. I shall be very thankful if you let me contribute my quota to it.

Last time I was in New York, I passed some six weeks in very close touch with this Movement and what I found there has really impressed me. This Movement is far from perfect and I believe its leaders would be the first to say that it is far from being this, and it has some glaring defects. To my mind, the chief among these is what may be called its bourgeois mentality and a kind of snobbery which this breeds. Somehow or other, from its leader Frank Buchman down to the commonest follower, the Movement has developed a sort of partiality for those who are big in the world, and, unfortunately, Counts and Countesses, Lords and Ladies count a great deal more than they should in a purely religious movement. I found this to be true from my own observation and also from the criticism made of it by sincere wellwishers of the Movement both in the U. S. A. and in England. The Movement takes it for granted that its ideas will spread from these to the lower and hence has concentrated its attention upon capturing the upper classes. So much so is this the case that poor folks like Jesus Christ and St. Paul would surely find themselves out of place in some of their house parties and public meetings in first-class hotels. In New York I was told by the wife of a well-known author and professor in a most important religious school that, much as she wanted to go to one of these meetings in a big hotel in New York, she could not muster courage enough to go there in her shopping dress in which she had come to the city in the earlier part of the day. When such a thing happens to a Movement, it is indeed time to cry a halt and see what is wrong with it.

Another defect is, perhaps, that the Movement takes its spiritual life a little too easily. After a short stay with them I said to some of them that they were "spiritual good-timers," and they evidently did not dislike the term. This may be their strength, however, and I am not prepared to criticise them on this score. It may be that the world hitherto has taken its religion too seriously and what we see in this Movement may be a healthy reaction although for the present it may be a little too extreme. Apart from this, however, the Movement has much in it that should commend itself to the religious-minded people belonging to every country and creed. Its great emphasis is on conversion of the self resulting in its turn, in the conversion of others. In as much as it does this, in however lame a manner and to whatever little extent, it is "a Dispensation of God for our times" as I said to Kev. Sam Shoemaker, who, by the bye, is the noblest product of this Movement. I have known people whose lives have been changed altogether and it is undoubted that a new spiritual power has come into the world along with this Movement. This conversion is to be real and not merely a make-believe one, and hence the need of confession. This is to be followed by work for others and there is God's guidance provided daily for this purpose. The daily meetings for evidence have a reality which cannot be ignored. That the Movement has neither a Philosophy nor a Theology of its own, has no creed nor Orthodoxy of any kind, neither any organisation nor office-bearers, is a matter for congratulation, for it means that its attention is concentrated solely on the ethical and spiritual life. There is much room for deepening both of these, and the Movement will be forced to provide for this if it has to meet the need of the world of which it has a real vision.

Movements of this kind need to be started all over the world if we are to save it from the wreck and ruin which faces it to-day. All the religions of the world can have similar movements if only a few truly spiritually-minded people among them will take a lesson from the Oxford Group Movement and start work in their own particular groups. In the last century in India we had two movements, one led by the great Vaishnav reformer Swami Narayan and the other the Brahma Samaj, as it developed under the leadership of Keshub Chunder Sen, which worked on the same lines and did a great deal of good to the people. Whenever true religion touches the springs of life, we have phenomena similar to the Oxford Group Movement. Let us, therefore, be thankful to this breathing of the spirit in our times, and be ready to catch the same breath for ourselves and for the world.

DIRGHATAMAS.

The Editors,

Sir,

In your leading article of the 21st July, you mention Dirghatamas as an "Indian Missionary, whose lament from the bottom of a deep well into which he had been cast by the aboriginal inhabitants whom he went to civilize, is recorded in the Rig-Veda." Will you kindly give further particulars about this missionary and say where his lament occurs in the Rig Veda?

This Civilization:—The white man with his burden feels that he has not reconciled himself to his god unless he has converted a mountain or a wood into something like Widnes or Dowlais. When the mountain is a mass of slag on which a community-crowds into back-to-back hovels, living there in the sure and certain hope of the Poor Law as the crown to its labours, the man of Western Culture looks at the figures in a Blue Book, and knows that he has fulfilled the divine injunction. He never suspects that he may be wrong in that. Impossible that the Murato Indians in their forest may be as pleasing as his flying machines and alcohol! Yet perhaps the firs and pines of Newfoundland are not necessarily worse than the rolls of paper into which they are converted. The conversion of a forest into a popular Press may be inevitable, like war, but we should not deride the trees which help us to our enlightenment by calling them savage. That seems hardly fair. Let the Murato and all other Indians perish, if there is no other way of getting our alcohol, but to say they are uncivilized as we extinguish them seems a little priggish.—W. M. Tomlinson, in "Gifts of Fortune."

THE ANAND MARRIAGE ACT.

The Anand Marriage Act deliberately refrained from incorporating any particular form as the valid form of marriage, but it is obvious that its recognition extends only to the form authoritatively accepted by or on behalf of the Sikh community. The text of the Act which is a very short one, is as follows :

"Whereas it is expedient to remove any doubts as to the validity of the marriage ceremony common among the Sikhs called Anand; it is hereby enacted as follows :—

(1) This Act may be called the Anand Marriage Act, 1909.

(2) All marriages which may be or may have been duly solemnized according to the Sikh marriage ceremony called Anand shall be, and shall be deemed to have been, with effect from the date of the solemnization of each respectively, good and valid in law.

(3) Nothing in this Act shall apply to,

(a) Any marriage between persons not professing the Sikh religion, or

(b) Any marriage which has been judicially declared to be null and void.

(4) Nothing in this Act shall affect the validity of any marriage duly solemnized according to any other marriage ceremony customary among the Sikhs.

(5) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to validate any marriage between persons who are related to each other in any degree of consanguinity or affinity which would, according to the customary law of the Sikhs, render a marriage between them illegal."

Mr. Sadhu Singh wrote from Jammu to the Editor of the Reformer on June 15, 1913:—

"You consider that the Anand Marriage Act, 'as it stands, is a menace to morality.' Perhaps you do not know that under the Anand Marriage Act, the bride and the bridegroom, at the time of marriage, have to declare that they are 'Sikhs.' If they are Sikhs, then a polygamous marriage cannot take place unless there is political necessity for it, because Sikhism does not respect polygamy. There are clear injunctions over this subject in the Granth Sahib. Moreover at the time of marriage, the father or guardian of the bride has to give her over to the bridegroom. In the case cited by you the father, it appears, knew nothing of the marriage. In short, if any particular person commits any irregularity in the celebration of his marriage, certainly the Act cannot be condemned. I wish you, Mr. Editor, to study the procedure of the celebration of Anand Marriages before you take up your pen to condemn it. The Chief Khalsa Diwan, the central body of Sikhs, is now preparing a detailed code of such social unions and in fact, it has already issued a draft on the subject which would clearly show that the Act does not encourage polygamy but discourages it."

The Khalsa Advocate had the following comment which was reproduced in the Reformer of June 22, 1913:—

The Social Reformer not only condemns the action of the individual but considers that the Anand Marriage Act as it stands at present is a menace to morality because it encourages polygamy. We are not much concerned with the individual but we cannot support the views of the Social Reformer concerning the Act. We know Sikhism does not allow polygamy except in cases of great emergency when political necessity demanded such deviation. There are clear injunctions in the Granth Sahib that the Sikhs are not allowed to have polygamous connections. The Anand Marriage Act contains a necessary clause that both the bride and the bridegroom must be Sikhs. In the face of this clause nobody unless he professes to be a Sikh can legalize his marriage under the Act."

The Tribune wrote under "Law Notes" which appeared in the Reformer of July 6, 1913 :—

"The lapse of a great reformer in entering into a polygamous alliance was in itself too sad and shocking an event, but the controversy it has given rise to is no less deplorable. The fact that the parties had resort to the Anand Marriage ritual has given rise to an impression in certain quarters that the Anand Marriage Act has given sanction to the union under discussion. Without entering into the rights and wrongs of the marriage, which has been universally condemned, the legal questions it gives rise to, deserve close and careful examination. In the first place what constitutes the validity of the union? Is it the Anand Marriage Act? How far does the Act go in this respect? These are questions that go to the root of the matter. What is the precise scope of the Anand Marriage Act? With what object was it enacted? The statement of objects and reasons of the measure declared that certain doubts had been cast as to the validity of marriages performed by Anand rites, and emphasized the expediency of removing those doubts by legislative enactment. Anand marriages had been in existence before. Doubts had been cast on their validity, and the legislature sought to remove them. What were those doubts? The doubts concerned the Anand rites—whether the rites sufficed by themselves to confer legal as well as religious sanction to the union effected. The doubts thus concerned the ritual, the procedure, but the substantive law governing marital rights was not affected. All that the Anand Marriage Act effected was that it gave legal sanction to the Anand ritual thus declaring that no marriage previously performed or that might be performed subsequently would be invalid merely on the ground that it was performed under that ritual. The question then arises how would the validity of the marriage itself as apart from the procedure, be regulated. What law would govern the substantive side of the marriage, for instance, the question of prohibited degrees and so on? That is the real point at issue which must be faced. Is it the Anand Marriage Act? The reply must be in the negative. It is not a measure at all dealing with substantive law. How would the rights of the parties be governed under the marriage by the Anand Marriage Act? Here again the reply must be in the negative. What law governed these rights before the enactment of the Anand Marriage Act? Did this Act in any way repeal the previous law? The reply again must be in the negative. What was the substantive law that governed marital relations? According to the Punjab Laws Act, Act IV of 1872, the primary rule of decision in all questions affecting marriage in the Punjab is the Customary Law, and if no such custom be proved to exist then the Hindu Law or the Muhammadan Law in the case of Hindus and Muhammadans respectively. It is thus the personal law of the parties, in the Punjab the Customary Law or the Hindu Law, as the case may be, but outside this Province the Hindu Law alone which continues to govern the validity of the Hindu marriage sacrament. Whether the Anand Marriage Act existed or not, the question would thus, in either case, be decided by the Hindu Law, as they would be in the case of any other marriage among Sikhs who did not follow the Punjab Customary Law and who contracted an intercaste marriage."

THE VINODINI-MANUBHAI MARRIAGE.

The Ahmedabad correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle writes: A sensation was created in the city when the news spread that Kumari Vinodini Nilkanth, daughter of Lady Vidyagauri, was married to Mr. Manubhai Lalbhai Parikh, who is a Visashrimali Jain and is conducting the Ahmedabad Radio Company. Manubhai's present wife Smt. Sharda aged about 25 and their 3 sons are living. It is said no consent was given by Lady Vidyagauri for this marriage which was kept a secret up to the last moment. Miss Vinodini at present is the Head Mistress of the Municipal Girls' High School and has informed the Administrative Officer Mr. P. K. Desai, of her marriage, asking leave for a month and half stating that she had to leave Ahmedabad. A stir has been caused in the city by the marriage of Mr. Manubhai Lalbhai and Miss Vinodini Nilkanth. Manubhai is a Bania by caste, a graduate and business man and was also a Swadeshi worker. Miss Vinodini is a Nagar by caste and is the daughter of the late Sir Ramanbhai Nilkanth, well-known Gujarati writer, and social reformer. Miss Nilkanth besides being a Bombay graduate possesses some American degrees. She has widely travelled in America and only recently returned from an extensive tour in Japan and is serving as the Lady Superintendent of the Girls' High School. Prior to the marriage it is reported the couple embraced Sikhism and have left for their honeymoon to an unknown destination. The marriage is condemned both by the reformers and the orthodox including Lady Vidyagauri Nilkanth, the bride's mother and other relatives who are all ardent social reformers and highly educated. "Although (because?) we are social reformers we do not approve of this marriage," said Lady Vidyagauri to the Free Press correspondent, "especially as the bridegroom is a married man. We knew of Miss Vinodini's intention and tried to dissuade her from the marriage." The Bombay Chronicle correspondent writes from Ahmedabad: "News received from Bombay states that Manubhai has repented of this marriage after meeting his relatives who went to Bombay after him for inquiry. Similarly Vinodini also has sent a telegram to Lady Vidyagauri stating that she repented of the hasty step taken by her. She asked for advice as to what she should do now. It is said that Lady Vidyagauri has wired asking her to apologise and come back again to Ahmedabad."

The marriage of Miss Vinodini Nilkanth, the daughter of Lady Vidyagauri Nilkanth the well-known social reformist of Ahmedabad with Manubhai Parikh, a radio engineer of the same place, has aroused the keenest interest among the public especially as it was against the wishes of Lady Vidyagauri and also because Mr. Parikh has already his first wife alive.

It was recently reported that both Miss Vinodini and Mr. Manubhai who are now in Bombay, are regretting their 'hasty step.' A denial of this report is given by the couple in an 'Interview to "Nav Bharat," a local Gujarati paper.

"I am tired of the bondage of society," said Miss Vinodini, "I feel that the foundations of our present-day society should be demolished and on their ruins a new society should be built up. My marriage will certainly have some effect on the society. It will startle parents and make them think before arranging an undesirable match for their children."

Q.—But in your case the question of undesirable marriage does not arise.

A.—Manubhai never entertained any feeling of love for his first wife after their marriage. His personal feelings in the matter of that marriage were never consulted. And when two people cannot love each other how can they live together?

Q.—But very often this ground is put forward only to justify a new marriage.

A.—That is true. But so far as Manubhai is concerned, I am certain that it is not so. I have come into contact with him for the last six years, and during this period we have anxiously discussed how to solve this problem. At last we felt that it is better for us to marry than to suffer like this indefinitely.

Q.—When you thought of the happiness of you both, did you ever try to think of the unhappiness you would cause to Manubhai's first wife?

A.—The fact is that she was never happy because Manubhai never loved her. And life without love is nothing but unhappiness. Our marriage, therefore, does not suggest the question of her unhappiness.

Q.—Your mother and your maternal uncle, Mr. Gatulal, were opposed to your marriage, is it not?

A.—That is true. But my mother would not allow this marriage because Manubhai has already his first wife living. But on this point I differ from my mother who is orthodox, while I am a reformist.

Q.—How can you call Lady Vidyagauri (your mother) orthodox? She is regarded as a god-mother of reformist couples.

A.—That is true, but she was opposed to this marriage of mine. If Manubhai had not his first wife living, then my mother would not have objected. But I go further than her and maintain that if there is no zest in life, why should the position be tolerated any longer? I believe that if a husband and wife do not love each other, it is immoral for them to live together. Having considered this situation for six long years we have now taken the step, and it cannot be called hasty or impulsive. Society may talk anything. If you care for the opinion of society, you cannot expect a social revolution.

Q.—Did you ever try to persuade Manubhai's first wife to agree to his second marriage with you?

A.—No, I have never met her. But Manubhai felt that he could never make her happy, and, therefore, we decided on this step.

Q.—It is certain that she will now have to lead a miserable life.

A.—Though she was never happy before, she must have certainly been shocked by our marriage. But our social life is such that there was no other recourse.

Replying to a further question, Miss Vinodini said "We do not in the least regret our marriage and we are prepared to suffer any consequences that may result."

The Free Press gives the following account: The curtain has not yet rung down on the Vinodini-Manubhai drama. The marriage is still a matter of hot discussion among the general public and the Nagar and Jain communities to which bride and bridegroom respectively belonged. The local journals are daily publishing lengthy accounts of further developments and are adversely commenting on the marriage.

It appears that the local Sikhs do not recognise this as a true Sikh marriage. It is learnt that the couple are now in Bombay. The former wife of Mr. Manubhai and her relatives have also left for Bombay. A telephone message said to have been received by a friend of Mr. Manubhai Parikh, says that Mr. Manubhai expressed regret for what had happened.

On the other hand Miss Vinodini had, prior to her marriage, written a letter addressed to all the girl students of the high school of which she was the Principal. In the letter, she says that what she was doing may not be considered proper by society, but she had taken the step of marrying Manubhai in obedience to her 'inner voice.'

Some further developments have taken place in connection with this episode. It is reported that Lady Vidyaguvri Nilkanth, the girl's mother, received a telegram from Vinodini saying that she greatly repents the hasty step she has taken and seeking advice from her mother.

It is also reported that Lady Nilkanth has sent a telegram to Vinodini in reply, asking her to publicly apologise for the faulty step taken and then to come to Ahmedabad.

Miss Vinodini Nilkanth is now in Bombay, staying at Sardar Griha.

Interviewed by the Free Press correspondent, Miss Vinodini flatly denied these reports. She declared that her marriage with Mr. Parikh is the result of six years' deliberation and that both of them were now fully satisfied with their action.

In the course of further conversation with Miss Vinodini she declared her decision to stick to her maiden name and not, as is the Hindu custom, adopt the husband's family name.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Removal of Liquor Shop:—A referendum under the Local Options Act for recording the decision of the electorate on the question of the removal of the liquor shop from the local Municipal limits was held at Sadhura (Ambala), on July 30 and 31. Out of 1,837 Municipal votes more than 1,300 voted for the removal of the said shop. This has been a huge success for the members of the Prohibition Committee and their sympathisers. This Committee was organised especially for this occasion and did a lot of useful and active propaganda work for days together before the polling began. L. Nathu Ram, Secretary of the Prohibition Committee, L. Hans Raj Jain and their colleagues deserve the gratitude of the public of this place for their efforts.—Tribune.

Indians in Zanzibar:—Mr. K. P. S. Menon, I. C. S., is proceeding on deputation to Zanzibar to investigate the condition of Indians in Zanzibar vis-a-vis certain measures passed by the Colonial Legislature. It will be recalled that Sir Mahamaj Singh who was asked to go to Zanzibar could not do so owing to illness and it was understood that Mr. Bozman, his Secretary, also was unable to go. Mr. Menon will stay at Zanzibar for about six weeks. The Secretary to the Government of India (Education, Health and Lands Department) has telegraphed to the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association that Government are deputing Mr. K. P. S. Menon, I. C. S., to make local inquiries in Zanzibar. Mr. Menon arrived in Bombay on the morning of August 3, by the Frontier Mail and sailed by the s.s. "Kenya," the same afternoon.

Ceylon Women's Conference:—For the first time in the history of Ceylon, and All-Ceylon Women's Conference will be held in Colombo on August 31 and September 1 next. The Conference, which will be of a non-political character, will be open to all women, regardless of race, nationality, belief or occupation, and aims at bringing the women of the island together to discuss common problems in education, home life, social welfare and legislation. A number of interesting subjects will be discussed at the conference, including the existing laws relating to women and children. The Conference will also suggest new legislation necessary for (a) the protection of children, (b) dealing with juvenile offenders, (c) protection of women in industrial employment, (d) dealing with female offenders, and (e) the control of midwives.

The New Nationalist Party:—One of the reasons which made Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya hesitate long before he finally made up his mind to resign the acting Presidentship of the Congress Parliamentary Board, was a doubt as to the amount of support he would receive for organised opposition to the Communal Award. Even after sending in his resignation, he seems to have encouraged some members of the Congress Working Committee to believe that he would confine his party to Congressmen. Whether he did so or not, he has invited to the Conference which he has called for the 18th at Calcutta, persons who are not Congressmen. That Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya is gaining considerable support for his new party is evidenced by the lament of a prominent Congress leader of Benares, Mr. Sri Prakash, that the Pandit is receiving "congratulatory messages of rapturous delight from all sides at the split in our ranks." The Pandit and Mr. Aney naturally feel greatly encouraged by the support they are receiving in unexpectedly large measure. They have now thrown the doors of their Nationalist Party wide open to all comers and there is even talk of their persuading Muslims to join them. Although the only point of difference between them and the Working Committee of the Congress, was said to be as regards their respective attitudes to the Communal Award, other differences too will, as a matter of course, follow. For one thing, the Khaddar fetish can have no place in the new party. The new party is also opposed to legislation in matters of religion which is only another way of stating the Congress principle of neutrality in religion. The Amrita Basar Patrika, of all organs of Indian opinion, criticises this declaration as likely to go counter to the views of a large section of the population. On the contrary, it will meet with general support, as it clearly does not include legislation necessary to validate urgent social reforms. Muslims are even more keen on the point than Hindus. The one weak point in the statement of the Nationalist Party is that it does not relinquish the futile opposition to separate electorates for Muslims and confine its opposition to weightages. It is the weightages and not separate electorates which are anti-national and endanger the relations between the communities. By means of weightages, four degrees of citizenship are being created—the European on top, next to him the Anglo-Indian, then the Muslim and last of all Hindus, Christians, Parsis and others. No party can claim to be nationalist which does not reject this inequality of citizenship.

Bombay Provincial Congress Committee Elections:—The results of the elections for the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee held last week, have come as a complete surprise to local Congress leaders. Notwithstanding an intensive propaganda for several weeks, only 15,000 out of a total of 30,000 on the registers voted at the elections. A considerable number did not wear Khaddar even at the time of voting. The number who transgressed the rule that voters should be "habitual wearers of Khaddar" was, of course, much larger. In fact, in one district the Chairman announced a day previously that the Khaddar rule will not be insisted on. Out of a total of 46 members, no less than 27 of those elected are new members, "new in the sense" writes the staff correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle, "that they were not heard of at all in Congress circles." The General Secretary of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee failed to be elected. So did prominent Congress leaders like Messrs. Brelvi, Horniman and others. Mr. K. F. Nariman, President of the Committee and Chairman of the Reception Committee of the forthcoming session of the Congress, who was expected to come at the top of the poll in Girgaum, came third, with nearly two thousand votes behind the two candidates at the head of the list. A feature of the elections was the success of 7 women and 9 avowed socialists (including one of the former). Complaints that voters were enrolled for the specific purpose of voting for candidates who had them enrolled (by paying 4 annas per head or by other means of persuasion) have been rife. But this is not a new thing in Congress elections though, perhaps, it has been more largely and systematically practised this time. It does not, therefore, affect the conclusion to which these results point,

But this is not a new thing in Congress elections though, perhaps, it has been more largely and systematically practised this time. It does not, therefore, affect the conclusion to which these results point, gratification lay only in a self-complacency of having eaten too much and too many. I have now been observing fast since the 16th of July and during these 15 days I have been living on lemon juice diluted with natural water. Occasionally I take sips of pine apple juice and cocoanut water. I have hitherto never felt hungry or thirsty. Of course, I have lost in weight and have become slightly emaciated but one thing that strikes me is that I have gained more in energy, vigour and cheerfulness. I can now do more of both physical and mental labour, and, with each sunrise, my experience becomes all the more fortified. I am determined to carry on like this until real hunger returns and I feel tempted to convey my experiences to your readers to say that fasting is not so horrible and dangerous as it is popularly apprehended. Rather it is invigorating and brain-building. This much I am pretty sure that hitherto my hunger has been a routine hunger, a hunger false, stereotyped and degenerating." Fasting is a tonic for people who suffer from diseases due to overeating—who live to eat. This was known centuries before Mr. Bhowmic discovered it. In fact, it has been observed in the case even of domesticated animals. (Wild animals never over-eat.) But for people who have not the means nor the temptation to indulge in over-feeding, fasting means starvation and no addition, as in Mr. Bhowmic's case, to their energy, vigour and cheerfulness. There is also the psychological difference of a deprivation which is voluntary in one case and forced in the other. When you are sure you can get your next meal whenever you need it, you are spared the gnawing despondency of one who does not know where to look for it.

An Insidious Evil:—The evil commonly imputed to Communalism is that it leads to undue favouritism being shown to men of one's community to the injury of persons of other communities in matters of common concern. A more insidious and, therefore, more dangerous evil is the temptation of sensitive men and women to be unduly censorious of people of their own community in order to escape this liability. In some recent cases the Judges, Muslims, struck us as having allowed themselves to be influenced by a consideration of this kind into giving expression to sentiments and passing sentences rather more than what would be absolutely appropriate.

The Anand Marriage Act:—In view of the grave doubts regarding the validity of marriages under the Anand Marriage Act of persons who became Sikhs solely for the purpose of effecting an otherwise unpermissible union, it is desirable that an early opportunity should be taken to bring them to the test of a judicial decision. The question of amending the Act, may, if necessary, be taken up after the decision is pronounced. The amendments should, in the main, restrict Anand Marriages to parties, whose parents observed or were competent to observe the custom, and in the case of converts to parties who are single or have no wife or husband living by a prior marriage.

Missionary Ideals:—We publish this week extracts from an interesting sermon delivered at Cambridge University by Mr. Paul Gibson, Principal of Ridley Hall. Mr. Gibson was formerly in Ceylon at the head of the Theological College there. One can see from the sermon that he has been greatly influenced by his Indian experience. He remarks in one place that only those who have been in the East can know the relationship between disciple and master, that the disciple leans heavily on his teacher and that something of that spirit is necessary in mission workers. Mr. Gibson regrets that "Rethinking Missions," the report of the Hocking Commission of enquiry into the working of Christian Missions, does not stress the ideals behind missionary enterprise. But his own conclusions are not very different. On his standard that only those who are prepared to live the "Christian" life, should go out to teach it by precept and example to others, few workers would be judged fit for that great task. Whilst this undoubtedly places missionary ideals on a higher plane than in the past, at the same time it makes it very difficult to secure people who live up to this requirement for mission work. And yet, if Mr. Gibson's views are accepted, as they should be, by mission boards, we shall see a wholesome shifting of the emphasis from philanthropic activities to spiritual growth.

Mass Conversions:—The Rev. F. Kurtz read a paper at the Missionary Conference at Darjeeling last June on "Christian Mass Movements in India" which the Baptist Missionary Review reproduces in its August number. The paper is based on Dr. J. W. Pickett's "Mass Movements Survey" and contains a strong appeal for mass conversions. Dr. Kurtz remarks with pride that caste problems do not bulk large among the converts although he concedes that in some missions 'inter dining and inter-marriages between different sections are almost unknown.' Nor does the writer disguise the fact that the giving up of caste has been not altogether to the benefit of the Indian Christian Community. He writes "Many are not yet able to use properly the liberty which has come to them through Christianity.....In some sections where early missionaries used liquor, some of the Christians become more addicted to drink than their fellow caste men. Missionaries are now teetotallers and all this is changed." The sudden removal of the caste system has apparently, as Sir Herbert Risley put it, "been more than a revolution: it resembles the removal of some elemental force like gravitation." Dr. Kurtz also deplores the fact that the Hindu, once converted to Christianity, spends less on Christian worship than he did on his 'idolatrous rites.' "The home people continue to think that the Christian community is still in a famine condition. From an American or European point of view, I grant that may be true, but we have to work on an Indian basis."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, AUGUST 18, 1934.

THE COMMUNIST MENACE.

It is an old trick of statesmen who wish to divert attention from their own shortcomings, to keep a foreign bogey dangling before the public eye. The statesmen and administrators of British India have not been free from this foible. For many years it was Tzarist Russia watching for an opportunity to pounce upon India in accordance with the directions in an apocryphal will of Peter the Great. British benevolent neutrality in the Russo-Japanese War towards Japan was motivated by this fear of Russia. The Japanese victory in that war inaugurated a new era in the relations between Europe and Asia, and there are not wanting writers who lay the blame for it on the foreign policy of Britain. It was an irony of fate which led the British Government to seek to save during the last War the Tzarist regime that it had helped less than two decades previously to undermine. It did not succeed and Tzarism perished amidst the flames of red Revolution, unwept, unhonoured and unsung. The Russian menace for the time being had ceased, but something else was found to put in its place, and to combat it the Rowlatt Act was passed and it brought in its train the Jallianwala massacre, Non-co-operation and Civil Disobedience. There was a lull for some years after the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. Repressive measures were either repealed or allowed to fall into desuetude. Terrorist activities practically ceased, and social legislation was quickened. India seemed to be settling down a last to an era of fruitful co-operation. Then came Mr. Montagu's dismissal from the India Office, a prelude to the reaction in British policy. Lord Reading with his legal and judicial background withstood to a large extent demands for drastic repressive legislation against Civil Disobedience. His successor, Lord Irwin, was an "idealist," that is, he could see farther than the "realists" of the bureaucracy. Repression to his mind was a remedy worse than the disease, to be resorted to in extreme crises and then only in order to gain time for reform. Even when forced to issue drastic ordinances, he made qualifications and exceptions to reconcile them to the better mind of India. His successor, Lord Willingdon, had no such qualms and the revival of terrorist activities in Bengal prevented effective opposition to the wholesale repression his ordinances inaugurated. The suspension of Civil Disobedience and the rise of a Parliamentary group in the Congress have eased the tension between Government and the public. The measures against terrorists, bordering almost on martial law, in Bengal, have been acquiesced in. The extension of some of the special provisions of the anti-terrorist laws to Assam, met with only more or less formal opposition in the Assembly.

Things thus seemed to be progressing peacefully. Civil Disobedience prisoners in jails have been reduced to a small fraction of their original number. In this connection, a word of appreciation is due to Government for the considerate manner in which they have allowed Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru to remain with his wife until she is out of danger. This is in marked contrast to the attitude of Government in some other cases of equal urgency, and we welcome the change. But our rulers are never happy unless they have a bogey to frighten themselves and the people with. They have found one in Communism. The Soviet regime in Russia has survived its excommunication by Europe and America, and has now become respectable enough to be invited to join them in the League of Nations for ensuring international peace and collaboration in humanitarian service. The promulgation by the Government of India of a ban on Communist organisations at this time, came, as we said last week, rather as a surprise. On Tuesday, the Home Member of the Government of India explained in the Legislative Assembly the reasons for the ban. One was certain opinions expressed by the Allahabad High Court in their judgment on appeal of the persons convicted in the Meerut Case. The appeal was decided about a year ago, and the sentences reduced in the case of several of the accused. Much water has flown under the bridge since then. Then there are quotations from "the draft programme" of the Communist Party of India. A draft does not become effective until it is accepted. The recourse to the "draft programme" shows that Government have not found anything that can be adduced as objectionable in that actually adopted by the Party. Next, are cited some aims of the Communist International as summarised in the Report of the Fish Committee appointed by the United States House of Representatives. It was after this Report was made that America received a Soviet Ambassador and sent her Ambassador to Moscow! We would commend to the Home Member the deliberate opinion of Walter Duranty, an Englishman who has represented with great distinction the New York Times in Moscow for many years: "(October 1, 1933.) When I came to Russia twelve years ago I was prejudiced against the Bolsheviks for a variety of reasons. And in that year of famine I found conditions terrible enough. But I also found, which I had not known before, that the Russian masses had been enslaved by the Tzarist regime, whose corruption and incompetence had been the chief levers of its own downfall. I found that the Soviet leaders were in the main altruists—fanatical altruists if you like—honestly trying to make a disciplined and self-respecting nation of this horde of newly liberated slaves." The surest way of countering Communism is to avoid Tzarism

BOLSHEVIKS AND RELIGION.

An exhibition of the "anti-God" posters of modern Russia was held recently in London and a copy of a French pamphlet entitled "Les Sans Dieu" describing the exhibits there, has been sent to us by an English friend. The pamphlet is interesting but reveals nothing new. People are likely to run away with the idea that, because Christianity is now organising against Communism, the Bolshevik attack on religion is a new feature of Soviet policy. But, as Walter Duranty remarks in his "Russia Reported," "the anti-religious movement is a progressive process continuing for several years." "Les Sans Dieu" itself deplores the past apathy of Christians towards the problems of the religious in Russia. It remarks that a Geneva Conference of Christian leaders admitted last October the lack of response from the laity to appeals addressed on behalf of Russian believers by the leaders of the Churches and resolved to set up a permanent Committee to work for a powerful front against the action of the Godless and at a subsequent meeting in January this year it was decided to organise an exhibition of documents relating to the subject. The exhibition in Byron House was the result and it is its declared object to strengthen believers of "the working classes in their Christian convictions as opposed to anti-religious Marxism." In other words, although our attention has been pointedly drawn by our correspondent to the fact that Bolshevism wages war against all religions and not Christianity alone, the "Pro Deo" movement considers the attack as mainly directed against Christianity. Naturally as 76 percent of the Russian population are Christians by birth. The "Christian" attitude towards Communism is familiar to all of us. It will be interesting to observe the Bolshevik attitude to Christianity.

From what sympathetic writers have written of the relations subsisting between the Russian Church and the Soviet—and obviously they are the only writers who can be consulted on the subject—the Church would have suffered greatly and eventually died for lack of funds even if the Soviet Government had not entered on its campaign of persecution. Theodore Dreiser writes, "In these days, truly, the priests and their flocks are hard put to it to make the church books balance." (Dreiser Looks at Russia, p. 174.) "If we commence an inquiry," writes Dr. Hecker, "into the causes which have brought about the rupture with Religion, we find them to be the results of either agitation or disappointment in the clergy and the power of religion to prevent the calamities of war and famine." (Religion and Communism, p. 229). M. N. Klepinin who contributes an article on religion to the handbook "Russia-U. S. S. R.," admits that the Churches in Russia have had to contend with falling numbers while, though there are few active atheists, large numbers are passively so. And M. Klepinin is a lecturer in the Theological Academy of Paris. Waldemar Gurian whose "Bolshevism—Theory and Practice" has given many an argument to Christian and other opponents of Soviet Russia, has a significant sentence, "The Bolsheviks regard the power hitherto exercised by religion as resting primarily on its support by the State." Both Maurice Hindus and Walter Duranty comment at length on the decreasing hold of organised religion over the Russian people. And both writers stress the view that Bolshevism had to adopt a policy of opposition to religion because the religions sought to identify themselves with the old Tsarist State. Protestant Christianity, writes Hindus, helped the Bolsheviks to break the Orthodox Church which had persecuted its followers under the Tsarist regime. It was in turn broken by the Soviets, and a main cause was that the Bolsheviks were afraid of the Protestant Church becoming the refuge of the counter-revolutionaries. Duranty goes even further. "The Russian peasants," he writes, "have begun to feel that they can do without the church which they never really understood. The church had lost touch with the masses and its detractors assert that it played no helpful role in the national life. On the other hand the communists generally try—and in many cases succeed—to provide exactly that form of community centre which is now being developed by broad-minded churchmen in America and elsewhere. Where in a village or urban factory district a church is converted into a club, it becomes a real factor in community life." In short Russia is undergoing the same experience as other countries. Broader views of religion are taking hold of the people. Only while elsewhere it has been possible for the change to take place gradually within the organised faith, here the two proved incompatible.

The agitation which is now apparently gathering strength in Europe, for resisting the encroachments of the Soviet State on religion leads one to believe that, having lost the battle on Russian soil, the church seeks to retrieve its position in other fields. It is very doubtful, however, whether Russian Christians are at all likely to be benefitted by an agitation led by men who work from outside that country and whose motives are probably not altogether unmixed. It is certain that the burden of bearing the brunt of any revival of anti-religious severities against the religious—Mr. Hindus remarks that the Bolsheviks have given up their campaign—will necessarily fall on the Russian believers. Had the "Pro Deo" movement concentrated on helping the sufferers there in the first instance much more could have been done. As for the restrictions placed on the churches, there is another side to the question. Mr. Gurian laments that the right to conduct propaganda is denied to them. He even seems to make a grievance of the fact that "the penal code expressly forbids the exploitation of the 'religious prejudices' of the masses in an attempt to overthrow the Government or to incite to resistance of its laws and decrees." But how, we should like to know, is the Communist treated in the "Christian" countries? In the most advanced ones freedom of profession is allowed but they have no right of propaganda. Russia has merely accepted the opinion of Christian leaders that Christianity and Communism are incompatible, and she treats Christian propaganda exactly as these countries treat Communist propaganda. It is generally true that Western critics of Soviet Russia fail to make due allowance for the mistakes of the Church in that country which brought it into disrepute. The current Baptist Missionary Review contains an article on "Churches That Produce Atheists" which has some pertinent remarks on Russia: "The character of the Eastern Orthodox Church is largely responsible for the recoil in the U.S.S.R.. So closely was the Church bound up with the old Tsarist State that it could even be regarded as a department of the State." It would seem that Western Christianity has now come up against real opposition and feels extremely doubtful of its ability to survive. It has, however, something to learn from the East. Commenting on the things that the various religions can share, a writer placed the Christian contribution as providing a method of meeting materialism and Communism. He was wrong there. On the other hand, Christianity can learn from China and India how to meet a campaign which threatens to uproot the social, national and religious life of a people. For when Western Christianity came to Asia, it was as disrupting a force here as Communism appears to be to Europe today.

REMARRIAGE OF HINDU WOMEN.

(BY R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

I. INTRODUCTORY.

The late Sriman Mahamahopadhyaya Sri Krishna Tatacharya of Kanchi, who was a rare genius and versatile scholar at once and died in 1890 at 61 years of age in wedded poverty but full of laurels from all parts of India for his learned dissertations numbering over one hundred and twenty and in Sanskrit and covering all the four Tantras or branches of learning, has left for posterity two brochures bearing on and condemning sea-voyage and widow-marriage, that concern the social reformers. The spotless life he led, and the unique position he held as Jagatguru and chief representative (in the gadi left by Sri Ramanujacharya, the founder) of the Visishtadwaita philosophy of Sri Vaishnava school of Brahmins supplemented the great authority of his unquestioned learning that breathes on every line of his encyclopaedic works. Hence it is that one feels rather nervous when one takes up an attitude and position diametrically opposed to such a great and venerable authority, who is now dead half a century ago. His aim was, if I understand him aright, "simply to justify the way of 'custom' to man." But if I happen to err in the company of the modern band of social reformers, it is because of no irreverence to the older generation of lofty souls, but in sheer justice to womankind that has for several thousands of years silently borne their miserable lot in simple resignation, especially the younger folk among them, with their bright hope of a happy future suddenly nipped in the bud. The field might have been so often covered by many an abler man; but that does not deter the present writer from undertaking the task of viewing the same in the light of his God-given head and heart. He would propose to approach the subject in a modern spirit of research in law and usage from original sources.

The Hindu woman's marital status has, one may at the very outset observe, travelled all the way from absolute freedom of contract savouring little or nothing of a status of marriage down to the present life-long virgin-widowhood. There seems to be absolutely no warrant whatsoever for the strange and distressing development of the 'law and custom' of the institution in question. Here and there, there may be stray expressions in Smritis and Puranas bearing on it but they have all been, in my humble opinion, either unwarranted or completely misunderstood to amount to and mean law pure and simple.

What was perhaps intended to convey a moral appreciation of the life of voluntary renunciation and self-sacrifice on the part of an elderly lady in affluent circumstances after the husband's death has strangely enough acquired, by sheer dint of popular but blind following, the peculiarly ferocious force of an unrelenting law of usage; so much so that even the legislature has not been able to achieve any appreciable change in the tenor of the obtaining custom after three quarters of a century of working of the Widow-Remarriage Act. Such has been the unique hold upon the Hindu public mind of the revered Smriti and Purana writers that it has been impossible to dislodge it from its moorings in religious or socio-religious refuge of their authoritative words. It fears to offend their Sastras for fear of perdition.

But if it is shown how remarkably generous and well-intentioned they were when they laid down the law or eulogised certain rare aspects of the custom in question, it will then be clear that what was really unexpected on their part has unfortunately happened and has ruined and blighted the whole race of Hindus and made it powerless and pessimistic under the combined auspices of the doctrines of Karma and Transmigration of Souls. A very long range of view has to be taken if only to enable an impartial study and sympathetic judgment on all available evidence on record.

We all know how the Maha Bharata carefully preserves the story of Swetaketu protesting in vain against his father allowing the mother to be led away by an unknown old Brahmin who begged him for the loan of the person of the lady for a short year in order that he may raise an issue for his own salvation upon her before returning her to her own life-companion. If the life-companionship were at all just the same as or akin to a status of marriage, the union must have been of a very elastic kind indeed, bordering on absolute freedom of choice on the part of man or wife, with this difference that it could be altered and compromised at the sweet will and pleasure of either party; and there was no compelling force or reason to prevent the same.

From out of this state of affairs there grew all of a sudden, to all intents and purposes, perhaps by Swetaketu's terror-striking legislation, a complete and unalterable subjection of women in law and in fact of actual life in society. लोक संग्रहाय हि तदमन्त्राः स्त्रियो मताः (In world-welfare women have been held excluded from all Mantras for good: Baudhayana, 1.5.111); निरिन्द्रिया ह्यदाया श्र स्त्रियो यता इति श्रुतिः (Women have been, in Vedic tradition, held incompetent and disinherited: Baudhayana, 2.2.53). And woman was, once for all and invariably, placed under the sustained protection of her father during infancy or minority, of her wedded husband after marriage, and of her own son in her old age, and deprived of all freedom of movement and action: (Manu, 9.3 & 5.148 & 149). There was no more separate Yajnya or Sacrifice, vow, or fast independent of her lord, by devoted service to whom, she should aspire to heaven: (Manu 5.154-156). She was denied all right to property and worked for the benefit of the family of her father, husband or son: (M. 8.416.) Her father was saddled with the duty of giving her in marriage in due time on pain of losing his right to her Sulka or marriage-fee (M. 9.4 & 9.94 & 196), and to her inheritance, if she were obliged to seek for her lord in Swayamvara.

But she was also forced to give up her family jewels if she would not wait for full three years after attaining her age of puberty. So too her husband was obliged to visit her on all due occasions on pain of incurring the sin of foeticide (Baud. 4.1. 819-23), and on pain of parting with a third share of his estate in favour of his dutiful and obedient wife if he should abandon or long neglect her: (Yag. 1.76.) And the son was compelled to support his aged mother even when fallen or outcast: (Baud. 2.2.48.) Such was the most salutary provision with which the rule of dependence of women started; and we know the long path and winding process of how women's rights of Stridhana and widow's estate in her husband's property were evolved; but that is a different story. We are now mainly concerned with her marriage or re-marriage.

2. THE VEDIC PERIOD.

Let us now start from the Vedic mantras applicable to marriage. Manu (9.65) says that neither Niyoga nor widow-marriage could be supported by the marriage-mantras. But we must ask how it was that both the institutions were long in vogue and countenanced and amply regulated by the Sastras. King Vena might have been responsible for the introduction of Niyoga but how did the Sages countenance the same and embody so many rules thereon in almost every one of their Smritis? The fact is, they had both come to stay as they had served a dire want on the introduction of the severe rule against women. Both of them persisted long enough; nay, their issues have had their high place in the order of heirs; the son born of Niyoga, called Kshetrāja, stood very next to an Aurasa or legitimate son, and that born of remarriage, called Paunarbhava, long occupied a third, fourth or sixth place in the list of heirs until he was slowly and gradually pushed almost to the very end or the eleventh place. So that it is clear that Manu's slokas from 65 to 68 must be a late interpolation. But the main question is whether it is true that there is no warrant in the mantras for remarriage of women at all, and was it therefore then that it has ever afterwards been held in awful disfavour? It is submitted that it is not so. "Soma knew (married?) thee first; Gandharva next after him; Agni was thy third lord; and thy lord in the fourth instance is human beings. Soma passed thee on to Gandharva; Gandharva delivered thee to Agni; Agni gave thee to me with wealth and sons," (Mantra-prasna; and Paraskara (1.4). The deliberate use of the plural "human beings" shows that the lady could marry more than one, at any rate successively, even as the Gods have as a lesson shown the way before human lords. And the first husband performs on the woman all the necessary samskara ceremonies of marriage in detail so that his successor, if any, need not cover the whole ground once over again but only do a small indispensable portion as in all cases of Punarupanayana or subsequent thread-ceremony as prayaschitta for any error of commission or omission, wherein a large number of items are omitted: (Baud. 2.1.28.) Saptapadi effecting transfer of dominion to the husband from the father and change of gotra with its consequences relating to pollution on either side, could be gone through to effect similar changes from husband to husband.

The following mantras to the effect, vis., "Produce ten sons upon this woman, and make your husband the eleventh (treat him as the beloved last)," "Stand on this stone and be firm (true) even as this stone," "May my husband have a long lease of life for one hundred autumns," "Sit over your husband's head and shine gloriously with your children, etc." "Enter your husband's seat in heaven without any (more) widowhood," "Sit upon her lap, hold her by the hands and embrace her in hearty love," "Let Vishnu prepare the (sexual) field, the Creator the forms, Lord of children the showers, Brahman the womb," and such and similar mantras might still be chanted in all cases of remarriage as in original marriage, with great profit and no offence to the scheme of rituals. As for those relating to gift of the lady to the bridegroom, in the place of the father either her late husband's representative relation would have to stand or on the strength of Narada's and Parasara's rule (allowing a woman a second husband in the prescribed five instances of death, impotency, excommunication, civil death such as Sannyasishood or permanent dwelling in a foreign country, or other loss of the husband's company), she might undergo the Prajapatya yaga at once wherein the bridal pair undertake to join in all acts of Dharma for the rest of their joint life. In fact they re-married only in Prajapatya form of marriage leaving either party again to marry another in any of the stated five contingencies: (Narada, 15.97, and Parasara, 4.30) and Kullukabhatta's commentary on Manu, 5.152). So that it is meaningless to say that the mantras will not be applicable to re-marriage ceremonies.

IDEALS OF MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE.*

(BY REV. J. PAUL S. R. GIBSON.)

The last quarter of a century has seen a complete transformation in the problems of missionary enterprise. The time is ripe for a fresh consideration of the subject in the light of present experience. There are certain far-reaching changes, such as the world-wide economic depression, and the consequent instability both of material circumstances and mental outlook, which have had serious repercussions on the funds of Missionary Societies and on candidates for missionary service. They, however, are of a temporary nature and do not constitute the main problem.

When the call to serve abroad came to me and to others of my generation, we went out as representatives of the churches or societies which were the religious expression of nations held in high esteem in the world. Empire was in their hands, worldly success marked their progress, and scientific development gave them intellectual superiority. Moreover these countries were regarded as Christian. Then came the Great War. Not only were our eyes opened to the unreality of our claim to be countries under the sway of the Mind of Christ, but the non-Christian communities were disillusioned. They saw how little Christ had done for us either spiritually or materially. Even the victors shared in the general defeat, and our western prestige, whether this worldly or other worldly, suffered an eclipse. The advent of the motor bus has established close contact between the Christians of different Churches in adjacent areas, and revealed to them the animosities and contradictions that separate them one from the other. The very attempts at Reunion which are a feature of the present time, encouraging though they are, do not cause the non-Christian to exclaim "How these Christians love one another!" Deeper even than these revelations of hard facts about the failure of Christianity to its ideals are the attacks on the very existence of Christendom itself. In Russia the faith has been driven underground by a determined anti-god propaganda, which has all the fervour of a new religion, and has spread not only westward into Europe, but eastward into India, China and Japan. The United Missionary Conference in Jerusalem in 1928 rightly saw that the imminent danger lay not in non-Christian religions but in the rapid spread of secularism and the war on any kind whatsoever of religious belief. Both from within and from without the position of Christ is undermined. It is no wonder therefore that thinkers in non-Christian religions should be telling the world that its needs are fully met by their own faiths. The recent works of S. Radhakrishnan are a case in point, and the appeal to theoretically atheistic thinkers such as C. E. M. Joad, who champions Radhakrishnan in his "Counter-attack from the East," must be given full weight.

Two other factors cannot be omitted. In earlier days missionaries going into lands where educational, medical and agricultural work was not highly developed, undertook these departments of life and became the pioneers of progressive movements. The value and influence of their efforts was realised to be of such importance, that now in many cases governments have taken over, or are more and more taking over, these activities as being primarily their concern. The step is natural and cannot be avoided, but the result is that the religious and specifically Christian contribution is in part, or entirely, eliminated. Nationalism is in the ascendant, and with nationalism is associated the renewed desire to keep alive the faith of the forefathers. Any attempt to replace the people's religion by that of a foreigner cannot expect to receive the government's approval.

[Aug. 18

Lastly, the whole world position has changed. The missionary no longer goes to men and women living within a settled order with an alternative message of life, a new interpretation of existence which they can ponder in quiet. The message has to be given to people in flux, fighting for very existence against fears and famines, in the midst of political intellectual and social convulsions. There is a surging need, essentially spiritual, and yet the physical conditions of mind and body are such that there is little receptiveness to what is regarded as metaphysical speculation, and unrelated to the pressing clamorous urge of the moment.

The tacit acceptance of Western or White superiority by others, and by ourselves, led men to feel their qualities of leadership and of administrative ability could be effectively used in the East. The missionary was to be the leader and originator. He would share with his converts what the West and its civilization had to give. That day is past.

In many countries the indigenous churches have developed their own life, they manage their own affairs and conduct their own missionary work. They still need foreign help in men and money, but they ask for co-operators, for men and women ready, like themselves, to serve the young church. They realise the contribution we can give, but it must flow from equal to equal, and be mutual, as we learn of them qualities we have never appreciated. If leading there be, Eastern or Western, it must be the unconscious influence of a personality from behind.

I referred to the call to share our civilization. Many wished to let all races enter into what we called our Christian heritage, the privileges of our Christian England. The superiority of our country and the faults of others absorbed us. A much discussed book, "Mother India," expresses this bluntly and crudely. But apart from the deserved reply made by an Indian, as true and as unjust as the book attacked, we have in fact become less insular since aeroplanes stole from us our water. Those who know England, even though they love her, would never be satisfied merely to make another country like her. They remember the Indian boy who was thinking of baptism being sent to England by his father lest he became a Christian. Both racially and theologically the position has changed. The old appeal was to pity. Pictures were drawn of the number of unconverted falling into hell each moment of day and night. The horror of the unregenerate bowing down to wood and stone was—and in some places still is—sung in hymns, yet the idolatry of Mammon, of ambition, of prestige as seen in the West among so-called Christians is, if anything, more vile in God's sight.

To-day with the translation into Western languages of the classics of non-Christian religions, however inadequate at times the attempt to express Eastern ideas in Western words may be, with the close study of comparative religion, with the deeper understanding of the nature of God as Father of all His children rather than as Condemner of the many, these old ideas appear to us not only incongruous but impossible of belief. The appeal to pity in this sense makes no urgent claim on us. Salvation then, was conceived to hang on a right understanding of God's system of redemption, and consequently the call was to make this known by preaching. Salvation now is seen to be the life that can be lived in communion with God's universal love, and the challenge is to live that life amongst those who know it not and lead them to enquire of its secret. The centre of gravity has passed from enunciation of doctrine to the compelling power of the Christian life. Thus it has passed from the individual necessity of a solitary of the Gospel, to a corporate responsibility for exemplifying Christian character. Christianity is now more than before envisaged as a life in fellowship, and the older conception of the one thing needful being that a man save his soul alive, no longer satisfies.

We may state the change in another way by saying that the rigid either, or, of the earlier generation has been replaced by the both, and, of the present time. Absolutism has been replaced by relativity. Tolerance has ousted exclusiveness. In making these generalisations I realise that they are far from describing accurately the trend of thought in the minds of all men or all parties, even in this country, still less in other lands. Nevertheless, I believe that the general tendencies here outlined do in some correct measure describe the movements that have taken place in the thinking of Christians, and those who are interested in the missionary problem today must take them into account.

As to weak, ineffective or even false methods of working, these will bring their own nemesis on those concerned. What a man soweth that shall he also reap. The work shall be tested by fire. For other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ. The arguments that may have carried weight in days past, the appeal to miracle and prophecy, cannot be used today without danger. The resting on the arm of the flesh in the guise of state support and favour will end in disaster now, as it ever has done. The substitution of philanthropy for Christianity will lead to inanition, for there is no brotherhood of man apart from the Fatherhood of God. We come therefore to the crux of the whole matter. Is the Christ and His message so unique and so universally needed that we can dare to go forth and proclaim any world situation, in any country, to any people, as the one Life and Life Giver who is necessary? My conviction is that the answer is in the affirmative. While one can assert the fact with confidence it will be with humility and shame, partly for the failure of oneself to rise to the Christian privilege, but also through the failure within the Church and her inability to bring the nation forward to that towards which she is striving.

We can therefore go forth with boldness, confident in the uniqueness of our message and assured that it is all sufficient to meet the universal and deepest and most personal need of men. In conclusion we turn to our Lord's teaching on the subject of world evangelisation as disclosed to us in the Gospels. We shall there find the guidance we require for the due fulfilment of our task. "As the Father hath sent me even so send I you." Our task is as His task. He came to reveal the personality of God as Father. Our main work must be to make known the same. We are ambassadors for Christ. He submitted to the limitations of a short earthly life, but that life is to be relived by us wherever we are, and what He gave to Galilee nineteen hundred years ago we are to proclaim in word and deed, generation after generation. In A. G. Hogge's words "The Gospel is too splendid for us to acquiesce in its remaining anywhere unknown."

It will demand the same surrender of things held dear, regarding them not as something to be grasped but an opportunity for joyful sacrifice. It will require the leaving of the accustomed habitat for another where one can get close to the needs of other men, incarnating ourselves into their circumstances. No superficial contact will suffice. A life lived and not a message delivered is required of us. Nothing less is implied in Christ's words as recorded in St. Luke,

"this do in remembrance of me." To limit the depth of this expression to the command to perform a ritual act is to miss its significance.

BUCHMANISM AND INDIA.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We in India are very much given to imitating the West. Especially is this true of Indian Christian Spirituality. Every religious movement that originates in Europe or America finds its way sooner or later, sooner than later, to India and secures a following in some corner or other of this vast country. The Oxford Group Movement has been no exception. It has its ardent supporters especially among the clergy and the missionaries, who feel that this is the thing that will bring reality to religion, in India. The Anglican Metropolitan of India, for example, who claims to have received a new vision Christ through the House Party in London, has even declared that the Indian political question itself could be solved through House Party methods. And I heard one of the Indian representatives on the Mission of Fellowship to Churches of the British Isles declare that what impressed him most in England was the activities of the Groups. That I thought was a superficial observation and unworthy of an Indian at this period of his nation's life; for it is my conviction, and that is the main point I want to develop in this article, that we have in India at this time a movement far more significant than any that the Churches in the West can show, a more literal lifting up of the Cross than the respectable religion of the Groups. But first let me give my impressions of Buchmanism.

Now for the "point of contact," as Mr. Buchman would say, to begin with. I had seen Mr. Buchman years ago in South India when he was the man behind the scenes, as it were, in a series of old time revival meetings conducted by Dr. Sherwood Eddy as he then was. More recently I met him and his group at work in a Theological College in Calcutta and was not much impressed by their methods or their results. One of the students who "shared" at the party they had in the College is now bitter against them. I have since read with interest the story of the Groups told by Mr. Russell in his "For Sinners only." That is an intriguing title. While at the Christa Seva Sangh, Poona I heard a brother, who had bagged an early copy of the book for his own reading, reluctantly handing it over to another more importunate saying, "thy need is greater than mine."

Having thus established what "F. B." would call my point of contact with the reader, may I "share" with him some of the thoughts stirred in me by the accounts of the Group Movement?

One of the most challenging things in the Movement is the claim of the Group to live and act under the immediate impulsion of the Holy Spirit. Their methods of getting guidance—sitting down with "Guidance Book" and pencil to hand—may seem too crude and to reduce the whisperings of the "Still Small Voice" to too precise a code for the Indian mind; but the claim itself is challenging and if true ought to bring a new power and direction to Christian living. And why should it not be true? The claim and the experience are nothing new in Christianity. The pages of the New Testament are full of the records of the promise and the fulfilment of the Spirit coming as an abiding Presence to guide and control the believer. Jesus promised to send the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth who would abide with His followers for ever and guide them into all truth. And we see that unfailing guidance at work in the lives of the Apostles, moving their hearts to make the right decisions, directing their choice in big undertakings, preventing them in their ways and sustaining them in their labours. The Church at large has lost sense of the Spirit's presence, the dynamic of His control and that is the main reason for her powerlessness and ineffectiveness in changing human lives. The Oxford Group Movement with its insistence on the spirit's guidance is a revival of this central element in the Christian religion and as such deserves well of all the Churches.

And their claim is borne out by their results. They are guided and empowered by the Spirit to change human lives. "Life-Changing"—that is the great mission of the Groups as it ought to be the supreme mission of every Christian. Like their Master they go after the lost to seek and to save them. Particularly do they specialise in the "down and outs," the interesting sinner, the merry undergraduate, who has no use for religion, the hard nuts of the Universities. And they have remarkable successes. Showing that Christ and His Gospel are still able to win souls, especially the young and the vigorous. True American that he is, F. B. has developed a detailed technique for it—the establishment of contact, the house party method, the principle of sharing, etc. But whatever be the methods adopted, the Church has to devote its attention primarily to this task of changing lives. Its ministers and workers must tackle the individual sinner, must go after the wandering and the lost, particularly the youth who are now so easily condemned and so lightly abandoned.

But I referred to a more significant thing than the Groups taking place in India today. I refer to Mahatma Gandhi's Satyagraha Movement. I have long felt that this is a truer and a more literal lifting up of the Cross than any other movement in the world today. Mahatma's claim to hear and obey the voice of God is a ringing challenge to Christians who claim to be the Spirit-guided people. Questioned by the whole world, doubted even by his intimate associates, he stood almost as one man against the world on the need and the justification of his great fast, taking his stand on his assurance of the Spirit's guidance. "My claim," he said: "to hear the voice of the God is no new claim.....I have been a willing slave to this most exacting Master for more than half a century. His voice has been increasingly audible as the years have rolled by. He has never forsaken me, even in my darkest hour. He has saved me often against myself and has left me not a vestige of independence. The greater the surrender to Him the greater has been my joy." The Christian can only meet this challenge by a greater confidence and a fuller obedience.

The Oxford Groups are changing individual lives. The Church has always attempted that and achieved successes in it. But my fear, at least what I have yet to see, is whether the change in individual lives goes far enough to change the World, to make these life-changers and their products men who turn the world upside down. Let me explain. I heard the Indian missionary say that an Oxford Group Team was received in audience and highly commended by Mr. Bennett, the Canadian Premier. But was their impact on Mr. Bennett powerful enough to change his economic and his foreign policy? I recall another interview when another representative of the British Crown was closeted for a few hours with a "half naked Fakir." And the result was an agreement which the joint-authors attributed to the application of the Sermon on the Mount. (I refer to the Gandhi-Irwin Pact). That is the sort of change that the Gospel of Christ ought to be working in the hearts of men and in the world at large. An Indian Christian in this hour of his nation's travail and his Lord's opportunity, would wistfully ask, "Will the Oxford Groups be powerful enough to change the heart of Sir Samuel Hoare to apply the principles of the Sermon on the Mount to the settlement of the Indian question?" That would be proof incontestable of the power of the Christ-Spirit to control the destinies of the World and it would go far, very far, in setting up God's Kingdom in this and every land.

"HINDU VIEW OF LIFE."

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

The Hindu solution of the problem of death is perhaps the most rational. If you gather together from among the Hindus, lettered and unlettered, 100 people at random—whatever may be the variety of faith of each within the fold—and ask them what is the highest that they would seek as their ultimate goal in life—the answer you will have from a large majority would be, a wish to get rid of 'Birth and Death.' None of them may be able to explain the psychology of the wish much less to make out its rationale. But collectively they have a feeling of certainty of its spiritual value. Right or wrong it may be set down as one of the wonders of the human thought that this idea permeates throughout our country from Cape Comorin to Himalayas irrespective of the region, caste, sect or language revealing an underlying unity of thought if not experience, which is the despair of the citizen of our day engaged in combating the communalism nearest to the Nation's surface skin.

Let us examine and find out what should have been at the back of the master mind which first conceived this superb idea. History reveals no other nation in the world than the Hindu having to its credit incessant research work in quest of abiding peace. It appears to have discovered by experiments steady and slow that what blurred the sight of peace, were the pairs of opposites which faced life at every term. Heat and cold, pleasure and pain, affluence and poverty, light and darkness, happiness and misery were all found one after another to be identical in kind with that of 'Birth and Death' as the climax—helps in disguise in the race towards the goal of peace. The solution was in the discovery that these pairs of opposites existed only in sense but not in fact. When the average Hindu was taught that he should discard both 'Birth and Death' it was meant that he should get rid of the sense thereof. It was in this way. Life may be compared to Time. Time is not determined by night or day in the same way that 'Birth and Death' do not determine life. It is this realisation that is called "Sankhya Yoga" or immortality, forming the discourse in chapter II of the Gita as the only panacea for all human ills. Is it a wonder then that death is meant to be no more than falling away of the body leaving the soul ever free?

THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION.* (By ALICE S. CHEYNEY.)

The International Labour Organisation was established in a time of crisis. But the crisis which brought it into being was political as well as economic, and the Organization was created with the double purpose of improving conditions of labour and laying foundations for peaceful relations between states. Its constitution was written into the peace treaty which closed the World War, and begins with the statement that permanent peace can be established "only if it is based on social justice." Its primary task is to promote world stabilisation by establishing economic security for the masses. While the terms of peace were still under discussion, representatives of organized labour from various industrial countries met in two international conferences and demanded sweeping economic reforms. These demands were not entirely new. But the circumstances under which they were presented made them potent reminders that discontent among the masses is a standing threat to internal and international peace. The imperial governments of Russia and Germany had just been overthrown and replaced by forms of government more responsive to the popular will; the example of those countries had fired the imagination of the discontented everywhere, and it seemed not impossible that war might be succeeded by a period of revolution. Efforts to establish "social justice" seem, therefore, incumbent on those who desired to assure a permanent peace. Such efforts, to be successful, had to be made on a world scale. Substantial improvements in conditions of employment are not easily achieved by one country at a time. Labour legislation, adopted country by country has faced the same type of opposition as that which must be overcome in securing labour legislation state by state in the United States. This opposition comes from individuals or groups who believe, rightly or wrongly, that legislation requiring improvement in the conditions of labour increases production costs and prevents the producers of the affected region from holding their own in competition with outsiders, forcing them out of business and creating unemployment for the workers it was intended to benefit. The preamble to the constitution of the International Labour Organization declares that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve conditions in their own countries." The Organization was primarily designed for dealing with that obstacle. Its structure is simple, consisting of an annual conference of representatives of its members, a board of directors known as the Governing Body, and a permanent office. The Conference adopts draft agreements formulating standards for employment conditions and such social policies as may affect the lives of either manual or brain workers. These agreements come into force between those member governments which voluntarily ratify them, and thereby undertake to enact and enforce legislation to secure observance of the specified standards. The Conference also adopts so-called "recommendations," giving collective approval to policies which it seems unnecessary or, for some reason, impracticable or undesirable to embody in a general agreement. While recommendations usually take the place of that type of resolution by which an organization records collective opinion, the Conference has, on occasion, expressed its views by means of resolutions. And it frequently makes use of resolutions to express the will of the Organization with respect to its own activities.

The ultimate source of authority within the Organization is the Conference—the one gathering in which all members are included in a representative capacity. The present membership numbers 58 out of 64 presumably eligible governments. To the Conference are submitted the annual report of the Director of the Office and a summary of the annual reports of member governments on enforcement of conventions. While the work of the Conference centres mainly around discussion of convention projects, it does not deal with these alone. The report of the Director of the Office usually raises questions of policy which are discussed by the delegates. Each member government is entitled to send to the International Labour Conference four delegates, of whom two are to be government delegates, and two “delegates representing respectively the employers and the workpeople of the country.” These last must be chosen by the governments “in an agreement with the industrial organizations, if such organizations exist, which are most representative of employers or workpeople as the case may be.” The Conference regularly meets in Geneva, usually late in May, and lasts for about three weeks. Most of its work is done by committees, on each of which the three types of delegates, are equally represented—the government, the employers and the workers’ delegates meeting as separate “groups” to elect representatives of the group for each committee. Every member is entitled to send with each of its delegates two “technical advisers” for each item on the agenda. These advisers may replace on committees the delegates they accompany. In the early days of the Organization, conventions were adopted after discussion at one annual session of the Conference. It was found, however, that sometimes a non-essential requirement of a convention blocked its ratification by governments which might have agreed to alternative provisions. After some experimentation, the Conference adopted in 1926 a “double discussion procedure” by which the subject of a proposed convention is discussed at two successive sessions of the Conference. In the year between the two sessions convention projects become the subject of study in member countries and of correspondence between them and the office, and may be marked on by committees of experts. There are always more subjects proposed for conventions than can possibly be considered by the Conference. After canvass by the Governing Body and preliminary study by the Office, those subjects are selected for Conference consideration which seem most important and on which general agreement appears most likely. After this preliminary work of selection few topics have been placed on the agenda which have not ultimately become the subjects of draft conventions.

It was early found desirable to adopt separate conventions to apply to industrial, commercial, agricultural and maritime workers—even when essentially similar provisions were contemplated for more than one type of employment, as in the case of the provision of workmen’s compensation for accident, regulation of working hours or restriction of child labour. The special conventions applying to commerce and agriculture have been adopted at regular conference sessions. The conditions of employment of seamen are, however, so unlike conditions and problems of land employment that ship owners and seamen have been of the opinion that general conference was scarcely competent to take decisions applying to them. Technical conferences may be called in connection with the regular annual Conference and various gatherings are convoked by the Organization which rank somewhere between committee meetings and conferences of members.

The Governing Body, which consists of thirty-six members, is made up of representatives of governments, employers and workers in the same proportion as the Conference. Eight of the twelve government seats are assigned to the governments of those eight countries which are held to be of chief industrial importance; all other seats are assigned, for three-year terms, by election of the groups in the Conference. The Governing Body meets regularly four times a year and in special sessions when occasion demands. While its headquarters, like those of the Conference, are in Geneva, it has in recent years made a point of holding some of its meetings in other places. It has various functions; it draws up the agenda for Conferences, allocates the budget and determines, in outline, the work to be done by the Office. It is responsible, among other things, for the creation of committees other than Conference committees and those functioning strictly within the office.

The development of a system of committees to deal with particular problems has perhaps done as much as anything else to extend and elaborate the services of the Organization. At the same time it has served to focus and sustain the interest of its members. Besides assigning to nine committees of its own membership the study of special problems with which the Organization is dealing or may deal, the Governing Body has set up nine “mixed” committees on which its members sit with specially appointed experts of various nationalities. The committees serve as surveyors of information and advice to the Governing Body and the Office, and as advance feelers for the Conference. Before a question is brought up for general discussion, they may work out some outline of adjustment or compromise acceptable to those who will have most influence on the final decision.

The International Labour Office is located at Geneva. The members of its staff constitute an international civil service; they are recruited as widely as possible from the countries belonging to the Organization and, at present, represent some 38 different nationalities. They are not responsible for official relations with their own countries, and are associated without respect to nationality in the various departments of the Office. The Office was originally expected to subserve the ends of the Conference without much other reason for existence; it has become an international research institution and publishing agency, and a repository and clearing house for information on a wide range of subjects. It regularly receives the official publications of various government departments of member and non-member countries and some 40,000 newspapers and periodicals, and has accumulated a library of books and pamphlets in addition to its files or periodical publications. It now publishes ten periodicals, and the results of its inquiries to date have been put out in a hundred studies and reports, in addition to reports prepared especially for use in connection with the work of the Conference. Besides thus disseminating information, the Office is called on each year to answer in the neighbourhood of a thousand inquiries from correspondents; it is in a position to supply data which could be collected nowhere else without extensive correspondence and resort to the services of many translators. To facilitate the circulation of information and keep the Office in touch with the interests of various parts of the world, seven branch offices are maintained; in Delhi, London, Nanking, Paris, Rome, Tokyo and Washington; in fifteen more localities there are individual official correspondents in the employ of the central office. A large proportion of all member governments have designated certain sections in their departments of labour, or individuals or committees, to correspond regularly with the International Labour office. Some of the committees comprise members of the several government departments dealing with matters of interest to the Labour Organisation—such departments, for example, as those of labour and agriculture and those dealing with the merchant marine.

VINODINI—MANUBHAI—SHARDA.

"This is my private and personal matter, and the public have no right to discuss it," said Miss Vinodini Nilkanth to a press representative in connection with various rumours now current regarding her recent marriage with Mr. Manubhai Lalbhai Parikh. "Our social life is so dull and drab," she added, "that public interest and curiosity are at once aroused when anything unusual or unconventional happens, like this marriage." Discussing some important questions arising from the marriage in an interview to "Nav Bharat," she said that she will retain her maiden name, and she was proud of that name. She did not believe that a woman should adopt the name of the man she loved most. She further revealed that the marriage was solemnized according to the Sikh custom and religion. For this she and her husband had adopted the Sikh religion and had worn "Kirpan" and other things according to the custom of the Sikhs. "For the purpose of the marriage why did you prefer the Sikh rites to the Hindu or Arya Samajist rites?" Replying to this question, she said that they had not thought about the matter at all. They had adopted the Sikh rites, because such a marriage could be performed by those rites. They had embraced the Sikh faith because it was necessary to do so before performing a marriage according to the rites of that religion. They were not attracted by any tenets or principles of the Sikh religion. "Before this," she added, "I did not even believe in the so-called Hindu religion of our present day society. I have never called myself a Hindu, and would not like to be described as such in view of the present state of the Hindu religion."

"I do believe he will return within a week as he has promised three days before going to Bombay again." Sharda Manubhai, wife of Mr. Parikh, stated her conviction in an interview to a press representative replying to various questions. She said: "I have to say nothing against my husband except Vinodini's statement which is quite untrue and false. We understood our responsibilities and duties fully well when our marriage ceremony was performed. It was not such a haphazard affair as stated in Gujarati—'Lakdemakda'—we were always happy and no dissatisfaction prevailed at any time in any matter till this day. Vinodini's lame defence is just like the attempt to add fuel to the fire of wounded hearts. Our life was as happy as anything. We have not known what quarrel was. His affection towards my father's family was extraordinary and we were always together whenever we went on tour, even at the last M. C. C. matches. It was certainly to my knowledge that Manubhai and Vinodini often used to go out together. But I had no objection to that because I knew they also studied together and were friends. I had no idea whatsoever that it was to result in this way. I had not known about his new marriage till he went to Bombay, as he had gone to a feast with our son and daughter the same noon. No sign of disaffection was witnessed till the night he left for Bombay saying that he would return within 10 or 12 days. Even three days before he again went to Bombay, I had a talk with him. I noticed him repenting and feeling that he had committed a mistake. He has promised to come again within a week and I do believe he will return."

Mr. Manubhai Parikh, the young man, who has figured prominently in this incident, supports

Vinodini. In an interview in Bombay he says: "I was not the least happy by my marriage with my first wife. I entertained a dislike to her from the very beginning. I was not consulted at the time of my marriage which took place when I was 18. I was not in a position to oppose it. Our betrothal took place when I was about 10 years old. Such a betrothal cannot be broken off under the orthodox social custom. At the time of the marriage I was not in a position to understand whether it was desirable or not. It was true that our domestic life was never marred by quarrels and squabbles, but that did not mean that our hearts were in accord. I came into contact with Vinodini about seven or eight years ago when we first met at College. For the last six years we were thinking of marriage, but I was very much puzzled by the thought of my first wife. It was this problem that we had been deliberating over all these six years. After my marriage with Sharda, I tried my best to create in my heart a feeling of love towards her. But I failed. I considered that it was a sin and immoral to keep up false appearances merely to please her, and that by doing so I was deceiving myself. It was thus that I came to a decision to marry Vinodini. I had often told Sharda about this contemplated marriage. But I did not inform anybody at the time of the marriage, lest it might create obstacles in my way. I have told my first wife that she is free to take the same liberty that I have taken. She can marry again, if she likes. Otherwise, I am prepared to make arrangements for her maintenance. I am prepared to keep my children with me, if Sharda allows it. Even otherwise, I will arrange for their education." Vinodini and Manubhai, who were staying at the "Sardar Griha" in Bombay, have left for a tour of India.

CONGRESS AND TEMPLE-ENTRY BILL.

Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar, during his brief visit to Madras, took the opportunity of meeting some of the members of the Local Bar on Saturday afternoon in the Bar Association premises and had a talk with the lawyers for nearly two hours. The question of Congressmen contesting elections to the Assembly was discussed when Mr. Rajagopalachariar is understood to have set forth clearly the main issue before the country in the forthcoming election to the Assembly as to whether the repressive policy adopted by Government towards the Congress was justified and approved of by the people. The results of the election would mean the defeat of either the Government or the Congress. The duty of the people was therefore clear. Some of the members present, representing the Sanatanist point of view, asked Mr. Achariar whether in view of the fact that the question of temple-entry by Harijans by means of legislation was another important issue before the country on which opinion was divided, and also having regard to the fact that a large section of Sanatanists who oppose the measure would really support the Congress in other matters, he could give an undertaking that the Congress candidates in the Assembly would not pass the Bill on Temple-Entry, having been returned on the issue of Government's policy towards the Congress. Mr. Achariar is understood to have replied that even if he gave such an undertaking, it would be useless since it could not bind the Congress, but that he could tell them that they might rely upon the political honesty of the Congress that it would not attempt to carry out anything which had not been made the primary issue.

Letter to Mr. S. Satyamurthy asks him to give an undertaking on behalf of the Congress that the Congress would not support any interference in matters religious by legislation and that it would confine its activities to its proper sphere of politics without assuming to itself the role of religious dictatorship. He adds: "Unless such an unambiguous and categorical guarantee comes forth from the proper quarter Mr. Satyamurthy cannot expect the Sanatanists to support the Congress candidates."

INDIAN GIRL GUIDES IN AFRICA.

The girls of the Baroda Kanya Mahavidyalaya who were touring the territories of East Africa have now completed it and have gone to South Africa to carry the torch of India's progress in that country where the prejudice against Indians is the strongest.

On his way to South Africa per s.s. "Kenya" from Dares-Salaam, Pandit Anand Priyaji writes the following letter to Kenya Daily Mail recording his appreciation of the warmth of feelings and regard which the population of East Africa showed for the girls during their tour. Says the Panditji:—

Before sailing for South I take the opportunity of expressing our heartfelt gratitude to the Indian Community in particular of Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, and Zanzibar.

Rajratna Seth Nanjibhai M. B. E., deserves our special thanks for it was on his invitation that we undertook this hazardous tour to the land which was quite unknown to us. He has been a guiding star in our travels and he left no stone unturned to make us comfortable every where. At a great sacrifice of time, energy and money he steered our ship very ably and successfully. If our mission has succeeded wonderfully in its dual function of propagating the ancient ideal of female education and collection of funds to advance that education, great credit is due to him. He and his brother Sheth Mathuradasji have made their names immortal by helping one of the most noble causes on which depend the future progress of Mother India. All honour to these noble souls for all they have done.

I shall be failing in my duty if I do not express my gratitude to the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, Nairobi for extending to us a warm welcome and making arrangements for us in various ways. Their co-operation proved to be of immense value. We are proud of their true Aryan Spirit. Besides the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, the Arya Samaj branches in the countries we travelled did everything they could for us for which also we are grateful. We are also very grateful to many other organisations and individuals who have made our stay pleasant and comfortable in their respective places. They are many and I thank them all collectively and individually.

Wherever we have gone we received a right royal welcome and we have no words to thank the public for their kindness and hospitality. We have been able to collect for our institution Shs. 188,000 from East Africa. This contribution is certainly very creditable.

We have the satisfaction that by our tour we have been able to create a very good propaganda for the cause of the female education. We have given a death blow to the nefarious propaganda of Miss Mayo's "Mother India."

Everywhere the European Community unreservedly appreciated our tour and told us quite frankly that they had no idea that Indian girls could reach so high a level of culture, discipline and esprit de corps.

All classes have liberally supported our cause and in some cases the donors have really made a great sacrifice. We appreciate their kindness and we assure them that we shall leave no stone unturned to spend every pie to their entire satisfaction.

NOTES

This Freedom:—On August 1st the centenary of the abolition of slavery in the British Empire, the Times (London) wrote an eloquent leading article with the heading 'This Freedom.' The Times recalled that no ancient philosopher of greater repute than Dio Chrysostom condemned the principle of slavery and that the first corporate protest against it in England was made by the Society of Friends. It claimed however that the strongest impulse in favour of abolition, came from within the Church of England, from the little group of evangelists, nicknamed the Clapham sect. The accession of Wilberforce to the cause of emancipation was the next decisive factor in leading it to success. Wilberforce took it from the arena of religious fervour to the realm of practical politics. He laboured for it with single-minded devotion which sought no reward or recognition. When he applied for the Chiltern Hundreds—the formality observed in retiring from the House of Commons—he wrote to the Prime Minister that 'it is the first place that I ever asked for myself.' He was subjected to much ridicule and obloquy by powerful vested interests behind the Slave Trade, but he never wavered; and the Times rightly observes that in international esteem he was more famous than Pitt or Wellington, 'for so in the end the world honours its saints.' The capacity to render such honour, it finely adds, is the evidence that man is nobly born and worthy to be free. The Times goes on to refer to the schools of thought that would throw down the ideal of liberty itself in the higher forms that have been developed in its European home. It concludes: "A nation that ceases to regard liberty as an absolute good, to be pursued for its own sake, is moving back towards the brutality, the misery, the degradation of human nature that belonged to the Slave Trade. Where liberty ceases to be prized, the spirit of the slave driver revives and works the old abominations." The Times links up the movement for the emancipation of Negro slavery with the ideals of liberty in its higher forms in Europe as if they were parts of a connected movement. This was not the case. While the impulse for the abolition of Negro slavery came from religion, that for political liberty came from the French Revolution which was a revolt against religion as much as against despotism. In Great Britain itself the wider implications of Negro emancipation were scarcely understood. The attack on the gross abuses of factory labour scarcely less appalling than the abuses of Negro Slavery, came from a different source and Lord Shaftesbury's movement had to encounter the opposition not only of factory owners but of some of the Negro emancipators as well. Then, looking outside Europe, the high principles of Freedom were most often contemptuously ignored. The indentured system of labour which was five years' slavery was invented to take the place of the emancipated slaves. The doctrine of liberty as an absolute good, had no validity East of Suez. To our mind the reactions against Freedom in Europe are the outcome of two causes. The first is that European freedom has become restricted to the freedom of rich men to exploit the poor. The second cause is that Europe in its dealings with Asia and America had absolutely no regard for the teachings of its own sages and statesmen. On that account, it would be wrong to under-estimate the services of Europe. But the world can no longer leave the task of carrying the gospel of freedom in its full implications to the unaided efforts of European reformers. The brown and the black men must relieve Europe of having to shoulder their burdens. That is the lesson of the centenary of slave emancipation to non-Europeans.

Legislation and Social Reform:—While we welcome the quickening of the social conscience as evidenced by the number of measures introduced in the several legislative councils on social questions, we deprecate the tendency to regard legislation as a short cut to social reform. The Bill was introduced by Rao Bahadur Kunwar Raghur Singh of Agra to prevent the sale of minor girls to old men in marriage. When the Bill was first discussed in February there was general appreciation of the principle of the Bill, but doubts were expressed by all the speakers who took part in the debate, first, as to the extent of the prevalence of the evil, and, secondly, as to the necessity of fresh legislation to prevent it. The Sarda Act penalised the marriage of girls below 14 and the Penal Code dealt with sale of women for improper purposes. Then, again, it was difficult to specify what would be "sale" in marriage. Mr. B. V. Jadhav referred to the Mekar settled upon girls at the time of marriage among Muslims but Sir Mohamed Yakub corrected him and said it was not bride price, it was consideration for the contract of marriage. The Home Member of the Government of India suggested that a similar explanation might be set up in the case of Hindu marriages also, if the Bill was passed. There were also serious defects in drafting and the text of the Bill did not correspond to the statement of objects and reasons attached to it. For these reasons, the Bill was circulated for opinion and it came up for consideration again last week. The Law Member pointed out that it would be difficult to define the word "sale" and quoted Hindu scriptures to show that marriage for which a consideration was paid for the bride was held valid. The Hindu Shastras laid down that the most meritorious form of marriage was Kanyadan, the free gift of a girl to a worthy person. But the recognised other forms of marriages which fell short of this ideal, their main preoccupation being to protect progeny from the taint of illegitimacy. The practice of the sale of girls in marriage prevailed only in certain areas. In other parts of the country, it was bridegrooms and not brides that had to be paid for. Sir Henry Craik, the new Home Member, thought that such considerations as jewellery or cash were a very useful form of insurance particularly in the case of widowhood and that it was difficult to define "sale" so as to exclude such considerations. The motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was thrown out. The Times of India's comment on the Bill is interesting: "It may shock the civilized social conscience to reduce marriage to a question of rupees, annas and pies. But, as a matter of fact, the financial aspect is seldom overlooked in any well-considered matrimonial transaction even in the most advanced societies. Only callow and inexperienced youth in the first flush of romantic sentiment ignores this side of the question." As pointed above the Hindu Shastras do not take this view. They regard the marriage sacrament as being defiled by being entered into as a commercial transaction. The Hindu view of love in marriage was well expressed by one of the wisest and most thoughtful men among educated Hindus. "Europeans," he said, "marry those whom they love, we love those whom we marry." This is not quite correct, as many Europeans also love those whom they marry, though, according to the Times, they might not have married those whom they loved.

The Bombay Devadasis Act :—Forty years ago the Indian Social Reformer voiced its protest against the institution of devadasis. These women were originally dedicated to the service of the Deity as their name shows. They were supposed to be married to the Deity and were not allowed to enter into marriage relations with any human spouse. They were carefully trained in dancing and music according to the ancient indigenous systems, and were required to display their art before the shrines to which they were attached at the prescribed hours of worship. For their maintenance they were assigned some land which formed part of the endowment of the temple. In course of time these servants of the Gods, fell from their high ideal of purity. In addition to music and dancing, sometimes in lieu of them, they practised the art of courtesans with a strict etiquette of their own. With the advent of commercialized vice of the Western type, this old system has lost much of its artistic importance. The Reformer's protest was against the engagement of devadasis at social entertainments, mainly on the ground that so long as singing and dancing was the special function of devadasis, girls and women of family cannot be persuaded to acquire and display these accomplishments. The protest was at first ridiculed, but had its effect, and as we expected, with the elimination of the nautch-girl, music and dancing become popular features of girls' education. The religious applications of the devadasi system were not easily dislodged. But dislodged they were, and the credit of initiating the reform belongs to the late Maharani of Mysore who during her regency abolished the vice of devadasis in temples, but allowed them to retain their lands. The next move came from Madras, where Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi signalled her career as the first woman member of the Legislative Council by introducing and getting a Bill passed much on the lines of the Mysore reform. The passing by the Bombay Legislative Council of a Bill protesting against the dedication of devadasis last week, carries this great reform a step forward towards total extinction. Our congratulations to Rao Bahadur Bole and the Bombay Council.

The Sarda Marriage Act :—While some conservative members of the Indian Legislature have introduced Bills to repeal the Sarda Act fixing an age limit for marriages, others are anxious to stiffen it as they feel that it has not put an end to child marriages in the country. Women's Societies generally have strongly urged the latter view. Women are keenly alive to the hardships of girl wives and are naturally desirous of ending them at once. The Hon. Rai Bahadur Lala Jagadish Prasad moved in the Council of State on Thursday that steps be taken, including if necessary a revision of the law, to enforce more rigidly the provisions of the Sarda Act so as to increase the chances of offenders being brought to book and minimise the chances of evasion of the law. The Home Secretary, Mr. Hallett, speaking for Government explained that the position of Government was that in such matters slow advance was sure advance. He said that what was needed was education of public opinion by social reformers and particularly by educated women and their organisations, to the evil of child marriages. The Government view is the right view. Mere education of public opinion, however, is not enough. Public opinion is sufficiently educated on this reform on which two generations of reformers have been engaged. Mrs. P. K. Ray who presided over one of the Women's Conferences, pointed out that raising the age of marriage of girls has created new problems which should be taken on hand in order to facilitate the adoption of adult marriages by the community, especially the poorer classes of it. We want more girls' schools and hostels. The demand for girls' education has outstripped the provision made to meet it by Government and private agencies. Adequate educational facilities will be the best propaganda against child marriages. In their absence, rigid enforcement of the Penal clauses will not rally public support to social legislation more than at present. There is, however, one point in regard to which there seems to be a lack of uniformity in the administration of the Act. While in Bombay, Courts have acted on the view that, as child marriage is an offence under the Act, attempts to bring them about are attempts to commit an offence and should be prevented by an order of the Court, in Madras the view has prevailed that, though the Act makes child marriages punishable, it gives no power to Courts to prevent their performance. This is not common sense and, if an authoritative ruling cannot be obtained, a slight amendment will have to be made in the Act. Surely, prevention is better than punishment.

A Japanese Seismologist on the Earthquake:— Mr. S. Nasu of the Seismological Institute of the Imperial University at Tokyo, contributes an article to The Japanese Trade Bulletin on the recent earthquake in Bihar which gives us valuable information of how Japan provides against the dangers of earthquakes to her buildings. He writes: "When we construct buildings in our country, the first point is whether they are quake-proof or not, but here in India the first consideration is how the buildings fare against heat; the question of quake-proof is not considered seriously. In other words, houses in Japan equip themselves against earthquakes, while houses in this country do not. Generally speaking, buildings in India are very poor; brick itself is not only of bad quality, but mortar used between bricks is in many cases common earth. Therefore these buildings are easily liable to be disjointed at the time of earthquake. Though the same thing can be said with the houses made of earth, they however can stand better against earthquake." Mr. Nasu refers to the Building Law of Japan which assumes the power of horizontal vibration of an earthquake to be one-tenth of gravity and this, he says, is the maximum power of a great earthquake. The main building of the Seismological Institute of the Tokyo Imperial University which is the best quake-proof, can withstand the power of a vibration which is two-tenths of gravity. But all buildings in Japan have to satisfy the less requirements of the Building Law. Mr. Nasu discusses at length the cause of the last earthquake. He differs from seismologists in India. They regard "the Himalayan Range ceaselessly pushed by the Continent of Asia towards the interior of the Indian Peninsula resulting in an arc-shape," as the sole cause of the earthquake, a theory which, he remarks, is not generally accepted by Japanese experts. He himself has not been able to investigate this aspect but he condemns it as an obsolete theory. He concludes with an appeal to Japan to give the benefit of her experience to India.

What is Religion? :—Dr. Homer H. Dubs contributes an interesting article in Open Court for July on "Types of Religion" in which he gives us the following definition of religion: "As a definition of religion we suggest the following: Religion is the attitude that man takes to what he considers to be most important in the universe. In this definition, the term, "attitude" is used with the meaning given it in psychology, to include (1) tendencies to action, (2) their causative factors, such as beliefs, desires, interests, attention, etc., and (3) their consequences, such as actions, emotions, feelings, perceptions. In accordance with this definition of religion, we must include as religions, not only the so-called 'positive' religions, but also many of the philosophies, such as Stoicism, Epicureanism, Cynicism, Vedanta, Yoga, etc., whenever the fundamental feature of that philosophy is a certain way of living or a certain tendency to action, rather than merely a certain intellectual belief. Careful students have recognized the religious nature of these philosophies. Lucretius himself calls Epicurus a "savior." Bolshevism, which is being recognized today as possessing the trappings of a religion, is also included by our definition as a religion, inasmuch as it makes the bringing about of the Bolshevistic society the most important thing in the universe. Our definition also accepts the popular view that, to some people, the gathering of wealth is a religion."

The Christian Message:—We commented last week on the Rev. Paul Gibson's sermon at Cambridge. We print this week a short extract on what Mr. Gibson conceives to be the message of his faith. In a brief paragraph Mr. Gibson descends from his pulpit and appears as a student of comparative religion and asserts that the message is a unique one but his conclusions are not convincing.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, AUGUST 25, 1934.

BOMBAY UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION ADDRESS.

The appointment of Mr. Vithal Chandavarkar to the Vice-Chancellorship of Bombay University was a departure from the practice of filling the post with High Court judges diversified occasionally by a distinguished educationist. He had won a great reputation as President of the Municipal Corporation but he had not even been a Fellow of the University and was not familiar with its affairs. The reforms introduced in the constitution and functions of the University were still giving rise to frequent disputes regarding especially the proper spheres of the Syndicate, the Academic Council and the Senate. The new Vice-Chancellor thus started with several handicaps. He has overcome most of them, and has come to be recognized by all parties in the University—unfortunately, there are parties in it—as a capable and conscientious administrator of its affairs and a faithful champion of its interests. His address at the annual convocation which was held on Tuesday, was a quiet, business-like presentation of the problems immediately confronting Bombay University. Only at the end, was there a hint of his philosophy of life—for he has a philosophy—which Mr. Chandavarkar kept out of the main body of his address. "There is at present," he said, "a general tendency, whether in private or in public life, to attach greater importance to the assertion of one's rights than to the performance of one's duties..... You should always remember that if you take care of your duties, the rights will take care of themselves." There is much truth in the first statement but history, alas, does not confirm the second that doing one's duty automatically ensures the recognition of one's rights. Rather does it uphold the poet's opinion that they have rights who dare maintain them. In the ideal state, what Mr. Chandavarkar says should be the case. Rights must be strictly co-ordinated to duties, but this ideal State exists nowhere, least of all in India at the present day. Much also depends on how one understands the word "duty." The indiscipline which the Vice-Chancellor lamented and which certainly exists, is due to the difference of emphasis in interpreting "duty." This is evident from the fact that, while on the one hand we see gross indiscipline, on the other we also see abject submission to the dictates of party leaders. The central purpose of a University is to help society to correlate rights and duties—to assert the right to perform duties, and the duty to vindicate rights essential to the wellbeing of society.

The principal preoccupations of Bombay University at present are post-graduate courses, the matriculation examination and finance. The first two also ultimately reduce themselves to the financial problem. The Vice-Chancellor said that the Matriculation examination is acting as a strangle-hold both on university and secondary education. It is also unfortunately the examination which brings most money to the University's exchequer. Attempts have been made—and very strenuous attempts—from time to time to have a school-leaving examination to divert the main stream of candidates from the Matriculation. But they have always failed. If they had succeeded, the University would have found itself bankrupt. The explanation is that very few Indian students or their parents or teachers, for that matter, are in a position to determine their course in future life. Many Indians were intended for occupations different from those which they are following. The present writer is one of them. The Vice-Chancellor himself is another. It is too early to say anything about the Chancellor but some of his predecessors certainly were in the same category. An eminent English journalist confided to this writer that the profession he would have chosen was that of an engineer. If this is the case even with Englishmen who have a variety of occupations to choose from—army, navy, church, diplomacy, the Civil Service, Parliament, commerce and Christian Missions—how can the Indian, who has few openings outside the subordinate Government service and law in his own country, and is debarred from seeking his fortune in most other countries, be expected to make choice beforehand of the career best suited to his talents?

As for post-graduate studies, Bombay University, notwithstanding its stronger financial position, has lagged far behind Calcutta University with its chronic deficits. Asutosh Mukherji was constantly attacked for his lavish use of Calcutta University's resources in post-graduate departments. He even came into personal conflict with the Governor of the Province. But his policy has been amply justified by its results. If Bombay University piles up reserves in fear of future bad times, it lacks faith in itself. It is the policy favoured in Indian States. This has always struck us as one of the weak points of Bombay University administration. Finance plays in its affairs a part which is much in excess of what is legitimate in an academic body. The Vice-Chancellor complained of the smallness—ridiculous smallness—of the grant made by the Bombay Government to the University as compared with those made to other Universities by their respective Provincial Governments, and suggested that if Bombay's finances cannot afford a larger one, the Government of India should be requested to give grants to it as to Calcutta, Benares Hindu and Aligarh Muslim Universities. The chief reason why Bombay has been treated so shabbily by the Provincial Government is, that the Vice-Chancellor who is the administrative head of the University, was for a long time practically an officer of Government who thought more of the difficulties of Government than of the needs of the University. Even Mr. Chandavarkar has not escaped this bias. Not once or twice proposals for University development were stifled by vice-chancellors on the ground that it was useless to approach Government for help. The fact is that the University itself has not realised that it is one of the security services of the State as much as the Police or the Judiciary. It has, therefore, taken always an apologetic attitude and even sometimes conceived itself as subservient to the industrial interests of the Presidency. Not until it drops this inferiority complex will it secure adequate support from the Government and the public.

THE WOMEN'S MOVEMENT.*

The outstanding movement of the last 15 years in India is the Women's Movement. The All-India Women's Conference is the most important organisation of that movement. It is a registered society having for its objects (1) to promote in India the education of both sexes at all stages and (2) to deal with all questions affecting the welfare of women and children. It is also laid down that it shall not engage in any party politics, but unite on such points as affect women and children. The signatories to the memorandum of association included Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mrs. Margaret E. Cousins and Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya. The objects of the Conference including as they do the education of both sexes, mark it off from feminist movements of other countries. The other distinctive feature of this body is that, unlike men's organizations in this country, it knows no difference of race, creed or political opinions. A third feature of the Conference worth noting now-a-days is its motto from the Bhagavat Gita meaning that 'one comes to know me by devotion.' The last session was at Calcutta under the Presidentship of Lady Abdul Qadir. The welcome address was delivered by the Maharani of Mayurbhanj who was the Chairwoman of the Reception Committee. The Maharani is the daughter of Keshub Chander Sen, the wellknown leader of the Brahmo Samaj. In her address she emphasised the importance of Religion for the success of their movement. Rani Laxmibai Rajwade then read her report on the work of the Conference during the year. The report dwelt largely on the subject of women's representation in the White Paper Constitution. The following passage from the representation submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee may be quoted here: "We have repeatedly urged that we do not desire the communal virus to enter into our united ranks. We, therefore, disapprove entirely and shall continue to resist to the uttermost the White Paper proposals (para 4, page 75, Appendix II) by which women will be elected to the Federal Assembly by an indirect system. We totally refuse to be made party pawns for the purpose of weightage for the convenience of any community—a state of affairs which will surely follow if this proposal is accepted. On the contrary, we desire direct election on an entirely non-communal basis. By merit and merit alone do we wish to find—and we are confident we shall find—our rightful place in the Councils and Federal Legislatures of our country. It naturally follows that we are opposed to reservation of seats for ourselves and are wholeheartedly in favour of joint electorates by which means alone, we are convinced, can India rise to her full stature." The Report of the Eighth session of the Conference now before us is a handsomely printed and bulky record covering 272 pages of the good work of the Conference.

Referring to the Lady Irwin College opened in November 1932 Rani Rajwade applied for funds for endowing scholarships to enable poor and deserving candidates to be sent for training to the Institution. The report also referred to the great awakening in the matter of Hindu women's legal disability, especially the question of their rights of inheritance and the initiative taken by Baroda and Mysore in Social Legislation. Lady Abdul Qadir's Presidential address was a wise and weighty pronouncement on the principal questions affecting the position of women and the need for educating public opinion. Before proceeding to business, the Conference was addressed by Sir Hassan Suhrawardy, Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, who referring to the Women's Movement said that "here the aspirations of all communities are one; here the claims of climate, religion and social authority are annihilated in the unity of an undivided aim." Another distinguished speaker was Mr. Santosh Kumar Basu, Mayor of Calcutta. The Vice-Chancellor of the Andhra University, Sir S. Radhakrishnan, in a thoughtful speech emphasised the women's task of contributing to the national culture. Liberty from external restrictions, he said, is not enough, but equally necessary and urgent was liberty from the servitude which is infinitely more perilous and degrading, the servitude to one's own passions and desires.

The Conference has several sections—for educational and social subjects, for preparing text-books, for dealing with labour questions and indigenous industries, and for education fund. Several resolutions were moved from the Chair at the outset, one of which requested the Allahabad and Benares Hindu Universities to remove the bar against co-education and urging schools and Universities, where co-education does not exist, to introduce and encourage it. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur of Kapurthala moved a resolution condemning war as a crime against humanity. This resolution was supported by several speakers and was carried with enthusiasm. Other resolutions passed at the Conference related to mass education, regulations of cinemas and posters. Mrs. Cousins moved a resolution advocating the introduction of vocational training in schools and colleges. There were numerous speeches on this subject, which was unanimously adopted. Other resolutions recommended the establishment of women's Hostels, the Indian women's University and Labour Legislation. The Conference passed a resolution condemning all attempts to repeal the Sarda Act. The resolution on women's right of inheritance was passed. Some of the speakers referred to the position of married woman who are absolutely helpless if they are discarded by their husbands. The report prints as an appendix, a memorandum consisting of all the principal resolutions passed at the Conference during this as well as previous sessions. In view of the discussion on the recent marriage in Ahmedabad, the following resolution of the Conference may be noted:—"This Conference strongly condemns polygamy and urges parents not to give their daughters in marriage to men who already have wives. It is also of opinion that girls of mature age and judgment who marry men with wives, should be boycotted."

We recommend the report to all friends in India and abroad who wish to get a comprehensive idea of the aims, objects and methods of work of the Women's Movement in India.

THE REMARRIAGE OF HINDU WOMEN.
(BY R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.)

3. THE SRUTIS.

Next we come to certain Srutis that say "Just as two cords are tied round a single sacrificial post, so also two wives can marry the same man; and just as a single cord is not tied round two posts together, so too a single woman cannot marry two husbands," and "A man may have many wives, but there may not be many simultaneous husbands for a single woman." The orthodox interpretation of these two passages in the Vedas, however original and learned, may not be happy or acceptable to others but the meaning is patent, viz., that a man may have more than one wife at a time—though this may be by way of an indulgence in special cases of barrenness, or other causes of supersession of the first wife: (Manu 9-80-84), when both the wives may live together. But the reverse proposition is what is prohibited. It does not in the least, in so many words, say that a woman shall not marry a second time at all, but only says she shall not have plurality of husbands at the same time. In the simile it is not clear that a particular cord shall not be tied round another post afterwards. In the case of posts there may not be a sacrificial necessity for a second use of the same cord. But the analogy cannot be pressed too far lest it should cut our own throats unawares. Even the Pandavas enjoyed the person of the common wife Draupadi in periodical rotation, not simultaneously under pain of a penalty for adultery. Even in later times a widow was strictly and punctiliously enjoined to observe a whole year's or at least half-year's disciplinary course of systematic physical (medical?) treatment and thorough rest under strict diet free from flesh, drink, honey, sugar or ghee, and salt and coupled with imperative sleep on the ground at the time; (Baud. 2-2-66-67) before she could embrace her brother-in-law in Niyoga for obtaining a son to her deceased husband, a healthy, hygienic condition that we find generally imposed on all women even in their monthly periods (Vasishtha, 5-7. Vyasa, 2-39; Parasara, 7-17-20; Apastamba, 7-1-4; Angiras, 44). It is a means to destroy disease-germs in the system. Next the Sruti says "Get up, O, woman, who lie down beside the man whose life has fled away, and make up your mind to marry the man who raises you by the hand and desires to wed you," (a mantra in Pitrimedha—prasma, first anuvaka). Sri Krishna Tatacharya would interpret it to mean "Get up, that is all the wife-hood given to you here, but by your self-sacrificing devotion to your husband's memory and steadfast celibacy hereafter until your death you can go to his place in heaven as per Manu, 5-160—Parasara, 4-31," and would differ as poles from the former interpretation of Vidyaranya set out first. Both may be right or both may be wrong. But does it conclude the question? Vidyaranya's may be grammatically correct though it may not be probable to expect the next possible husband on the spot at the time, and he may not make overtures at that inopportune or impossible time. The late Sri Krishna's may have the advantage of steering clear of all that absurdity, and may be a very natural appeal to the woman to remember that the whole mankind does suffer like this and to console herself and look after her duties to the surviving children; and so may seek to establish the aspect of her life-long widowhood thereafter without a thought of re-marriage. Nothing turns on this after all, as both customs have been found to have flourished long.

Next the Sruti, of which Manu, 5-151 is an echo with just an unwarranted addition, says "To whomsoever my father gives me in marriage, I shall not desert him while alive," while the Sloka 151 adds "She shall not transgress him (be false to his bed) even after his death." This, coupled with the 160th Sloka to the effect that a widow by sheer celibacy ascends heaven, raises the interesting question whether she can embark on sannyasa-like Brahmacharya even during the life-time of her husband. But Slokas 154 & 155 coupled with 148 & 149 would stand in the way of her resolution, and remind her that after all she has no independence and cannot leave her father before marriage, her husband after it, and her son, if any, in her old age. There were only three stages in a Hindu woman's life originally contemplated, as in the case of a Dwija; but when a fourth was added, it was thought that in necessary cases a woman ought to be given a fourth stage also of celibacy, as of a Yati. But of what use is this Brahmacharya, when the Sruti said that she could get no benefit of mantras. The Vaishnavite doctrines might come to her rescue and, though in a feeble way, restore her lost right to Vedic mantras, as also that of Sudras who were in the same predicament. But one may ask, what is this without due upanayana before hand? The impetuous or impatient answer is "Silence! these don't require it," and the result is that Vaishnavism could not restore the old state of things but showed the way to put up with the galling life-long widowhood in all hope of heaven. But still the questioner asks: "When life-long Brahmacharya of a Naishthika is interdicted in Kali, how can a young blooming lady in her teens or prime of youth and vigour alone be expected to step into his shoes? And can she act the part of a sannyasin who should according to Sastras enter the fourth order only after grey hairs and wrinkles appear and after he sees and fondles the son's son? And why should she observe such a life-long celibacy which is merely a condition precedent to the means of steady and persistent Yogic meditation for realisation of God in silent seclusion? No such means is offered and being a woman and a tender woman to boot, how is she to live away from company which in turn has got its contagious consequences?" The result is that such widows are a source of danger to the society in respect of its morals, health and what not. How to turn them to the best account of themselves and advantage to the population has been the chief concern of all good social reformers. The present writer can cite an instance where a high-class girl of 14 married a recent widower with two children and became a childless widow herself in less than a couple of months after the marriage, and did not know what to do with herself and her blooming exuberance of health and beauty; and the talk goes she has disappeared for good; heaven knows where or with whom; or is it there wherefrom nobody returns? What has become of the spirit of traditional Vaishnavism running for generations in her veins? Why should she not aspire to her lord's heaven by celibate recollection of her husband's face so familiar to her during her five days' marriage? A whisper in the air seems to reply "Damn your ideal heaven hereafter when I cannot have a less perfect joy below with a life-long companion which my sex craves for." That is the secret of the failure of philosophy that may, no doubt surely and more successfully, appeal to a long-satisfied mind. And that is the thing for which came the original rule of dependence on husband between minority and old age, and the subsequent Sastras elaborately provided for, but not most effectively no doubt, because of innumerable forces at work in Society.

4. THE SMRITIS.

Later (minor) Smriti-kartas like Kratu and Devala, and Puranas like the Aditya, have ruled that five things, among others, are prohibited in Kali; vis, Niyoga, re-gift of a girl in the marriage, animal-sacrifice, preferential share on partition for the eldest son or brother and "Kamandalu" or gourd-shell, carried by every Brahmachari or Yati or a Brahmana in general. 'Kamandalu' has been held to mean and apply to the last two classes or, the last only. The expression is so vague that it is a bone of contention in respect of Sannyasa in Kali age. Similarly 're-gift of girls' gave rise to various interpretations and finally was held to comprise all of them at once. The question was should it prohibit (1) remarriage after oral gift, or Vag-dana (2) that after Saptapadi but before actual consummation or nuptials, or lastly (3) that after all the three ceremonies are over, but no issue is born. It seems to have been implicitly admitted that after issue is born and whether that issue be alive or dead (Atri, 53-54; Manu, 9:106-110; Vasishtha, 17:1), the purpose of marriage is over as discharging the debt to ancestors as though the continuation or perpetuation of the line was not of the essence of the thing. It is sad to note that, when a doubt arose as to which of the three interpretations of "re-gift of girls" was meant, it was not attempted to decide the point by any reasonable discussion and preference of one over the rest; but, to say, as it was said, that it included all of them at once is nothing short of the judge wantonly holding that no party was entitled to the thing in dispute but it belonged to the Court or judge. That shows either of two things; either a sad fate was overtaking the country, or the only leading authority in the land shirked the responsibility of a decisive judgment, or feared to tread the province of the same. It is not at all creditable to the petty people who tried to pose as definite and reliable authority. It reflects a very poor opinion of them, and they all failed in courage and in duty by the country. If their decision was one-sided or even wrong there would still have been a safety-valve and the widow-problem would not have been so great a menace as now. But that was not to be. The poor woman was first reduced to the position of a chattel without the least independence of movement or action; and then, without a thought of the past, the later law-givers (such as Yama 22-25, Parasara, 7:7-7:9) compelled the father to dispose of her in marriage at a much earlier age than before, that is before puberty, nay even at sight or even earlier (Manu, 9:88) if a splendid boy be available; and lastly closed all outlets once open to her in the event of her proposed or betrothed or wedded husband's death, etc., and made her lot altogether unbearable and simply atrocious. She suffers in direct and immediate consequence and through her the family society as a whole, in the unforgettable words of Manu, 8:56-58. The curse of innumerable millions of helpless young female lives is still hovering over the once-holy Bharat Varsha and holding the land in a death-struggle grip of foreign domination that would, if we have eyes to see and ears to hear the haunting shades above, remind us of our callous indifference to their avoidable lot that smothered their bright career in one prolonged and unrelieved agony. The earlier Smriti-writers are not responsible for this as Vasishtha said that girls might be remarried notwithstanding Vag-dana or even Saptapadi provided they were still carnally unknown by the husband: (17:64-66.) And Baudhayana repeats the same and adds a second marital rite in some cases: (4.1.16-18.) So also Narada (15.43-53) allows a second Samskara in several instances. Are these three eminent authorities any wise inferior to Kratu, Devala and others of later times, and are the Puranas anywise superior in authority to Smritis themselves? Why then this topsy-turvy regard for the authorities? No, it is rather a blind following of the weedy growth of Custom. There has been none to come forward to weed it out and save the girls. And eminent scholars like the late Mahamahopadhyaya Sri Krishna were simply carried away by the current authority of custom when they could have saved the country and spared the unceasing tears of so many precious souls of their own generation. Just as a notion of false prestige blinds the eye to a true solution of things, so too a false idea of 'Brahman' or God killed the free play of Nature and Nature's Law. They forgot that both God and Nature overlapped each other, nay were so inextricably intermixed that an offence against the one was equally an offence against the other. Having had full notice of Nature in womankind in the eloquent words of Manu (9:12-13 and 2:213-215) and of the fact that women stand in need of constant direction and complete protection in their own as well as in other interests, the latter-day puritan visionaries set up an unwanted, unwarranted, and impossible standard for young widows; they unwittingly, in their eager search after purity, lost sight of the path towards moral improvement and numerical strength, not to say the physical build and stamina of the entire nation. They violated ever so many injunctions laid down for their guidance, and explained away their guilt by appeal to the universally-enveloping Divine Maya that carried us all in one swoop of fate, try and do how we will.

The late Srikrishna Tatacharya in his "Dharma-Nirnaya, or Widow-marriage Condemned," gets over Parasara's rule permitting re-marriage for women in five contingencies by calling in aid Vyakarana or grammatical explanation of the deliberate use of the word पति instead of पत्यौ—two variable forms of the locative case of the word पति. He holds that the former form denotes a rather vague or vulgar or "gauna" use indicating a wide popular meaning while the latter form signifies a precise and technically accurate sense. In other words he says that re-marriage is permitted for a girl at any time before she can really and in law call the bridegroom her husband, that is, before the Saptapadi is complete but not later. He says that even before the event he is no doubt in joke or pardonable mistake called a husband; but that does not give him the right or duty of a husband. But the question is whether such forms are invariably used by all the Smritis in the same connotation and denotation. An earnest and fairly thorough search among the Smritis will show that this position is clearly untenable. One need only look up the following citations and be firmly convinced on the point. (Parasara, 4:17, 23, & 30; 10:31; Narada, 15:49, 97; 16:12; Vyasa 2:31, & 25; Vishnu, 17:22 & 25:16; Yagnyavalkya, 1:75; Manu, 3:174; 5:157; 8:317; 9:195 and 200). The two forms are indifferently used according as either of them suits the purposes of metre better than the other; or the former form being more archaic, is more often met with in the older Smritis. It is too much to expect that what was openly given by the right hand was at the same time simply taken away by the left in a sly, silent or dishonest manner. The Dharma-sastras are not Dharma-sutras to warrant any brevity either, requiring a long commentary to bring out what had been implied or (for brevity's sake) left out. From the context also it is clear that nothing of that sort can hold good; and the suggestion cannot hold water for a minute. So much was said of Parasara's rule (which is the same as Narada's also) because it was he who stated at the outset

(124) that he was the law-giver for the Kali age, and that Manu, Gautama and Sankha-Likhita laid down the law for the Krita, Treta and Dwapara ages. What is this "yuga" in the expanse of time? It means probably nothing more than a period of time completely covered by a generation of men endowed with the longest lease of life as in the case of the sages themselves. For the "yuga" means just a generation as is clear from Manu, 10.64 and Yajnyavalkya, 1.96. One is supported in this view of the meaning of the term by the following considerations. That Manu's sons were Vasishtha, and Narada (Manu, 1.33-35); that Vasishtha was a contemporary of Gautama (Ramayana makes them both meet when Sri Rama was young); that he was the father of Sakti and grandfather of Parasara (Sahasranama opens by stating the pedigree of Vyasa its author); in Sakti's time Sankha-Likhita apparently must have flourished; so that we have a complete Chatur-yuga of four ages. So that their leading or ruling sages lived rather close together and gave us the law in a practically united voice.

WHY THING PLACES IN GERMANY? (BY OTTO WALTER.)

Motor roads and Thing Places—these are two noteworthy proofs of the intentions of the new Germany. In the Third Reich we find the affirmation of technical progress combined with a love of the traditions, of the customs and usages of the ancestors. Motor roads and Thing Places—they decide the face of the new German landscape. The further aims in the building of motor roads are in the economic sphere, the Thing Places on the other hand have cultural aims as planned by National Socialism. Is the building of these Thing Places, of which about 400 will gradually be spread over Germany, nothing else than an artificial mania for antiquity? If one follows up the history of the Thing Places one will quickly realize that National Socialism simply cannot do otherwise than resume the thread of this Germanic tradition. The Thing Places will be the Cult sites of the Third Reich, created and formed by the will of the people. Just as the great buildings of the German Churches—which visitor to Germany has not been deeply impressed by their grandeur!—were once created by the middle classes, who in community spirit collected brick upon brick and thus completed the gigantic German cathedrals, so working Germany is collecting the building stones of its culture. The Thing Places were taken away from the German people when the middle-class medieval period took the place of the dominance of Dukes and Gaugrafs when the Thing of the old times became a fair of the new times. Today National Socialism is daring the bold jump across the span of the centuries and is fetching one of the most valuable cultural institutions out of the historical treasure-house to bring it back to a new life according to the spirit of the 20th Century. What did the Thing mean in the olden times and what is it to mean in the future?

For the Germanic tribes the Thing was the forum of their public life. The free-born members of the tribe met here to take council under the blessings of the Gods and surrounded by the whole tribe. And, to name only one of the cults, this was where the Frisians, after they had already been converted to Christianity, still celebrated the Petri Day which was both an old Wodan festival and the Thing Court of Justice. On the evening before huge fires were lit on the Thing hills. These fires blazed across the island across the sea. These fires were to expel the spirits of the winter darkness and to welcome the awakening life of nature. In the early Middle Ages the Reichstag met on the enlarged Thing Places, and this was where the emperors were elected and deposed.

In National Socialist Germany the Thing is also to be the site of great political and cultural happenings. The two most important National Socialist holidays, the 1st May and the Harvest Thanksgiving, will have a dignified setting in the Thing Places. Germany's two biggest Thing Places will be in Berlin, where Adolph Hitler himself is supervising the building of it, and the Reichs Thing in Bueckeberg where the chief organisations of the Harvest Thanksgiving are to take place every year. The first Thing sites, by the way, which were already inaugurated on the 1st May of this year, were the big Middle German Thing on the Brand mountains near Halle and the Thing at Heringsdorf on the Baltic. The Thing Place, which is no longer to be merely a site of political action, but a place of festival for the whole nation, where the experience of the "Volksgemeinschaft" (Community of the People) is to take place and where it is hoped that a regeneration of art will also take place and will create new forms of social life. It is by no means only an open-air amphitheatre. The ideal Thing therefore cannot be a fenced in place, but it fits into the landscape, the slopes, parts and stage are to be laid out to fit in to the landscape. No benches or chairs, the grassy slopes provide the sitting accommodation. A far more difficult problem to solve than the outer formation, is the programme of the Thing. Besides the two chief aims specified above, the Thing is also to serve for the meetings of the Party and branch organisations. Further there are to be the big Thing plays as artistically shaped political demonstrations. The Thing Place is not a neutral arena for theatre performances, but it is a national centre of the landscape, where starting from the existing tradition, the myths of the place are to be reorganised according to the spirit of our age. The education of the people in a national, and not in a humanistic, sense is another aim. Consequently truly national art is to be cultivated here e.g., folk songs, folk music and folk dances in connection with the revival of old national costumes. The Thing will here become an important factor in the work of the leisure-time organisation "Strength through Pleasure."

Further, as a national theatre, the Thing has the task of proclaiming National Socialist cultural aims in subject matter of great political importance. Dr. Rainer Schloesser, the Reichs dramaturgist, is fully aware of the difficulties of this part of the Thing play and has completely realized the threatening dangers. In the necessity to simplify the characters to boldly outlined forms, there lies the danger of these plays becoming too shallow. The necessity to use large bold forms of art which directly affect the senses, the recitation chorus, music, dance, tableaux vivants, the rhythmic movement of the masses in every form may lead to a dulling into mere outwardness. Here lie—according to the Reichs dramaturgist—the great, the secular tasks of the German poets, to create an art of the masses, and which will yet be real art.

THE MESSAGE OF CHRISTIANITY. (BY REV. J. PAUL S. R. GIBSON.)

The morals of our faith as evidenced by those who profess to adopt them are not likely to carry much conviction. Even taken at their highest, one by one, they can be paralleled. Personally, I believe Christian morality as enunciated by Christ, to be revelatory of a new mode of thought with regard to life as a whole, but this understanding can only come after its meaning has been apprehended by a growing comprehension of all Christ is, and cannot be used as an argument based on the mere precepts as they stand.

God was primarily thought of as power and will. He had made the world and He judged it; His judgment was even tinged with mercy, but until Christ disclosed His nature it was not said that God so loved the world that He gave. At this point is revealed not only the personality of man but the personality of God. The two are declared to be in the highest conceivable relationship. The Creator becomes the Father. He had been called Father before but it was the father who pities, or the potter who moulds, now it was the Father who loves. Forgiveness was freely declared without any conditions except trust (this being often implied rather than stated), and the readiness to forgive others, a natural psychological prerequisite. The power to forgive is throughout assumed. The Cross is its credential. In the Cross the idea of forgiveness passes for ever away from the categories of sacrifice and legalism into that of the relation of personalities. The great revelation suffered from inadequate expression by those who would explain it. Theology has from that day to this been busy in building up explanatory systems along the lower lines of justice and sacrifice. In so doing it has brought the good news down to the level of lesser news and turned the blaze of revelation into a commonplace taper. But the miracle of the Gospels remains, and therein stands indestructibly the revelation of God as supreme personality expressing Himself to the extent that this is possible in the personality of man. This is unique. It is unique in speculation, for though the concept of the incarnation of God as power and majesty, or as weakness and human frailty is not absent from certain religions, the concept of God as love and yet free from the sins of men is not present. Still more unique is the thought that God's love was of such a quality that He not only "emptied Himself taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men," but further, "being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself becoming obedient even unto death, and that the death of the Cross." And all this is not a dream in the realm of imaginative poetry, but sober history.

Hinduism has never reached personality and has remained content with the thought of the impersonal Brahman finally absorbing the illusory individualities of men. As a natural corollary it has no true place for historicity. Buddhism rejects even individuality. Both these great religions have remained in the realm of Law, and Karma acts as the final expression of the meaning of the universe. Judaism does the same. St. Paul fought his great fight of grace in vain for them and they can see no need for anything beyond the legal relation of covenanting God with chosen people. Mohammedanism has reached individuality but never transcended the master-servant, or judge-culprit relationship.

Christians themselves have been backward in entering into their heritage. But whether we are ready to enter into possession or not, the heritage is there, and in the revelation in history of this personal relationship of God and man we have that which is utterly unique. It is this inner core of the Gospel which gives us the right and lays upon us the responsibility to share with all men the good news vouchsafed to us in the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. We are not, however, merely entrusted with a supreme truth. We are given that which meets man's universal need. That need is not material, intellectual or economic. It is personal. It is the sense of disharmony of the self with the ultimate power. When peace reigns within there is nothing that cannot be faced. The absence of that peace, however it is caused, is what we mean by sin. In every land at every time there is felt a separation whether of failure or inability to attain, and the cry goes forth "O that I knew where I might find Him." The gospel of Christ is, God with us, Emmanuel. It is the separation broken down, the peace which is forgiveness freely given to those who seek it, trusting that He is more ready to give than we to ask.

SOME TERMS OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I should like to say a few words through the medium of the Reformer on the propriety and history of certain terms connected with the problem of untouchability.

(1) The term 'Untouchable' is grammatically inapplicable to the Harijans, because, just as the Harijans are untouchable by the rest of the Hindus, so are the latter untouchable by the Harijans. If a Mahar may not be touched by a Brahman, neither may a Brahman be touched by a Mahar. In fact, the two classes of Harijans and non-Harijans are mutually untouchable. There is therefore no sense in calling only one of them untouchable. It is only because the former is the weaker of the two classes numerically or otherwise, that it suffers from what is in reality a mutual ban.

(2) The above applies equally to the term 'Un-approachable.'

(3) As the Harijans and non-Harijans are mutually untouchable and unapproachable, it follows that the terms, Touchable and Approachable, are inapplicable to the Non-Harijans. If it be said that the members of the supposed higher castes are called Touchables (or Approachables) because they are mutually touchable (or approachable,) then the Harijans also, who are mutually touchable (or approachable), will have to be called Touchables (or Approachables).

(4) The term 'caste Hindu' for the non-Harijan Hindu is of purely European origin. The word 'caste' is cognate with 'chaste,' and 'caste Hindu' seems to have been at first used to denote those within a caste as distinguished from those outcasted from it for breach of caste rules, and later applied to all those Hindus who were born within the pale of the 'chaste' castes, i. e., the so-called higher castes, irrespective of whether they continued to be within their castes or were outcasted. But the Harijans have got their several castes just as the non-Harijans have got theirs, and therefore the term 'caste Hindu' (apart from its history) is quite incapable of denoting exclusively the non-Harijans. So also the term 'non caste Hindu' is inapplicable to the Harijans; they having castes equally with the others.

(5) None of the terms 'Touchable,' 'Untouchable,' 'Approachable' and 'Unapproachable' have their literal equivalents in Sanskrit. It would seem that the vernacular terms, asprisyā etc., were only modern renderings of the English Untouchable etc., formed from Sanskrit, and not Sanskrit terms used in those senses in ancient times.

(6) The terms 'savarna' and 'avarna' for 'caste (Hindu)' and 'non-caste (Hindu)' respectively are very recent coinages, first minted, I believe, in Malabar. Literally meaning 'with caste' and 'without caste,' they are no more than Sanskrit translations of the foreign terms, 'caste' and 'non-caste' explained above. Both of them are intrinsically as misleading and inappropriate as their originals. (As used in Sanskrit, 'savarna' is the equivalent of 'homogeneous,' i. e., it means only 'of the same kind or caste.') r.com

(7) The word 'antyaaja', primarily meaning the last born or 'born of the last,' which occurs in Sanskrit literature, denotes certain low castes, not all of which correspond to the modern Harijan castes. Some of the castes enumerated as 'antyaajas' are now treated as non-Harijans, and there are of course several castes now treated as Harijan castes, which are not included in any of the variant enumerations of Antyaajas in Sanskrit treatises.

(8) The word 'Panchama,' as denoting a Harijan also appears to be of modern origin. It was obviously intended to signify 'fifth' caste, i.e., the caste next after the fourth or Sudra caste, from the Sanskrit for the fifth. It is of South-Indian (probably Tamilnad or Karnataka) origin. Nowhere in Sanskrit literature is it to be found used in that sense.

CHRIST—CENTRE OF OXFORD GROUP.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have noted with interest and something akin to amusement your editorial on the Group Movement, in a recent number of the Reformer. The thing that seems so pathetic about your article, is the very clear evidence that you display of the sensitive on-the-defensive complex which I had hoped would have died out sooner than it seems able to in India. You say, "most of the ideas can be paralleled almost word for word from the scriptures of other religions, notably the Hindu scriptures." Now why was it necessary for you to go out of your way to make that remark? I have heard like remarks and I understand the complex from which they grow. I am reminded of that fine remark of Dr. Stanley Jones, "India bound is bound to reject. India free will be free to accept."

Of course the very central and most important and the lifegiving thing at the centre of the Group Movement's life is the thing which you quite omit or fail to see. That is, the Living Christ. No set of ideas or principles anywhere would produce the results which are being seen in the Group Movement and out of it today, except for the inner working of Him who can and does come into and function in human hearts wherever they let Him do so. Take Him out of this Movement and it will fall flat. It is only in His light that a man can really see light. It is only when we really bring ourselves up alongside His perfect life that we begin to see ourselves as we really are and are moved to sorrow, repentance and surrender of ourselves to Him. That is conversion. Comparing ourselves with ourselves and taking complacent satisfaction in some supposed possession of all the good ideas and virtues in some ancient shastra will not produce any stirrings of conscience or any desire for cleansing from sin or any demand for new power and life.

May I call your attention to two sources of information which you and your readers may find it worth while to get acquainted with. One is Geoffrey Allen's book, "He That Cometh," which gives the inner interpretation of this movement in a very fine way. And the other is "Koinonia," a little magazine published in Burma and obtainable from V. W. Dyer, Seminary Hill, Insein. This gives the everyday workings of the Group Movement in an Indian setting and atmosphere and contains some very worth-while material.

G. B. OGDEN.

[Mr. Ogden asks why it was necessary for us to make the remark that most of the ideas of Buchmanism have their parallel in the scriptures of Hindu and other religions. The answer is because of the persistent claim, evidenced even in his letter, of the uniqueness of the Christian religion. In pursuance of this claim, Indian antecedents are deliberately slurred over. For instance, the biographical sketch of Dr. Buchman in the book which we reviewed, omits to mention (what Mr. S. K. George brought out in his letter published last week) that this gentleman had been in India trying to work up a revival movement before he started the Oxford Movement. We were not aware of this fact when we wrote the review. It certainly gives point to our remark to which Mr. Ogden takes exception. If Mr. Ogden is a Groupist, we are inclined to remark one thing: it lacks—to teach its members to deal courteously with people of other faiths.—Ed., I. S. A.]

PROF. G. P. GOOCH ON THE WORLD OUTLOOK.*

Our post-war world started on its course handicapped, not only by the material devastations and dislocations of the most destructive struggle in history, but by the burden of vindictive treaties. Nations have always resented defeat, but never before have there been so many and such bitter resentments at the same moment. Here is unquestionably the most alarming feature of the age in which we are living. Now that the life of the world grows daily more interdependent, it matters little where the fires of anger and revenge are burning in the hearts of men. A match lit in the Balkans set the world aflame twenty years ago. An "incident" on the Siberian railway or a rifle shot ringing out on the Middle Danube might once again hurl us into the abyss. The fate of each one of us, wherever we live, whatever the colour of our skin, whether we were victors or vanquished in the last war, hangs by a thread on the swirl of events. A deliberate attack by one power on another is extremely improbable. The danger lies in the mass of inflammable material scattered over the globe and the number of irresponsibles who are playing with the match box.

This extremity of peril is the case for the League of Nations. No historian, with his head full of past conflicts, ever shared the childish notion that the struggle of 1914 was a war to end war. Such conforming illusions are born out of the agony of the strife and perish when the fever abates. War cannot be abolished by war, but only by the organizations of mankind. It is the imperishable achievement of President Wilson to have realized this fundamental truth while the world was rocking on its foundations, and to have proclaimed it in language worthy of the Gettysburg Address. It is often said that his place in history will depend on the fate of the League which he; more than any other man, called into life. His fame seems to me to be far more securely based than that. If the present League were to be dissolved or to wither away, its place would assuredly be taken by another embodiment of the overmastering fact of the unity of civilization. The closeness of our relations to one another would demand and secure an alternative expression in institutional form.

Aristotle rightly described man as a political animal. History is the record of his ingenious attempts to satisfy his growing needs both on the material and the spiritual plane. Never for a moment do I doubt that despite temporary reactions, we are moving steadily toward a co-ordinated and co-operative world. There is something in man, declared Kant in a famous phrase, call it fate, providence or what you will, which drives us to association. The two most urgent tasks of the twentieth century are to elaborate a system of economic democracy within our respective communities, and to provide the international framework in which alone nations can work out their destinies unthreatened and unafraid. My greatest comfort during these twenty years of storm and stress has been my unshakable confidence in the triumphant spirit of man. He has overcome innumerable obstacles in his long career. Why should I doubt that he will thread his way out of the thicket of the present discontent?

A nationalist and an internationalist all my life, I acclaimed the creation of the League with both hands, and I have served it with tongue and pen; visits to the Continent, numberless contacts with representative foreigners, and vigilant study of every move in the game, have strengthened my pre-war instinct that nationalism is not enough. However much or little we may think of the League, it is at any rate, in Professor Gilbert Murray's illuminating phrase, an organ of consultation. Had it existed in 1914 it might very well have averted the catastrophe. Grey and Bethmann never met and never dared to meet during the five years of their common work, for statesmen of different groups could not visit one another without arousing suspicions of treachery and intrigue.

Add to the meetings of the Council, the Annual Assembly, the Secretariat, the Permanent Court at the Hague and the International Labour Office, and we have the rudiments of an organization not only for the preservation of peace but for carrying on international business. The achievement of the League in its many fields of activity is far more substantial than is realized by its ignorant critics. Functioning as it has had to do in a world bleeding with the wounds of war, and handicapped by the prejudices of political and economic nationalism its leaders have fought bravely to substitute the reign of law for the brutal resort to force. Historians of the future, I cannot doubt, will pay homage to the unselfish servants of humanity who, like Cecil and Nansen, learned and taught the deeper lessons of the war. The League is what its members make it, and its fortunes rise and fall with the ebb and flow of events. The history of Europe since 1918 divides into three sharply defined chapters. The first, stretching to 1924, witnessed the continuance of the fierce in the blunder of the invasion of the Ruhr. The second opened in 1924 with the fall of the Bloc National in France and the substitution of the conciliatory Herriot and Briand for the unbending Poincaré. One happy event succeeded another—the withdrawal from the Ruhr, the acceptance of the Dawes Plan, the enforced renunciation of the claim to Alsace-Lorraine, the entry of Germany into the League, the Kellogg Pact, the evacuation of the Rhineland in 1930 five years in advance of the treaty limit. Like most other observers I believed that the worst was over. The general economic situation improved, and the Locarno Pact gave promise of a stability in Western Europe unknown since 1871. There was a breath of Spring in the air.

Once again we were wrong, for it was a false dawn. In 1930 a third chapter opened when the economic blizzard, breaking loose from New York at the end of 1929, burst upon Europe, uprooting great banks, doubling unemployment and sweeping Hitler into the foreground of the stage. 1931 witnessed the seizure of Manchuria by Japan, in violation of her solemn pledges under the Covenant, the Nine-Power Washington Treaty and the Kellogg Pact. In 1933 constitutional government in Germany began to totter, and Japan withdrew from the angry but impotent League. In 1933 Hitler became Chancellor, tore up the Weimar Constitution, suppressed every vestige of liberty, launched savage attack on the Jews and stormed out of the League. It was not surprising that the Disarmament Conference, which met at Geneva at the opening of 1932, failed after more than two years of discussion even to approach a solution of the problem. For armaments are at once the instruments of policy and the expression of fear. Japan's unpunished robbery of her helpless neighbour struck a staggering blow at the prestige of the League, and the resurgence of flamboyant nationalism across the Rhine inevitably stiffened the French, who decline to reduce their forces without the additional military guarantees which Great Britain cannot provide.

At no moment since the end of the war have I known so many dark clouds in the sky. In England we do not actually expect a collision between Russia and Japan, but we should not be in the least surprised if it occurred. We are cheered by the new orientation of Russia, whom we hope at length to welcome into the Council of the League; but we realize that her action springs from her fear of Germany and Japan. We are gratified by Hitler's pact with Poland and the prospect of a bloodless plebiscite in the Saar; but we look with anxious eyes at Austria, where Italy and Germany are roughly competing for control. The relations between Paris and Berlin are more strained than at any time since the invasion of the Ruhr, and the Chancellor's pacific assurances ring hollow while his followers are arming and drilling and while, despite the poverty of the country, expenditure on armaments—on land, at sea and in the air—is rapidly increased.

The failure of the Geneva Conference indicates a return to the armament race which was one of the most potent causes of the war. Japan's claims for a higher ratio of capital ships at the next naval conference will be as difficult to accept as to reject. Meanwhile the inventors are busy increasing the size, the power and the number of aircraft, civil and military, and the chemists are concocting in their laboratories the explosives which may decide the next war. The prolonged economic distress shows little sign of terminating, though some countries, including my own are on the upgrade. Half Europe is ruled by dictators who scoff at democracy and trample human rights under their feet. Meanwhile the Communists look on with firm satisfaction, awaiting their hour.

It is a dark picture, and I fear that it is not overdrawn. But there is not, in my judgment, any need for defeatism or despair. Historians of all people ought to keep their heads in a crisis, for the whole pageant of the past is continually before their eyes. The centuries that followed the fall of the Roman Empire were a far worse experience than anything we are facing today. The Tornado of 1914 broke upon a world striding rapidly ahead. The advance has been rudely checked, and the destructive influences of the struggle have proved even greater and more enduring than we thought. It is a sad story, but it is not a sentence of death.

I shall never forget the ringing accents of President Roosevelt's inaugural, which I heard over the radio, as he uttered the historic words; "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself." What is true for the United States is true for the rest of the world. The duty of the good citizen today is to keep up his spirits, to maintain his faith in humanity unimpaired, to co-operate patiently and unselfishly in defense of justice and peace. Despite our quarrels and our prejudices, we are nearer the ennobling conception of a world community than ever before. If ideals are to be abandoned because they cannot be attained, real Christianity would have been thrown on the scrap-heap centuries ago. Some of my friends, when pressed for their views on the tragic confusion of the hour, reply: We are pessimists for the present and optimists for the future.

My temperament is rather critical than sanguine, and my work brings me into almost daily contact with the victims of adversity. Yet I range myself unhesitatingly with those who look with confidence to the coming of the dawn. It is far too soon to declare in sombre resignation that the human race has learned nothing from the most terrible of wars.

UTOPIA, INCORPORATED.*

Out of Southern California, that paradise of the incredible, has come a social movement that all students of American politics should note with care. For the inevitable has happened: some one has finally united a form of radicalism with the showmanship so dear to the emotions of the average American. To say that the experiment has been successful is to indulge in understatement. It has swept Southern California like a hurricane. Incorporated on February 20, 1934, the Utopian Society (or US Incorporated) now boasts a membership of 200,000. Nor is this boast far from the truth.

The Utopian Society operates as a secret order. Its founders have cleverly grafted a form of radicalism on the fraternal-lodge type of organization, with some form of which nine out of every ten adult Americans are said to be familiar. The ideas of the society are propagated not by debate, which invariably provokes dissension and ends in disunion, but by ritual and dogma. In resorting to these methods, the Utopians have shown a realism new in American radicalism.

Let me illustrate. A friend, or acquaintance—he may be a salesman visiting your store—inquires if you would be interested in knowing something about a society that aimed, by strictly educational methods, to help Americans fight the depression. Or, the visitor might whisper, "Have you a number?"—the password of the society. In case you were already a member, you would repeat a number for identification. It would be some such number as "25 x 9876." The last figures would indicate the number of the particular meeting at which you became a member, the first would indicate your particular number at that meeting. Records of all meetings are maintained at the headquarters of the society, and identification is swift and accurate.

In case you were not a member but confessed an interest in the society, you would be given an address and told to inquire for your friend at a certain time and date. Upon your arrival, you would note the presence of a guard at the door. More than likely, the address would be the residence of your friend and the guardsman would be his son. After sending in your name for identification, you would be admitted. About twenty people would be seated around the room. Your friend, acting as a self-constituted chairman, would then read an "examination lecture" about "US Incorporated."

After the preliminary lecture has been read, the chairman then opens the meeting for discussion. The discussion is predicated on a list of questions that, like all the other forms, has been received from the headquarters of the society. The purpose of the discussion is to kill time, while each member of the audience who desires to join the society is conducted, blindfolded, through a series of three examination sessions in adjoining rooms. Some of the questions, read by the chairman and discussed by the audience, are the following:

Do you believe the economic system of this country, as now applied, is at fault?

* Carey McWilliams in New Republic.

Do you believe the necessities of life should be destroyed while people are suffering want and privation?

Do you believe the remedies now being applied by the administration will solve our social and economic problem?

Do you believe that poverty can be abolished without the abolition of profit?

While these and similar questions are being rather gingerly discussed by the uneasy audience the blindfolded candidates are taken, one at a time, into an adjoining room. There the First Examiner asks them certain questions: name, address, occupation, business phone number, and so forth. The candidate then proceeds, with the assistance of a guide, to the Second Examiner, who propounds such questions as, "Have you ever had any writing, dramatic or speaking experience? Do you drive an automobile? What is its seating capacity?" All indicate that the candidate, if admitted, is to be used in some manner as part of the organization. Then, in still another room (the procession has by this time probably reached the kitchen, the maid's room or the back porch), the Third Examiner assuming a high moral tone informs the candidate that the Utopian Society is a non-profit corporation; that it is predicated on the Golden Rule. He then inquires if the candidate understands the aims and purposes of the Society. Invariably the candidates answer "Yes," although obviously knowing nothing whatever of the Society or its aims. The Third Examiner then gives the candidate a permanent identification number, noting the number on the candidate's questionnaire, which is sent to headquarters for future reference. The candidate is then considered a member of the society, entitled to witness the "cycles."

All preliminary work in the order is directed toward the Cycle Rituals. There are five cycles which are presented in large auditoriums to thousands of members. Each member who is privileged to attend the cycles is theoretically supposed to have done all the preliminary work, such as recruiting his quota of members, paying his $3 in dues, performing a certain amount of organization work. When he attends the cycles he does so as a "pilgrim," he emerges from the cycles a "hermit."

The most interesting feature of the cycles is the manner of presentation. They are enacted on the stage, by players who simply move about while excellent speaking voices off-stage, through radio-amplifiers, boom forth the drama of ideas. The first and second cycles picture the unemployed as down-trodden folk. They try to get grain from the Grain Merchant, but are told that he must sell for a profit, which they cannot pay. They consult the Money Lender, who demands interest and gives them, not gold and silver, but paper money which he controls, issuing and withdrawing it at will. Before they can spend the money, the Constable arrives and demands taxes. Then, at a later period, they meet a "hermit" who throws out several pregnant hints about "reason" and "truth" and "democracy" and points toward a neon-illuminated picture of Reason Ascendant with the American flag in the background. Incidentally, nearly all of this childish showmanship can be directly traced to the influence of Aimee Sample McPherson, with her mob-fetching allegories and pageants that have fascinated Southern Californians these many years.

The last cycles outline a society in which the central power operates and owns all industries and regulates the production, distribution and consumption of goods. Under one of these later lectures, the "new mechanism of money" is outlined. These monetary ideas would seem to stem from Soddy's "Wealth, Virtual Wealth and Debt." Through all the organization, a careful centralization of authority is maintained. The Utopians place a high valuation on centralized authority; further evidence, if any be needed, that they are realists, so far as organization is concerned. People must be told what to do; they must be moved about by prearrangement; they must listen to a ritual and dogma. They must witness pageants, not debates. And they must be caught off-guard by mystery and hocus-pocus. A political meeting of the old-fashioned variety is no longer workable. The audience is advised of the character of the meeting before it attends; hence, prejudice and bias are provoked in advance. But when the audience is recruited in secret, singly, and assembled in small groups, its mind is in an almost hypnotic state of ignorance, hope and expectation. It is then that the anonymous voice of the lecturer can reach them in a manner that, except to those who have actually seen the process, is almost unbelievable.

The startling manner in which, within approximately three months' time, a society such as the Utopian Society was organized in an American city and expanded to a huge membership is surely indicative of two facts of general significance: the existence among the lower fringes of the middle class, that is, among the poor but nominally employed ranks of clerks, small business men and white-collar employees, of a mood of great restlessness and impatience; and the fact that, approached with the right blandishments and allured by the appropriate fetiches, this class is easily and effectively organized for action—and it is the fact that they can be organized, as a class, that is important. In the past it has always been the apathy of this group that has paralyzed radical action in America. What direction this impulse will take, either in the Utopian Society or generally throughout the country, whether toward communism or, as is more likely, toward a fancy American fascism, remains to be seen. The mood and the impulse are there, and the Utopians have shown conclusively how the trick can be performed.

Rural Uplift Scheme:—The Divisional Commissioners, states the Director of Information, Bombay, have submitted a quarterly report for January-March 1934 on the progress of village improvement schemes in their respective divisions. These reports show that a good beginning has been made in many areas. The first unit of organisation, namely, a district executive committee, has been set up in most of the districts, and work has begun almost everywhere. Its chief aim is to implant in the villagers themselves a desire for improvement, and this is to be promoted by the formation of a permanent nucleus of workers and by co-ordinating existing social service agencies in rural areas. Non-officials and officials alike are interesting themselves in the movement. Reports from the various districts indicate that these committees are functioning satisfactorily, and hold prospects of attracting popular support, which should help in the attainment of the general objective of the scheme.

Religion in Mysore:—The catholicity of views in respect of religious belief which distinguishes the royal family of Mysore was exemplified on Sunday August 12 when the near relatives of the Maharaja paid a devotional visit to a church, the foundation of which was laid by the Maharaja himself in October last. Costly offerings including a necklace set with diamonds and pearls were made on behalf of the Mysore Palace household (the seat of orthodox Hindu piety) at St. Philomena's shrine on Sunday in connection with the commemoration feast of the saint. The Maharani, the Yuvarani and the Princess attended. Throngs of devotees paid homage to the saint whose marvellous powers of healing have won the title of Wonder-working Virgin Martyr. Devotees are looking upon the shrine as a hallowed spot of pilgrimage.
